PREFACE

THIS work is designed as the basis for a law school course in the methods of the legislative process and in the judicial techniques of applying statutes in the solution of legal issues. It recognizes that they have been developed by treating statutes as a cognate group that must be dealt with as a whole. The objective of the course is not only to demonstrate pertinent methods, but also to reveal the concepts and attitudes that have influenced their historical development and prevail today.

Although "statute law is the basis of legal practice," and many law students are prospective legislators, until lately most lawyers have been commencing their professional careers with little knowledge of the handling, let alone the creation, of legislation. In 1934 the course in legislation was introduced at the University of Minnesota as an experimental attempt to cure that deficiency, and this book is the outgrowth of the mimeographed materials in use and experience gained there. In 1934 the New York Law Revision Commission was organized, and it set up headquarters at Cornell Law School. A few years later a problem course in legislation was offered at Cornell to a limited group of students, the method of instruction being part of a general program set up for third-year students. After revision of the cases and materials by the original editor in the light of each year's use, the selection and arrangement for this publication is new, and is the result of the combined teaching and practical experience of both editors.

This book presupposes at least an elementary knowledge of substantive law, and some understanding of the judicial techniques of applying and developing the "common law". It is meant to be correlated with a course in federal constitutional law. Desirable preparation also is at least one course in which statutory materials are interwoven with case law, and some training in legal research such as is acquired in a course in briefmaking. On the other hand, systematic training in legislative methods should not be postponed until after the students' techniques have become too rigidly set in the "common law" mold. Taking into account the foregoing factors and the problem nature of the course, this training is now given in the third year at both Minnesota and Cornell.

This book is patterned for a course of approximately sixty classroom hours, extending through the academic year. A greater amount of text material, mostly from legal periodicals, is included than in most casebooks. Some is expository and intended to save classroom time; much, however, presents conflicting and controversial ideas which require careful and critical comparative analysis and evaluation.

Cases are used mainly to enable study (a) of the methods by which certain devices are utilized, and (b) of the factors which influence the choice of one of such devices rather than another. It has therefore not been possible by editing to shorten a number of the judicial opinions appreciably without depreciating their instructional value. The primary criteria for the selection of cases and materials have been (a) teaching value, and (b) reflection of present trends. The former has sometimes been more effectively met by developing a topic with cases and materials drawn from diverse sources; sometimes with those from a single representative jurisdiction. The latter has dictated inclusion of mostly recent cases and pronouncements on some phases of the subject.

The methods of legislation, like any other art, can be really understood only after some practice. The class-room discussion of theory should therefore be accompanied by as much collateral work in research and drafting as possible. In particular there is great teaching value in having the student participate in the preparation of actual bills and observe their fate in the legislature. While the object of the course is not to train expert draftsmen, and, indeed, little skill can be acquired in the available time, an appreciation of the difficulties involved in making laws cannot be as well learned in any other way. Furthermore, experience proves that no one can master the art of applying statutes without fully understanding how they are made. This book thus contains material on the mechanics of research and drafting. It is focused mainly on state legislation rather than on federal since (1) there is usually greater opportunity for students while in law school to participate in the preparation, and to make firsthand research studies, of the former; and (2) a knowledge of the field of private law revision is of great importance to a practitioner.

Considerations of space have precluded inclusion of specific drafting and research problems; but law teachers should not have difficulty in discovering challenging projects in their current environment, especially if they elicit the cooperation of governmental agencies and professional organizations. Also it will be obvious that many of the cases and statutes included provide exercises in correcting drafting faults and rectifying the results of inadequate research.

This book is meant to be a teaching tool useful in developing a course aimed at providing an understanding of the methods, nature, and function of legislation that are significant for a lawyer. The character and extent of treatment of each topic has been measured by the editors' view of its relative importance in such a course. The instructor must draw upon his resources of learning and experience to fill in details, point up the problems, and bring into comparison, when necessary, the peculiarities of any particular jurisdiction.

He appreciates the cooperation of the following in facilitating development of the practical aspects of the legislation course: Hon. Roy E. Dunn, Chairman, Rules Committee, and Congressman George MacKinnon, former Chairman, Judiciary Committee, of the Minnesota House of Representatives; William B. of teaching materials and methods and other assistance rendered by his former students, especially John A. Bauman, faculty of law, University of New Mexico; Wilbur F. Bowker, faculty of law, University of Alberta; Gerald W. Heaney, of the Duluth bar; Horace Hitch, of the Minneapolis bar; Howard M. Kohn, U. S. Treasury Department; Richard C. Maxwell, faculty of law, University of North Dakota; and Millard H. Ruud, of the faculty, University of Kansas School of Law.

Mr. MacDonald desires to express his gratitude to the successive chairmen of the New York Law Revision Commission, Charles K. Burdick, Warnick J. Kernan, and Young B. Smith, and to all the members of the Commission since its organization, with whom the technique of Commission investigation was developed. To the vision of Dean Robert S. Stevens he owes the opportunity to use the problem method of instruction at Cornell. He is obligated to his wife, Mary B. MacDonald, and his assistant, Laura T. Mulvaney, each of the New York bar and a member of the Commission staff, for counsel and advice regarding the content and aims of the course as well as its general boundaries. He desires to express his thanks to Magdalen G. H. Flexner and Mary A. Beck, former students, and to Natalie Maas of the New York Bar, who aided in the collection of materials.

SOME COMPARATIVE ASPECTS OF GROWTH OF LAW THROUGH THE JUDICIAL AND LEGISLA- TIVE PROCESSES

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

A comparison of judicial and legislative functions and methods is incidental to the treatment of almost every topic in this book. This introductory chapter is designed to demonstrate some salient historical and contemporary differences and similarities that influence the relative efficacy, scope, and interplay of the judiciary and the legislatures as law-making agencies.

Other differences and similarities are more conveniently and effectively considered in the context of following chapters.

SECTION 1. TRANSITION OF THE GROWING POINT OF THE LAW

ROSCOE POUND, SOURCES AND FORMS OF LAW

22 Notre Dame Lawyer 1-3, *5-8 (1946).

Recalling Maine's well known generalization that the agencies of growth of law are fictions, equity, and legislation, it may be said that the order of their appearance is in a large view (1) special fictions, (2) sweeping changes (sometimes as in equity in Roman law using special procedural fictions) under the cover of a general fiction, and (3) avowed, deliberate lawmaking. In the first there is a belief or pretence that law is not made or altered. In the second there is a belief or pretence of interpretation or that law of higher authority is discovered and applied. In the third all pretence is given up, and new rules and new standards are avowedly invented and imposed.

It is long before the political organization of a society is well enough developed to take over the work of lawmaking as a proper function of government. Those who exercise the powers of a society in the beginnings of a legal order do not think of making law. They think of recognizing law which has an independent existence as ethical custom or precepts of religion. At this stage the state has not become the paramount agency of social control. The governing authority in a modern state may recognize law found at hand or may make new law. But the idea that law may be made and that the state has not only the power but the duty of making it is relatively modern. It came to Germanic peoples through the influence of Roman law, as it was said, iuxta exemplum Romanorum, with the idea of union of all political powers in a sovereign who can make law by exercise of will. Modern legislation comes from Constantinople rather than from Rome. The maturity of law is marked by regular and frequent resort to legislation as the agency of change and improvement. Legislation, indeed, exists before this stage of legislation. What, however, marks the stage of legislation in the development of a legal system is the use of legislation not as an instrument of occasional legal revolution, but as the regular, everyday agency of growth and development of law.

For example, compare in Roman law the period from Augustus to Diocletian with that from Diocletian to Justinian. In the Roman law of the classical era the agency of growth was juristic science largely under the influence of the theory of natural law. The regular, everyday development of the law took place through juristic writing. Here and there changes were made by occasional statutes but it was not till the third century that the balance begins to incline toward the imperative element. After Diocletian, juristic writing substantially comes to an end, and from Diocletian to Justinian growth takes place through legislation. In the same way compare sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth-century English law with that of the nineteenth and of the twentieth century. Allowing for the legislation of Henry VIII and of the Commonwealth, none the less almost all growth down to the nineteenth century took place through judicial decision or juristic writing. On the other hand, the great reform movement of the nineteenth century was legislative. The rise of the Court of Chancery and the absorption of the law merchant marked a reforming of the law through the traditional element. The nineteenth-century reform movement, inaugurated by Bentham, involved a substitution of the imperative for the traditional element. Note also workmen's compensation legislation and the reform of English real property law by legislation in the present century. Compare German law before the empire (the Pandektenrecht) with the German law of the twentieth century in which legislation overwhelmingly preponderates. Also compare the minute American legislation of today on all sorts of matters of private law with the all but purely judicial and juristic development which went before. Unquestionably in the modern state the growing point of the law has shifted to legislation.

In the modern state the chief activities are not war and religion, as in antiquity, but administration and legislation. Both of these are growing at the expense of the traditional element, the purely professional element, in legal systems. Instead of leaving all or nearly all controversies to tribunals which apply traditional guides to decision, the modern state more and more seeks to forestall controversy by legislatively prescribed rules or summarily adjusts relations through administration. . . .

We may now turn to the history of legislation as an agency in the growth of law. Five stages in the development of legislation on purely legal matters may be suggested for convenience of treatment: (1) unconscious legislation in the period of customary law; (2) declaratory legislation in the period when the traditional law is reduced to writing; (3) selection and amendment when by the political union of peoples having in some particulars divergent customs it becomes necessary to choose in declaring the custom of the new whole; (4) conscious constructive lawmaking, as an occasional expedient at first to meet political exigencies, but gradually to effect important changes here and there in the legal system in emergencies; (5) habitual legislation as an ordinary agency of legal development, often culminating in codification of the entire legal system.

1. Unconscious legislation. I speak here of the beginnings of law, i. e. of law in the analytical sense; not of the beginnings of social control but of the beginnings of a specialized form of social control by politically organized society. In the first stage of legal development, the stage of traditional modes of decision based upon repeated decisions by supposed inspiration, a great deal of unconscious lawmaking goes on. The case in hand may not be exactly one which has arisen previously, but those who have the custody of the tradition assimilate it thereto. Or they may warp the tradition more or less unconsciously to meet new needs. Maine describes how he saw this going on in India. "In point of fact," he says, ". . . the various shades of the power lodged with the village council under the empire of the ideas proper to it, are not distinguished from one another, nor does the mind see a clear difference between making a law, declaring a law, and punishing an offender against a law. If the powers of this body must be described by modern names, that which lies most in the background is legislative power, that which is most distinctly conceived is judicial power. The laws obeyed are regarded as having always existed, and usages really new are confounded with the really old." Again he says: ". . . if very strict language be employed, legislation is the only term properly expressing the invention of customary rules to meet cases which are really new. Yet, if I may trust the statements of several eminent Indian authorities, it is always the fact or the fiction that this council only declares customary law." A like phenomenon is to be seen in Hebrew law. Just as, using law to mean the body of received precepts, the judge precedes the law historically, so historically the court precedes the legislature. The judicial function is the first to be conceived distinctly, since the first problem of the legal order is simply to decide peaceably. The legislative function is the last so to be conceived. Logically according to the idea of separation of powers we have first a lawmaker who makes laws and second a court which applies them. But this is not the actual course of legal development.

2. Declaratory legislation. All legislation for a long time in the history of a legal system is of this type. It is not an authoritative making of new laws, it is or is taken to be an authoritative publication of law already existing. Thus, ten patricians reduced the ius civile to writing in the Twelve Tables. Theretofore it was an oral tradition. The prologue to the Senchus Mor, the great book of the Brehon (old Irish) law tells how the "bards" came together and recited the traditional law to St. Patrick. The prologue to the Lex Salica tells how certain old men from the villages of the Salian Franks were brought together and wrote out the customary law. Remnants of this idea persisted in Roman law in the formula by which the assembly of the people rejected a proposed lex-antiquo, i. e. let the customary law be stated as it was stated of old, and the reiterated proposition, which seems to us today to go without saying, that the later legislative enactment prevails over the earlier. A remnant may be seen in the common law in Blackstone's seventh rule of statutory interpretation: "Where the common law and a statute differ the common law gives place to the statute; and an old statute gives place to a new one." The idea of the declaratory nature of legislation hung on for a long time. But if statutes were declaratory of custom it might be asked: Why was not the older declaration the more reliable?

3. Selection and amendment. A certain conscious making of law takes place where choice must be made between conflicting traditions or conflicting traditions must be harmonized through amendment. This necessity arises whenever an attempt is made to declare the common custom of a political unit formed by the union of formerly distinct tribes or people with customs of their own. An example may be seen in Alfred's laws. He tells us he had to pick and choose and even amend, but that he "durst not set down much of [his] own." There is a like disclaimer in the laws of Howell the Good. From this there is an easy progress, but one long, only occasionally and gradually achieved, to intentional and avowed making of laws as something wholly new.

4. Conscious constructive lawmaking. A first step in this direction comes when men perceive that by changing the written record of the law they can change the law, which theretofore had been held eternal and immutable. Usually at this point a legislative ferment sets in, e. g. the early republican legislation at Rome, the Frankish capitularies on the Roman imperial model, the legislation of Edward I on the Byzantine model. But this outburst of legislation is commonly soon superseded by a purely professional development of the law and it is not until the maturity of legal systems that we enter upon a real stage of legislation. There is little conscious constructive lawmaking till a legal system reaches the stage of equity and natural law. It comes first with the theory of natural law; of a law as a declaration not of custom but of natural law. It becomes wholly conscious in the maturity of law, with the analytical theory of law as a body of laws and of laws as made, not found.

NOTES

1. With respect to the statement in Maine, "Ancient Law", Ch. 2, that fictions, equity and legislation are the chronological agencies by which law is brought into harmony with a developing society, Holdsworth, "Sources and Literature of English Law", at p. 2, says: "Now this general proposition as to the sources and agencies by which legal systems have been developed will not fit the facts of English legal history". (His explanation is found at pp. 2-4.)

2. In Eggleston, "Legal Development in a Modern Community", in Interpretations of Modern Legal Philosophies (1947), 168 at 169, the author says: "There are three phases in lawmaking which supervene on the primitive law:

"(a) Command by established leaders; (b) Bargains between various classes to secure the acceptance of desired principles; (c) The free exercise of authority to establish a change in the legal relations of the members of society. These are not separate historically, but (a) is generally earlier and (c) is the final phase."

J. E. A. JOLLIFFE, THE CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF MEDIEVAL ENGLAND

London: 1937. A. & C. Black Ltd., 239-240.

It is certain that, however far back in English or Norman history we go, we shall find that the function of judgment was inherent in assemblies of notables. So much is basic in the public life of the northern world, and, while the reign of law was supreme and legislation as such unknown, this one function embodied public life at its fullest in the curia. This was true of honour and kingdom alike. But by the twelfth century it was no longer enough. Innovations in custom were becoming too numerous to pass uncriticized, and refinements in the procedure of courts were in sum altering their whole basis. Acts of state could no longer be explained solely as judgments or recognitions of custom. With the reign of Henry II a new device, the assize, comes into politics. It is something set by agreement—assisa statuta, assisam statuere are common amplifications—and it marks the first realization that custom can be changed by the will of those who live under it or govern by it. With the assize we are at the headspring of English legislation, which, strangely, descends not from the national code-making of the eleventh century, but from the agreements of feudal tenants and their lords. The assize may be used for a number of cognate purposes, but it keeps within a narrow range. It may settle and declare points of custom which are open, it may bring inequalities of custom to a common rule among peers of any honour or procedure or service such as are felt to lie within the spirit, but not the letter, of existing custom. The same principle of agreed and established, assized clarification or innovation may be found in the redditus assisae, opera assisa, of most manors, in the standards set for the staple trades, such as the assizes of Cloth, Bread, and Ale, or in the assizes of the Forest or of Arms, which bind all freemen of the realm. The distinguishing marks of the assize, by which in combination it is distinguished from the judicia or recognitions of the past, are that it is admittedly new enactment, that it requires the consent of the lord or prince, and that it must apply throughout the area of administration for which it is promulgated. In this it is communis assisa, and is not the effect of individual submission but of common assent, though such assent may be expressed without the formality and conclusiveness of the decisions of assemblies in later days. Such assizes, essentially legislative, will, if they are applied often enough and to matters of sufficient importance, bring the problems of will and authority, counsel and the initiative of the prince into an entirely new light.

ARTHUR VON MEHREN, THE JUDICIAL CONCEPTION OF LEGISLATION IN TUDOR ENGLAND

From Interpretations of Modern Legal Philosophies. 751, 755-757.*

New York: 1946. Copyright by Oxford University Press, New York, Inc.

The Tudor period, the first in English history to see economic and social change carried forward by statutes, clearly represents, moreover, a marked development towards the modern conception of law as consciously made, and away from the conception of statutory law manifested by the records of the English medieval Parliaments, laws that were in the main a body of custom which had merely been authoritatively declared by earlier Parliaments. The Reformation Parliament of Henry VIII had a revolutionary effect upon the institutions of the time, even though England may not have recognized a law making, as distinct from a law-declaring, Parliament until the Long Parliament. Institutional development and increasing Parliamentary activity forced the sixteenth century to modify the older medieval idea of law as declared custom; and the resultant modifications in the older conception opened the way for the conception of consciously made law. Henry VIII, in perhaps a rather modern fashion, talked to his Parliament of the advantage of a large output of statutes. The detail and length of statutes increased. It is even more important that statutes now first came to deal with all branches of life: with detailed regulations of the developing economy of trade; with men's religious life; with the dynastic arrangements of the state; with the relation of church and state. The impact of parliamentary activity upon the average Englishman was becoming not only more extensive and pervasive but also more constant.

This evolution toward a conception of law as deliberately made seems to have begun in the time of Henry VII. However, the great majority of the public acts from his reign did not alter fundamental customs or institute general rules. Most of them, as Pickthorn has shown, were designed for the enforcement of what was already law. Statutes were already in existence, however, which dealt with the clergy and sanctuary, with the Star Chamber, with 'Navigation,' with Fines, and with the maintenance of husbandry. There were also the 'De Facto Act,' the acts for the subordination of local legislation, the act dispensing with indictment in certain cases, and the 'shoring or underpropping act for the benevolence.' None of these, however, was an undoubtedly 'new' law. The most novel was the act dispensing with indictments, which, as Coke was to say, 'tended in execution . . . to . . . the utter subversion of the common law.' Such a fundamental interference with the enforcement of law is hardly a mere matter of procedure; yet it is not full-fledged law-making, and it stands alone. The 'De Facto Act' of 1494 is interesting as well for its non-repeal clause. Sir Francis Bacon wrote of that Act that 'a supreme and absolute power cannot conclude itself, neither can that which is in nature revocable be made fixed. . . .' The presence of such clauses in the legislation of the Tudor period indicates that the Parliament had not grasped, as Bacon had, the conception of legislative sovereignty; and such clauses are an interesting Parliamentary parallel to the judicial notion of fundamental law, which was also present in the period; both are essentially transitional doctrines between a conception of law as declared custom and a conception of law as consciously made.

In the reign of Henry VIII, statutes assume a greater importance. Henry was even to admit by statute that his powers of prerogative required a statutory backing. And the Reformation Parliament was to change the relationship of church and state, and was also to expropriate property. The Statute of Uses was passed in 1536; the Statute of Wills in 1539. In the first years of Henry's reign there were numerous statutes repealing earlier acts. But the activities of the Parliament during Henry's reign did not represent, on the whole, a sharp break with the past. Most of the changes which were effected were not revolutionary, and apparently did not necessarily have to be considered new law. The statute of 1536 against the smaller monasteries was, however, clearly without earlier precedent. The act of expropriation of the Alien Priories had been directed against French mother houses in time of war. And the statute which took land from the reversioners of the Templars to give it to the Hospitalers is in the nature of a doctrine of cy pres rather than an outright taking of lands. Neither of these earlier acts, moreover, was directed against the medieval church-state relationship. This concern of the English state with religious matters, a concern vigorously expressed in the statute of 1536, steadily increased thereafter, and Parliament soon became accustomed to acting in this new sphere.

The reigns of Edward VI, Mary, and Elizabeth do not have any statutes that are so new or so untraditional as were the religious acts of Henry VIII. Most of the legislation of the Elizabethan period is concerned, indeed, with England's expanding trade and regulation of that trade. Probably the most important statute of the period, from a constitutional point of view, was the Uniformity Act of the first year of Elizabeth's reign. And yet that Act, perhaps for political reasons, was phrased as an affirmation of the old law. And the courts of law in Caudrey's case accepted this medieval explanation of the legislation.

The Tudor period has witnessed, therefore, a de facto widening of the legislative scope of Parliament. Now and then within the period, Parliament unmistakably made 'new' law. Nevertheless the idea that law is declared custom persists both as conscious intellectual tradition and as habit. This persistence is perhaps a sufficient explanation of the vast majority of Tudor statutes. It is characteristic, indeed, that Fitzherbert, in his Abridgment, omits to draw a distinction between statutes which declare common law and statutes which create new law. Brooke, however, has made this distinction, a distinction which would seem by then (1573) to be one of sufficient importance to merit the attention of the average practitioner. In his approach to statutes the Tudor judge may have understood the new tendencies in part, but he was essentially attempting to fit together the new (statutory law) and the old (customary law), an attempt which parliamentary activity had not yet made impossible. The common law of England, said Sir John Davys, "Comming nearest to the lawe of Nature, which is the root and touch stone of all good lawes . . . doth far excell our written lawes, namely our Statutes or Acts of Parliament: which is manifest in this, that when our Parliament have altered or changed any fundamentall points of the Common Lawe, those alterations have been found by experience to be so inconvenient for the Common-Wealth, as that the common lawe hath in effect beene restored againe, in the same points by other Actes of Parliament, in succeeding ages."

NOTES

1. In Cam, "The Legislators of Medieval England", Raleigh Lecture, 1945, at p. 2, the author states: "There are three main sources of legislative activity in medieval England: the directive or planning urge in the ruler, the need for clarifying and defining experienced by the judicature, and the demand from the ruled for redress of grievances."

2. Further discussion of the origin of English legislation, showing that the modern statute did not emerge, and legislation was not a separate function of government, until the end of the Middle Ages, is found in the following: Allen, "Law in the Making", 3rd Ed., pp. 357-362; Holdsworth, "2 History of English Law," 2nd Ed., pp. 219-220; and Plucknett, "A Concise History of the Common Law", 3rd Ed., pp. 282-288.

The last writer says at p. 286: "As far as we can see, a statute in the reign of Edward I simply means something established by royal authority; whether it is established by the King in Council, or in a Parliament of nobles, or in a Parliament of nobles and commons as well, is completely immaterial. It is equally immaterial what form the statute takes, whether it be a charter, or a statute enrolled and proclaimed, or merely an administrative expression of the royal will notified to the judicial authorities by means of a letter close (which at this period was a species of interdepartmental correspondence). In short, while we are in the reign of Edward I we feel the typical mediaeval atmosphere, which was, above all, intensely practical. The great concern of the government was to govern, and if in the course of its duties legislation became necessary, then it was effected simply and quickly without any complications or formalities. Even after parliamentary legislation had begun to appear, we still find the Council exercised a preponderant influence and that among the councillors were frequently to be found the judges, for it is only natural in so practical an age that the Council should call upon the judges to draft legislation, and such in fact was the case".

. . . Legislation now is generally thought of as the pre-eminent instrument for law-making. However, this method which appeared at an early period in English history was used but sparingly both in England and the United States until comparatively recent times. Professors Durfee and Dawson have dramatically demonstrated this fact with figures from the English record where the span of Anglo-Saxon history is longer than in the United States.¹ The first volume of the Statutes at Large covers the 115 years from 1225 to 1340. The next three volumes embrace two centuries, averaging 66 years to a book. The next three average 38 years each, and bring the legislative record to the Restoration of 1660. The remaining forty years of the century almost fill three volumes, averaging 13 years to the book. It required 31 volumes to cover the eighteenth century, or approximately three years to the volume. The nineteenth century filled 95 volumes. Since then there has been a volume for each year. Durfee and Dawson might have added that the trend in the amount of delegated legislation emanating from administrative agencies is the same. The size of the British Statutory Rules and Orders is greater even than that of the Statutes at Large, and so far as the public is concerned these rules and orders have the same effect as legislation.

Why was this method of law-making utilized so little in earlier centuries and is now utilized so extensively? A variety of answers comes to mind. In a relatively static and uncomplicated society, the adjudication of disputes on a case-by-case basis undoubtedly worked reasonably well. There was probably little felt need for laying down rules, other than the precedents growing out of judicial decisions, that would be applicable to future similar controversies or that would prevent such controversies from arising. As the body of judicial doctrine developed, furthermore, and was strengthened by scholarly exegesis, the scales were increasingly weighted in favor of the judicial process as an established institution.

No defined concept of the service state had arisen. The church, in fact, provided in rudimentary form many of the social welfare services now performed by the state. Hence there was no occasion to enact a multiplicity of statutes charging the executive branch of government with performing designated functions in behalf of society. The legislative process, moreover, is a difficult one. It requires thorough knowledge of the particular situation which should be remedied, imaginative ability to devise practical means for remedying the situation, and skill in drafting a rule stating those means which will be understandable to persons charged with administration. Only a society prepared to engage in scientific research, broad social analysis, formulation of intricate policy, prediction of probable acceptance and success, and highly technical drafting can use this instrument of law-making effectively for the solution of more than simple problems.

The events of history reversed the balance of power between the common law and statutory law. With the economic and social complexity that the Industrial Revolution introduced, the common law was often unable to cope. Its concern was with the broken contract and a variety of other kinds of wrong doing. It could not impose affirmative duties in an era of unprecedented expansion which called for planning and organization, and supervision of those processes. The judiciary did not even have the machinery necessary for obtaining the facts, other than those relating to a particular controversy, whereby it might determine desirable policy.

Because many of the judges, furthermore, failed to bring to the bench the ability, experience, sociological outlook, and non-partisan courage needed, the judiciary was frequently unable to reinterpret common-law doctrine to meet new exigencies, even in areas where adaptation to changing conditions was possible. The common law, in fact, had become impotent to grapple with the enormous problems of the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries. It was slow, expensive, and uncertain.

Thus legislation came largely to replace the judicial process as a means for rapid and radical change of law. The legislature has machinery, such as the standing committees, the appointed investigation commission, and the special investigating organizations within the executive branch for securing requisite information. Many types of law-making and many sanctions are available to it which the courts do not possess. Thus it can regulate those areas which it has become convinced should be brought under supervised control. It can engage in social planning of long-term, wide-range policy in fields such as taxation, housing, penology and prison reform, child welfare, co-ordination of production and purchasing power, improvement in the structure and procedures of government, re-organization of the administration of justice. The paramount issues of our time lie within its domain rather than that of the common law.²

FELIX FRANKFURTER, SOME REFLECTIONS ON THE READING OF STATUTES *

47 Colum.L.Rev. 527 (1947).

A single volume of 320 octavo pages contains all the laws passed by Congress during its first five years, when measures were devised for getting the new government under way; 26 acts were passed in the 1789 session, 66 in 1790, 94 in 1791, 38 in 1792, 63 in 1793. For the single session of the 70th Congress, to take a pre-depression period, there are 993 enactments in a monstrous volume of 1014 pages—quarto not octavo—with a comparable range of subject matter. Do you wonder that one for whom the Statutes at Large constitute his staple reading should have sympathy, at least in his moments of bay-ing at the moon, with the touching Congressman who not so long ago proposed a "Commission on Centralization" to report whether "the Government has departed from the concept of the founding fathers" and what steps should be taken "to restore the Government to its original purposes and sphere of activity"? Inevitably the work of the Supreme Court reflects the great shift in the center of gravity of law-making. Broadly speaking, the number of cases disposed of by opinions has not changed from term to term. But even as late as 1875 more than 40% of the controversies before the Court were common-law litigation, fifty years later only 5%, while today cases not resting on statutes are reduced almost to zero. It is therefore accurate to say that courts have ceased to be the primary makers of law in the sense in which they "legislated" the common law. It is certainly true of the Supreme Court that almost every case has a statute at its heart or close to it.

This does not mean that every case before the Court involves questions of statutory construction. If only literary perversity or jaundiced partisanship can sponsor a particular rendering of a statute there is no problem. When we talk of statutory construction we have in mind cases in which there is a fair contest between two readings, neither of which comes without respectable title.

SIR JOHN SALMOND, JURISPRUDENCE

London: 1930. Eighth ed. by Manning. Sweet & Maxwell, Ltd. 178.

So great is the superiority of legislation over all other methods of legal evolution, that the tendency of advancing civilisation is to acknowledge its exclusive claim, and to discard the other instruments as relics of the infancy of law. The expressed will of the state tends to obtain recognition not only as the sole formal source of law, but as its exclusive material source also. Statute law has already become the type or standard, from which the other forms are more or less abnormal variations. Nothing is more natural than this from our modern point of view, nothing less natural from that of primitive jurisprudence. . . .

As it is the most powerful, so it is the latest of the instruments of legal growth.

In considering the advantages of legislation, it will be convenient to contrast it specially with its most formidable rival, namely precedent. So considered, the first virtue of legislation lies in its abrogative power. It is not merely a source of new law, but is equally effective in abolishing that which already exists. But precedent possesses merely constitutive efficacy; it is capable of producing very good law—better in some respects than that which we obtain by way of legislation—but its defect is that, except in a very imperfect and indirect manner, its operation is irreversible. What it does, it does once for all. It cannot go back upon its foot-steps, and do well what it has once done ill. Legislation, therefore, is the indispensable instrument, not indeed of legal growth, but of legal reform. As a destructive and reformatory agent it has no equivalent, and without it all law is as that of the Medes and Persians.

The second respect in which legislation is superior to precedent is that it allows an advantageous division of labour, which here, as elsewhere, results in increased efficiency. The legislature becomes differentiated from the judicature, the duty of the former being to make law, while that of the latter is to interpret and apply it. Speaking generally, a legal system will be best administered, when those who administer it have this as their sole function. Precedent, on the contrary, unites in the same hands the business of making the law and that of enforcing it.

It is true, however, that legislation does not necessarily involve any such division of functions. It is not of the essence of this form of legal development that it should proceed from a distinct department of the state, whose business it is to give laws to the judicature. It is perfectly possible for the law to develop by a process of true legislation, in the absence of any legislative organ other than the courts of justice themselves. . . .

Yet though not theoretically necessary, it is certainly expedient, that at least in its higher forms the function of law-making should be vested in a department of the state superior to and independent of the judicature.

A third advantage of statute-law is that the formal declaration of it is a condition precedent to its application in courts of justice. Case-law, on the contrary, is created and declared in the very act of applying and enforcing it. Legislation satisfies the requirement of natural justice that laws shall be known before they are enforced; but case-law operates retrospectively, being created pro re nata, and applied to facts which are prior in date to the law itself.¹

Fourthly, legislation can by way of anticipation make rules for cases that have not yet arisen, whereas precedent must needs wait until the actual concrete instance comes before the courts for decision. Precedent is dependent on, legislation independent of, the accidental course of litigation. So far as precedent is concerned, a point of law must remain unsettled, until by chance the very case arises. Legislation can fill up a vacancy, or settle a doubt in the legal system, as soon as the existence of this defect is called to the attention of the legislature. Case-law, therefore, is essentially incomplete, uncertain, and unsystematic; while if statute-law shows the same defects, it is only through the lethargy or incapacity of the legislature. As a set-off against this demerit of precedent, it is to be observed that a rule formulated by the judicature in view of the actual case to which it is to be applied is not unlikely to be of better workmanship, and more carefully adapted to the ends to be served by it, than one laid down a priori by the legislature.

Finally, statute-law is greatly superior to case-law in point of form. The product of legislation assumes the form of abstract propositions, but that of precedent is merged in the concrete details of the actual cases to which it owes its origin. Statute-law, therefore is brief, clear, easily accessible and knowable, while case-law is buried from sight and knowledge in the huge and daily growing mass of the records of bygone litigation. Case-law is gold in the mine—a few grains of the precious metal to the ton of useless matter—while statute-law is coin of the realm ready for immediate use. . . .

SIR JAMES O'CONNOR,
THOUGHTS ABOUT THE COMMON LAW

3 Camb.L.J. 161, 163-164 (1928).

. . . In tracing the development of our case law, the sequence is usually this. A fairly simple case comes along, and a general principle is laid down. Upon facts that have something in common with the facts of the leading case, but comprise some new element, an action is brought. The new case is held to be within the leading case or is distinguished from it. The general principle may be either extended or restricted. Sometimes a case is overruled. The body of our Common Law is that which stands without dissent or being overruled. All the time the structure is growing. All the time the judges are, in a sense, making law, drawing of course upon previous decisions when there are any and exercising their common sense upon established lines when there are not. If they consult Roman law they will use it or reject it as seems to them proper. The principles thus established by our judges are as much the law of the land as if they had been enacted at Westminster. . . .

Between our case law—the principles of which, in the nature of things, are more or less stationary—and modern requirements—which are constantly changing—there must always be a gap. This gap it is the function of the Legislature to lessen or close up from time to time. . . .

WILLIAM DRAPER LEWIS, ADAPTATION OF THE LAW TO CHANGING ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

11 A.B.A.Jour. 11 (1925)*

. . . In the United States today there are two processes by which our municipal law is made—the legislative process, and the judicial process. The first gives us our statutory law, the second our common law.

At any one time a better adjustment of municipal law to the needs of progress is to a considerable extent dependent on the degree and extent of the common knowledge of the operation of the machinery by which that law is developed and expressed. In a republic or democracy such knowledge should be widespread. I often wonder at the ignorance concerning a large part of the machinery for developing law in the United States exhibited even by persons actively interested in the improvement of the law. . . .

The American Law Institute, for instance, was founded in 1923 at a notable gathering of members of the legal profession. Its chief object, as announced at the time, is to restate the law with a view to its simplification and clarification. The Restatement will have little to do with the statutory law. The Institute is not a legislature and could not restate the statutory law even if it desired to do so. Yet, as its Director, immediately after its formation, I was in receipt of two or three hundred editorials and many letters from educated laymen commenting with enthusiasm on the prospect of a clarification and simplification of our congressional and state statutes. "Law" to the newspaper editors and my correspondents meant "statutory law" and nothing else. They were, and in spite of my efforts I think still are, entirely oblivious of the fact that a great part of the law is not statutory law, that the law usually designated as "common law" has been developed and is now being expressed and developed by the courts.

There are several reasons for their ignorance. Chief among them is the way in which we are taught as children about the separation in America of the legislative, executive and judicial branches of government; the function of the first being to make, of the second to execute, and of the third to interpret law. This instruction, often repeated, naturally leaves on the mind the impression that the law, which the executive enforces and the court interprets, is a thing which the legislative branch of the government has an exclusive monopoly to manufacture. Indeed, the formula about the separation of the three departments of government, like other half-truths or two-thirds-truths, is responsible, not only for this, but for several other misconceptions concerning our fundamental institutions.

Another reason for the general failure to recognize the part played by the courts in making the law is the way in which a court operates. A case is presented for decision. The question to which the judge addresses his mind is: What, according to the law, should be the judgment? not: What change should I make in the law in order to do justice? The assumption is that there are rules of law which will decide the case and that the judge's task is not to invent these rules, but to seek them out and apply them. Furthermore in one sense the assumption is true. For several centuries after the establishment of the Kings Courts in England, the judges, as they went from shire to shire or sat at Westminster, decided cases mainly in accordance with what they believed to be right and in accord with Norman or English custom. But for several centuries the recorded decisions have been growing more and more numerous; the net result being that today there is a great body of principles and rules based on these decisions called the common law, and it is these principles and rules, hammered out on the anvil of experience, which the judge endeavors to apply to the case before the court.

Yet, in spite of the thousands of recorded decisions, every year many cases arise which are cases of first impressions, cases essentially different from any previously recorded case, and to decide which the judge has to turn to his own felt sense of justice. Again, no matter how frequently a principle of law may be established by prior decisions in analogous cases, if under the particular facts of the case before the court, a manifest injustice would be done by applying the principle, the judge has always the power, and not infrequently the instinct, to apply his own felt sense of justice by announcing an exception to the principle.

Thus the courts make law, but they do so by a totally different process from legislatures.

The judicial process of making law not only exists as a fact but is as necessary as the legislative process, if our municipal law is to reach an approximate adjustment to changing economic conditions.

Indeed, if we are to test the excellence of municipal law by the degree of its approximation to the needs of human progress, even a cursory examination will show that there is much to be said in favor of awarding the prize to the law of the judges rather than to the law of the legislatures. To take only a few instances. Practically our entire law of Contracts is judge-made. Yet from the point of view of its adaptation to the needs of life, it is far better law than our law of crimes which, as it exists today, has been the subject of much statutory enactment. Again, although many doubt the wisdom of the more recent expansion in America of the process of injunction to industrial disputes between large economic groups, taken as a whole perhaps the most perfect part of our law is our system of equitable remedies. This system is wholly judge-made. True there have been notable failures on the part of the courts which have had to be remedied by legislation, as the failure of the judges to adapt the law applicable to the injury of an employee by a fellow employee to modern industrial conditions—a failure which made necessary our Workmen's Compensation Acts. Again, it is probable that our whole law of negligence, which is judge-made law, needs radical revision. But against these whole or partial failures, we may place the steady development of most of our law of torts to meet the new needs of a changing world.

Finally, if we turn to history, we find periods covering the life of a whole generation marked by little or no useful advance in legislation in which the courts developed principles and rules of lasting value. The first thirty years of the nineteenth century did not produce much legislation either of permanent or temporary worth, yet during those years Lord Eldon in the English Court of Chancery probably made more useful private law than any other man of modern times, and John Marshall, as Chief Justice of our Supreme Court, laid down the fundamental principles of our constitutional law. . . .

The doctrine of stare decisis et non quieta movere, "to stand by the decisions and not to disturb settled points," developed during "the infancy of our law." Historians agree that Bracton's Note Book, containing one of the first collections of English decisions, gave early impetus to the doctrine.⁹ Bracton did not understand the modern implications of stare decisis, but he directed the attention of the legal profession to past decisions in "an attempt to bring back the law to its ancient principles."¹⁰ The first comprehensive law reports, the Year Books, not only constituted in and of themselves evidence of the importance of prior decisions,¹¹ but they also contained progressively frequent reference to earlier cases and often a direct statement that certain cases were of some authority, such as the words of Chief Justice Priscot in 1454: "If this plea were now adjudged bad, as you maintain, it would assuredly be a bad example to the young apprentices who study the Year Books, for they would never have confidence in their books if now we were to adjudge the contrary of what has been so often adjudged in the Books."¹²

READ & MACDONALD PUBLISHERS

Sir William Holdsworth has pointed out that the modern theory of stare decisis began to develop at the end of the fifteenth century when the changes in the system of pleading "concentrated the reporter's attention, not upon the oral debate in court as to what the pleading should be and what issue should be reached, but upon the decision of the court upon an issue reached by the written pleadings of the parties before the case had come into court."¹³ In Dyer's and Plowden's Reports prior cases are referred to extensively,¹⁴ and "with Lord Coke the citation of cases reached a height which it has never equalled since."¹⁵ In his great Commentaries, written in 1765, five hundred years after Bracton's Note Book, Blackstone was able to say that "it is an established rule to abide by former precedents, where the same points come again in litigation."¹⁶ The modern doctrine of the authority of decided cases was reached substantially by the end of the eighteenth century.¹⁷

Under the modern doctrine, "a judicial precedent speaks in England with authority."¹⁸ "It is more than a model; it has become a fixed and binding rule."¹⁹ Absolute authority is said to exist in the following cases:

1. Every court is absolutely bound by the decisions of all courts superior to itself, and usually of all courts of coordinate jurisdiction.²⁰

¹³ Holdsworth, op. cit. supra n. 11, at 181.

The period of King's Bench decisions covered by Coke's Reports is 1572-1616. The King's Bench Reports of Croke (1582-1641), Winfield, op. cit. supra n. 9, at 157, the King's Bench Reports of Hobart (1603-1625) and the later Exchequer Reports of Jenkins (1220-1623), Holdsworth, op. cit. supra n. 11, at 182, also contained a wealth of cited precedents. Chief Justice Vaughan, whose Common Pleas Reports cover the period 1665-1674, is credited with aiding substantially in the development of the doctrine. See Bole v. Horton (1670) Vaughan, 360, at 382; Plucknett, op. cit. supra n. 10, at 308.

¹⁹ Goodhart, "Precedent in English and Continental Law" (1934) 50 L.Q.Rev. 40, at 41.

²⁰ Ibid., at 41-2: "A superior Court is never bound by the decisions of the lower Courts, although, if a general practice has developed in these Courts, the superior Court will hesitate to depart from it, nor will it, as a rule, reverse a case which has been generally accepted as a model by the Bar. Nor is one Court of first instance bound by the decision of another Court of similar jurisdiction, although it will pay it great respect." However, with the exception of courts of first instance, a decided case generally binds courts of coordinate jurisdiction. Holdsworth, op. cit. supra n. 11, at 180.

2. The House of Lords is absolutely bound by its own prior decisions.²¹

3. The Court of Appeal is probably bound by its own decisions, although there is some doubt.²²

However, Holdsworth has observed that the theory of precedents has been accepted in England only subject to reservations and conditions which modify its seemingly unyielding effect. The three important reservations and conditions, all of which ultimately rest on the declaratory theory of law, which is "the principle stated by Coke, Hale and Blackstone, that these cases do not make law, but are only the best evidence of what the law is,"²³ are: (1) the rule laid down in a case need not be followed if it is "plainly unreasonable and inconvenient"—that is, if it is obviously contrary to a statute or to well established principle;²⁴ (2) a judge has some freedom of choice in instances where courts of equal authority have handed down conflicting decisions; and (3) the authority of a decision is attached, not to the words used, nor to all the reasons given, but to the principle or principles necessary for the decision of the case.

The American doctrine of stare decisis approximated the English doctrine until the twentieth century and the advent of the socialization of the law, but "the modern and present trend is characterized by the overruling and distinguishing of precedents to an extent that would strike an English judge and lawyer as revolutionary."²⁵ . . .

II

Clearly the first step in determining the extent to which the doctrine of stare decisis should be applied is to decide whether the doctrine is to be applied at all, and the answer to that question has largely been supplied by the history of the development of our legal system. The functional definition of law furnished by the sociological jurists⁴¹ has served to emphasize that the science of law, like the other sciences, is a search for probability rather than a search for certainty. Cardozo has expressed it well: "The more we study law in its making, at least in its present stages of development, the more we gain the sense of a gradual striving toward an end, shaped by a logic which, eschewing the quest for certainty, must be satisfied if its conclusions are rooted in the probable."⁴²

Lacking universal truths to serve as the ultimate source of judgment, a legal system is faced with the alternatives of permitting judges to function arbitrarily and according to individual whim or impulse, or of imposing upon judges from without some objective standard. The decision is not a difficult one. Even the earliest judges, the Homeric kings, unwilling to admit that they were unfettered in their judgments, pointed to divine inspiration as their source of law, and when they were superseded by a juristical aristocracy to whom the knowledge of the laws was confided from generation to generation, a true objective standard was imposed upon the judges—a standard defined by tribal customs.⁴³ Throughout the history of legal systems there is a constant shifting between subjective and objective judging. Anglo law became committed to the objective method when Sir Edward Coke reminded James I that the medieval doctrine of the supremacy of the law took precedence over the divine right of monarchy by quoting to him the words of Bracton: "The King is subject not to men, but to God and the law."⁴⁴ The political philosophy of a government of laws rather than of men was embodied in the Constitution of the United States and became a living doctrine in the decisions of Chief Justice Marshall.⁴⁵ Cardozo recognized that "the destruction of all rules and the substitution in every instance of the individual sense of justice" might result in "a benevolent despotism if the judges were benevolent men" but "it would put an end to the reign of law."⁴⁶ . . .

Application of the physical science method to the law is suggested in Oliphant, "A Return to Stare Decisis" (1928) 14 A.B.A.J. 71, at 76. Oliphant believes that the multiplication of cases is good rather than bad because the science of law must rest on the observation of cases, and the more cases the more accurate the observation.

NOTES

1. See also Allen, "Law in the Making", 3rd Ed., pp. 350-2, for that author's comparison of legislation with precedent.

2. In English jurisprudence, statute law is sometimes called "written" or "enacted" law whereas all other forms are "unwritten" or "unenacted". The former not only declares the law, "but in its very words constitutes the law", whereas the latter is "an exposition of the law and not the law itself". (Pollock, "Jurisprudence", 6th Ed., pp. 233-4). This writer distributes the sources of English law under these two heads as follows (pp. 247-250):

"Enacted"—(1) By original legislative authority. Acts of Parliament.

(2) By delegated legislative authority. Orders-in-Council, By-laws and regulations of local governing bodies and the like.

(3) By customary authority (now of little importance).

"Not Enacted"—(1) Judicial declarations and expositions of law, namely the decisions of the superior courts of justice and the reasons assigned to them.

(2) Non-judicial declarations or expositions, namely 'books of authority' (a limited and exceptional class) and writings not of authority but which help toward the formation of authority."

3. In 1944 the English Court of Appeal in Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co. [1944] K.B. 719 categorically stated that it is absolutely bound by its own previous decisions. However, the decision says there are three exceptions, viz:—

(1) the court is entitled and bound to decide which of two conflicting decisions of its own it will follow;

(2) the court is bound to refuse to follow a decision of its own which, though not expressly overruled, cannot, in its opinion, stand with a decision of the House of Lords;

(3) the court is not bound to follow a decision of its own if it is satisfied that the decision was given per incuriam; e.g. where a statute or a rule having statutory effect which would have affected the decision was not brought to the attention of the earlier court.

Since this case was decided, the court has found it necessary to overwork the exceptions in order to avoid earlier decisions which prima facie appeared clearly to be binding.

Examples: Fisher v. Ruislip-Northwood U.D.C., [1945] K.B. 584 discussed in Note, 62 T.L.R. (1946) at p. 6;

Fitzsimons v. Ford Motor Co. Ltd. [1946] 1 All E.R. 429, discussed in Note, 62 L.Q.R. 313 (1946), at p. 314, as follows: "The present case is one more illustration of how unsatisfactory is the rule in Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co. Ltd. If that rule really provided the certainty it purported to achieve, then there might be some justification for it, even though it made impossible that flexibility that has been one of the advantages of the common law, but what certainty is there when the most recent case may be overruled because it is in conflict with a prior case in the Court of Appeal itself, or is inconsistent with a prior decision of the House of Lords. In the present case, the Court of Appeal has reached a result which is an obviously fair and reasonable one, but . . . it is arguable that a more direct method of overruling a precedent, which had been clearly recognized as inconvenient or unjust, would be both simpler and more in accord with elegantia juris".

4. The Privy Council, which is the final court of appeal for most states in the British Commonwealth outside the United Kingdom rarely, if ever, has expressly refused to follow its own previous decisions, but holds itself entitled so to do. (Technically, the Privy Council is not a court, but an advisory body to the King.) This rule has been re-affirmed in a recent case in which a constitutional question had arisen under the British North America Act, 1867, (Canada's constitution), Attorney-General of Ontario v. Canada Temperance Federation [1946] 2 D.L.R. 1, A.C. 193, 85 Can.S.C.C. 225.

5. The Supreme Court of Canada has adopted for itself a rule slightly less rigid than that followed by the House of Lords. In Stuart v. Bank of Montreal (1900) 41 S.C.R. 516, it was held that "unless in very exceptional circumstances, a previous deliberate and definite decision of this court will be held binding, if it is clear that it was not the result of some mere slip or inadvertence".

MAX RADIN, THE TRAIL OF THE CALF

32 Cornell L.Q. 137, 143 (1946).*

And just as it is not as easy as the words imply to "follow" a precedent, so it is sometimes not so easy as it looks to refuse to follow it, to do what is called "overruling" it. We shall find that in a great many instances when the court says it is "overruling" a decision, it need not have done so at all: They could have "distinguished" it. This process, that of distinguishing, is derived from a technique of interpretation particularly developed in medieval times and applied both to legal and theological texts. I shall deal with it again later. Here I merely wish to say that the English House of Lords which in modern times has rarely in set terms "overruled" a previous decision, has carried the technique of distinguishing to a very high pitch of ingenuity. In many instances, where they have "distinguished" a precedent advanced, many an American court would have bluntly "overruled" it. On the other hand, when a precedent has been overruled in our courts, critics of the overruling decision have often declared that the two cases were perfectly compatible and could easily have been distinguished.

What the House of Lords or other court means by "distinguishing" is that without considering whether they would have decided the previous case in the way the previous court did, they certainly do not approve of the doctrinal generalization which the previous court used. And the American court, when it "overrules" a precedent, equally is not so much concerned with the question of whether the previous case was rightly decided as it is to express its emphatic disagreement with the doctrine or doctrines set forth in the previous case.

They are quite justified in using the term "overruling" because when they do, they are fairly sure that, if they use that word, the case is not likely to be cited again before them. The term "overrule" in practice means just that. It means: "Do not cite this case hereafter in your arguments." For lawyers in citing cases rarely consider the actual case involved but merely use the opinion in order to cull from it such general statements as they think will afford good major premises for their own conclusions. It is just these general statements which the court has decided to reject and their "overruling" enforces this rejection.

NOTE

There is a recent extreme example of the House of Lords' technique of "distinction". In Rainham Chemical Works, Ltd. v. Belvedere Fish Guano Co., Ltd., [1921] 2 A.C. 465, the House of Lords seemingly held that the operation of an explosives plant even in wartime is a non-natural use of land for the purposes of the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher. When a similar case arose in World War II, the Court of Appeal held that the Rainham case had so decided (Read v. Lyons, 61 T.L.R. 154). However, on appeal to the House of Lords (1946 2 All. Eng.Rep. 471) their Lordships held that the Rainham case had not so decided.

KARL N. LLEWELLYN, IMPRESSIONS OF THE CINCINNATI CONFERENCE ON JUDICIAL PRECEDENT

14 U. of Cinc.L.Rev. 343, 350-351 (1940).

(1) Common to all (of the views expressed at the Conference by the judges) are lines of compulsion in the precedents, which to a great extent limit, and which to some extent control their action. And which, to some extent, control them even when their judgment is that the case would better be decided the other way.

(2) But when the urge of justice and policy are clear enough, they can find a distinction to avoid or whittle almost any precedent or line of precedent.

(3) Within limits wide enough to spell success or disaster for a lawyer's case, the precedents are capable of being shaped as they are followed or applied so as to bring judgment out on one side or the other.

(4) But such shaping is not arbitrary. And

(5) Such shaping or its non-occurrence is indeed largely predictable. And

(6) The judges who do the shaping, as they are doing it, feel to a large degree, controlled. They feel that the Rules as They Stand should allow and do allow only one proper answer.

And the trouble for lawyers, and indeed for judges, comes, I submit, from the confusion which now follows:

(7) Feeling controlled, as they apply and shape precedent to the tough and troubling case in hand, the judges attribute the manner and nature of the control to the Rules as They Stand, as if it was those Rules which contained but a single possible and legitimate answer.

(8) Whereas in fact the control is a control over the way in which the judges may properly use those Rules; the actual final control lies not in any rules of law or rules of precedent, but lies instead in a combination of judicial conscience, judicial judgment, and what I can best describe as the net lines of force of the particular field of law, which press judgment in a given direction, and resist any expansion or turning in another direction. A judge, like a lawyer, sizes up the situation in terms of the way The Law sizes it up; there is no rule and no precedent to lay down how to do that—we just do it. We classify the case in terms of the feel of the law. And the feel of the law then proceeds to push judgment in one direction, and proceeds to block judgment off from moving in another technically possible direction. When the feel of The Law and the feel of good sense are at odds, courts may be expected to divide, because their office is, somehow, to combine the two.

ALEXANDER LINCOLN, THE RELATION OF JUDICIAL DECISIONS TO THE LAW.

The commonly accepted view of the law, or the common law, as an abstract ideal, is that it is a complete body, existing from time immemorial, and therefore the same in every jurisdiction except in so far as it is altered by statute. This law is known or discovered by the judges. They interpret the law, and the reports of their decisions are authoritative evidence of it.

This doctrine was proclaimed by Blackstone. It is upheld by Professor Beale, who says in his Summary of the Conflict of Laws: "Wherever, therefore, there is a political society, there must be some complete body of law, which shall cover every event there happening;" and again, "Law once established continues until changed by some competent legislative power." It has been adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Swift v. Tyson [16 Pet. (U.S.) 1], followed by Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Baugh [149 U.S. 368]. In the former case Mr. Justice Story expresses the opinion that:

"In the ordinary use of language it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws. They are, at most, only evidence of what the laws are, and are not of themselves laws. They are often re-examined, reversed, and qualified by the courts themselves, whenever they are found to be either defective or ill-founded, or otherwise incorrect."

As a corollary to this doctrine it follows that judges do not properly, in the exercise of their judicial functions, make new concrete laws. They merely declare the old existing law as an abstract entity. Thus Blackstone says: "The subsequent judges do not pretend to make a new law, but to vindicate the old one from misrepresentation." It also follows as a further corollary that all differences between judicial decisions must be due to some error made by the judges in their interpretation of the law.

This conception of the law is not, however, universally accepted, and I believe many of us cannot escape a feeling of dissatisfaction with its hard and fast conclusions. We are all acquainted with legal problems arising from the new relationships and wider experience which come with advance in civilization and greater complexity in human affairs, where there appears to be no solution which is absolutely and exclusively true, but on the contrary two opposing solutions seem to contain a measure of reason and truth. We are compelled to admit the force of the proposition that a judge confronted with such a problem, since he must decide the case in one way or the other, so far as his decision is an authoritative precedent, does and must make law. Accordingly, Austin, in his Lectures on Jurisprudence, has declared that a law may properly be made judicially, since though the direct purpose of its author is the decision of a specific case, he may and indeed must, so far as his decision serves as a precedent, legislate substantially or in effect.

O. W. HOLMES, JR., THE COMMON LAW.

Boston: 1881. Little, Brown, and Co. 35-37.

. . . In substance the growth of the law is legislative. And this in a deeper sense than that what the courts declare to have always been the law is in fact new. It is legislative in its grounds. The very considerations which judges most rarely mention, and always with an apology, are the secret root from which the law draws all the juices of life. I mean, of course, considerations of what is expedient for the community concerned. Every important principle which is developed by litigation is in fact and at bottom the result of more or less definitely understood views of public policy; most generally, to be sure, under our practice and traditions, the unconscious result of instinctive preferences and inarticulate convictions, but nonetheless traceable to views of public policy in the last analysis. And as the law is administered by able and experienced men, who know too much to sacrifice good sense to a syllogism, it will be found that, when ancient rules maintain themselves in the way that has been and will be shown in this book, new reasons more fitted to the time have been found for them, and that they gradually receive a new content, and at last a new form, from the grounds to which they have been transplanted.

But hitherto this process has been largely unconscious. It is important, on that account, to bring to mind what the actual course of events has been. If it were only to insist on a more conscious recognition of the legislative function of the courts, as just explained, it would be useful, as we shall see more clearly further on.¹

What has been said will explain the failure of all theories which consider the law only from its formal side, whether they attempt to deduce the corpus from a priori postulates, or fall into the humbler error of supposing the science of the law to reside in the elegantia juris, or logical cohesion of part with part. The truth is, that the law is always approaching, and never reaching, consistency. It is forever adopting new principles from life at one end, and it always retains old ones from history at the other, which have not yet been absorbed or sloughed off. It will become entirely consistent only when it ceases to grow. . . .

However much we may codify the law into a series of seemingly self-sufficient propositions, those propositions will be but a phase in a continuous growth. To understand their scope fully, to know how they will be dealt with by judges trained in the past which the law embodies, we must ourselves know something of that past. The history of what the law has been is necessary to the knowledge of what the law is.

Again, the process which I have described has involved the attempt to follow precedents, as well as to give a good reason for them. When we find that in large and important branches of the law the various grounds of policy on which the various rules have been justified are later inventions to account for what are in fact survivals from more primitive times, we have a right to reconsider the popular reasons, and, taking a broader view of the field, to decide anew whether those reasons are satisfactory. They may be, notwithstanding the manner of their appearance. If truth were not often suggested by error, if old implements could not be adjusted to new uses, human progress would be slow. But scrutiny and revision are justified.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO. v. JENSEN

Supreme Court of the United States, 1917.

244 U.S. 205, 37 S.Ct. 524, 61 L.Ed. 1086, L.R.A.1918C, 451, Ann.Cas.1917E, 900.

In error to the Supreme Court, Appellate Division, Third Department, of the State of New York, to review a judgment, affirmed by the Court of Appeals of that state, approving an award of the state Workmen's Compensation Commission to the dependents of a long-shoreman killed on an ocean-going steamship.

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS delivered the opinion of the Court: . . . In New York C. R. Co. v. White (decided March 6th), 243 U.S. 188, 61 L.Ed. 667, 37 S.Ct. 247, we held that statute valid in certain respects; and, considering what was there said, only two of the grounds relied on for reversal now demand special consideration. First. Plaintiff in error, being an interstate common carrier by railroad, is responsible for injuries received by employees while engaged therein under the Federal Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. at L. chap. 149, p. 65, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 8657), and no state statute can impose any other or different liability. Second. As here applied, the Workmen's Compensation Act conflicts with the general maritime law, which constitutes an integral part of the Federal law under art. 3, § 2, of the Constitution, and to that extent is invalid. . . .

Article 3, § 2, of the Constitution, extends the judicial power of the United States "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;" and article 1, § 8, confers upon the Congress power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof." Considering our former opinions, it must now be accepted as settled doctrine that, in consequence of these provisions, Congress has paramount power to fix and determine the maritime law which shall prevail throughout the country. Butler v. Boston & S. S. S. Co., 130 U.S. 527, 32 L.Ed. 1017, 9 S.Ct. 612; Re Garnett, 141 U.S. 1, 14, 35 L.Ed. 631, 634, 11 S.Ct. 840. And further, that, in the absence of some controlling statute, the general maritime law, as accepted by the Federal courts, constitutes part of our national law, applicable to matters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The Lottawanna (Rodd v. Heartt) 21 Wall. 558, 22 L.Ed. 654; Butler v. Boston & S. S. S. Co., 130 U.S. 527, 557, 32 L.Ed. 1017, 1024, 9 S.Ct. 612; Workman v. New York, 179 U.S. 552, 45 L.Ed. 314, 21 S.Ct. 212.

In The Lottawanna, Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, said: "That we have a maritime law of our own, operative throughout the United States, cannot be doubted. The general system of maritime law which was familiar to the lawyers and statesmen of the country when the Constitution was adopted was most certainly intended and referred to when it was declared in that instrument that the judicial power of the United States shall extend 'to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.' . . . One thing, however, is unquestionable; the Constitution must have referred to a system of law coextensive with, and operating uniformly in, the whole country. It certainly could not have been the intention to place the rules and limits of maritime law under the disposal and regulation of the several states, as that would have defeated the uniformity and consistency at which the Constitution aimed on all subjects of a commercial character affecting the intercourse of the states with each other or with foreign states."

By § 9, Judiciary Act of 1789 (1 Stat. at L. 76, 77, chap. 20), the district courts of the United States were given "exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, . . . saving to suitors, in all cases, the right of a common-law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it." And this grant has been continued. Judicial Code, §§ 24 and 256 [36 Stat. at L. 1091, 1160, chap. 231, Comp. Stat. 1916, §§ 991 (1), 1233]. . . . The work of a stevedore, in which the deceased was engaging, is maritime in its nature; his employment was a maritime contract; the injuries which he received were likewise maritime; and the rights and liabilities of the parties in connection therewith were matters clearly within the admiralty jurisdiction.

If New York can subject foreign ships coming into her ports to such obligations as those imposed by her Compensation Statute, other states may do likewise. The necessary consequence would be destruction of the very uniformity in respect to maritime matters which the Constitution was designed to establish; and freedom of navigation between the states and with foreign countries would be seriously hampered and impeded. A far more serious injury would result to commerce than could have been inflicted by the Washington statute authorizing a materialman's lien, condemned in The Roanoke. The legislature exceeded its authority in attempting to extend the statute under consideration to conditions like those here disclosed. So applied, it conflicts with the Constitution and to that extent is invalid.

Exclusive jurisdiction of all civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is vested in the Federal district courts, "saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it." The remedy which the Compensation Statute attempts to give is of a character wholly unknown to the common law, incapable of enforcement by the ordinary processes of any court, and is not saved to suitors from the grant of exclusive jurisdiction. . . .

The judgment of the court below must be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES, dissenting:

The Southern Pacific Company has been held liable under the statutes of New York for an accidental injury happening upon a gang-plank between a pier and the company's vessel, and causing the death of one of its employees. The company not having insured as permitted, the statute may be taken as if it simply imposed a limited but absolute liability in such a case. The short question is whether the power of the state to regulate the liability in that place and to enforce it in the state's own courts is taken away by the conferring of exclusive jurisdiction of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States.

There is no doubt that the saving to suitors of the right of a common-law remedy leaves open the common-law jurisdiction of the state courts, and leaves some power of legislation, at least, to the states. For the latter I need do no more than refer to state pilotage statutes, and to liens created by state laws in aid of maritime contracts. Nearer to the point, it is decided that a statutory remedy for causing death may be enforced by the state courts although the death was due to a collision upon the high seas. . . .

No doubt there sometimes has been an air of benevolent gratuity in the admiralty's attitude about enforcing state laws. But of course there is no gratuity about it. Courts cannot give or withhold at pleasure. If the claim is enforced or recognized it is because the claim is a right, and if a claim depending upon a state statute is enforced, it is because the state had constitutional power to pass the law. Taking it as established that a state has constitutional power to pass laws giving rights and imposing liabilities for acts done upon the high seas when there were no such rights or liabilities before, what is there to hinder its doing so in the case of a maritime tort? Not the existence of an inconsistent law emanating from a superior source, that is, from the United States. There is no such law. The maritime law is not a corpus juris—it is a very limited body of customs and ordinances of the sea. . . .

Now, however, common-law principles have been applied to sustain a libel by a stevedore in personam against the master for personal injuries suffered while loading a ship. Atlantic Transport Co. v. Imbrovek, 234 U.S. 52, 58 L.Ed. 1208, 51 L.R.A., N.S., 1157, 34 S.Ct. 733, and The Osceola, 189 U.S. 158, 175, 47 L.Ed. 760, 764, 23 S.Ct. 483, recognizes that in some cases, at least, seamen may have similar relief. From what source do these new rights come? The earliest case relies upon "the analogies of the municipal law" (The Edith Godden, 23 Fed. 43, 46),—sufficient evidence of the obvious pattern, but inadequate for the specific origin. I recognize without hesitation that judges do and must legislate, but they can do so only interstitially; they are confined from molar to molecular motions. A common-law judge could not say, "I think the doctrine of consideration a bit of historical nonsense and shall not enforce it in my court." No more could a judge, exercising the limited jurisdiction of admiralty, say, "I think well of the common-law rules of master and servant, and propose to introduce them here en bloc." Certainly he could not in that way enlarge the exclusive jurisdiction of the district courts and cut down the power of the states. If admiralty adopts common-law rules without an act of Congress, it cannot extend the maritime law as understood by the Constitution. It must take the rights of the parties from a different authority, just as it does when it enforces a lien created by a state. The only authority available is the common law or statutes of a state. For from the often-repeated statement that there is no common law of the United States (Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Pet. 591, 658, 8 L.Ed. 1055, 1079; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Call Pub. Co., 181 U.S. 92, 101, 45 L.Ed. 765, 770, 21 S.Ct. 561), and from the principles recognized in Atlantic Transport Co. v. Imbrovek having been unknown to the maritime law, the natural inference is that in the silence of Congress, this court has believed the very limited law of the sea to be supplemented here as in England by the common law, and that here that means, by the common law of the state. . . .

The common law is not a brooding omnipresence in the sky, but the articulate voice of some sovereign or quasi sovereign that can be identified; although some decisions with which I have disagreed seem to me to have forgotten the fact. It always is the law of some state, and if the district courts adopt the common law of torts, as they have shown a tendency to do, they thereby assume that a law not of maritime origin, and deriving its authority in that territory only from some particular state of this Union, also governs maritime torts in that territory,—and if the common law, the statute law has at least equal force, as the discussion in The Osceola assumes. . . .

[MR. JUSTICE PITNEY also wrote a dissenting opinion.]

ROSCOE POUND, WHAT OF STARE DECISIS?

10 Fordham L.Rev. 1, 12-13 (1941).

For rules and settled principles which require change, except in a few extreme cases, the orthodox common-law technique looks to legislation to abrogate the old and formulate and establish the new precept. The English courts have been and are firm in adherence to this doctrine. But a few months ago the House of Lords was confronted with the remnants of the fellow servant rule which had not been done away with by Workmen's Compensation laws. Lord Wright put tersely the unanimous view of the Lords of Appeal, saying: "This house cannot usurp the function of the legislature in a matter of this nature." Lord Westbury and Mr. Justice Brandeis, who will certainly rank among the most liberal of common-law judges, have both insisted upon this in clear and vigorous terms, not only as to rules of property, but as to rules governing conduct. . . .

Caution is necessary in introducing new ideas by judicial decision rather than by legislation because in the technique of our law judicial decisions are starting points for legal reasoning. They are developed by analogy for other cases. On the other hand, statutes make rules only for the cases within their purview. Hence when a new proposition comes in by legislation it does not disturb the general legal system, no matter how radically it departs from what went before. But when something radically new comes in by judicial decision, no one can foretell what its disturbing effects may be. It not merely decides the exact state of facts which it served to adjudicate, it is potentially a starting point for analogical reasoning for cases in widely distinct parts of the legal system. That a court has overturned rule A at once puts rules B, C, and D, rules M, and N, and rules P, and Q in question, because all rules at all analogous to A are likely to be challenged on the analogy of rule X which has taken the place of A.

AERO SPARK PLUG CO. v. B. G. CORPORATION

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1942. 130 F.2d 290, 294-299.

FRANK, CIRCUIT JUDGE (concurring). . . . Perhaps the central theme in most discussions of the judicial process is the obligation of judges to consider the future consequences of their specific decisions. Such discussions usually stress the "rule" or precedent aspect of decisions. Thus Dickinson, in 1927, paraphrasing (it may be unconsciously) Aristotle's remarks made almost twenty-two hundred years earlier,⁶ writes, "One danger in the administration of justice is that the necessities of the future and the interest of parties not before the court may be sacrificed in favor of present litigants"; he thinks it imperative that judges should "raise their minds above the immediate case before them and subordinate their feelings and impressions to a practice of intricate abstract reasoning, . . . centering their attention on a mass of considerations which lie outside the color of the case at bar."⁷

Although much can be said for that attitude—of considering a decision primarily with reference to its significance in future cases—it is sometimes given too much weight. Excessive concentration of attention, by some upper court judges, on the formulation in their opinions of so-called legal rules, with an eye chiefly to the impact of those rules on hypothetical future cases not yet before the court, sometimes results in their allotting inadequate attention to the interests of the actual parties in the specific existing cases which it is the duty of courts to decide. Such judges never quite catch up with themselves; for, in cases which actually occur, they are deciding future cases that may never occur. Legal history shows that such an attitude leads to judicial pronouncements which, at times, are none too happy in their effects on future cases. For the future develops unanticipated happenings; moreover, it does not stay put, it refuses to be trapped.

⁶ "Next, laws are made after long consideration, whereas decisions are given at short notice, which makes it hard for those who try the case to satisfy the claims of justice and expediency. The . . . decision of the lawgiver is not particular but prospective and general, whereas members of the [court] find it their duty to decide on definite cases brought before them. They will often have allowed themselves to be so much influenced by feelings of friendship or hatred or self-interest that they lose any clear vision of the truth and have their judgment obscured by considerations of personal pleasure or pain. In general, then, the judge should, we say, be allowed to decide as few things as possible. But questions as to whether something has happened or has not happened, will be or will not be, is or is not, must of necessity be left to the judge, since the lawgiver cannot foresee them." Aristotle, Rhetoric, Bk. 1, Ch. 1, 1354b; cf. Bk. 1, Ch. 2, 1356b, 31-32.

The intended consequences of efforts to govern the future often fail; the actual consequences—which may be good or evil—are frequently, utterly different. Results are miscalculated; there is an “illusion of purpose.”⁸ Of course, present problems will be clarified by reference to future ends, but, as I have elsewhere suggested, such ends, although they have a future bearing, must obtain their significance in present consequences, otherwise those ends lose their significance. For, it is the nature of the future that it never arrives. “Tomorrow today will be yesterday.” Any future, when it becomes the present, is sure to bring new and unexpected problems.⁹ There is much wisdom in Valery’s reference to the “anachronism of the future.”

And the paradox is that when judges become unduly interested in the future consequences of their rulings, they are (as Walter Bingham pointed out years ago) doing precisely what they say they must avoid—they are deciding not real but hypothetical cases, with no one present to speak for the imaginary contestants.¹⁰ The interests of the parties to cases actually before the court are thus sacrificed to the shadowy unvoiced claims of supposititious litigants in future litigation which may never arise; and the judicial process becomes the pursuit of an elusive horizon which is never reached. No one—except perhaps those judges—is satisfied, since the interests of the parties to real present cases are overlooked, and the interests of the parties in subsequent cases are often inadequately determined in their absence. No doubt it expands the ego of a judge to look upon himself as the guardian of the general future. But his more humble yet more important and immediate task is to decide individual, actual, present cases. The exaggerated respect paid today to upper court judges, as distinguished from trial court judges, is both a cause and a result of this overemphasis on the rule-aspect of decisions.¹¹ Such judicial legislation as inheres in formulating legal rules is inescapable.¹² But courts should be modest in their legislative efforts to control the future, since they cannot function democratically, as legislative committees and administrative agencies can, by inviting the views of all who may be affected by their prospective rules. And, because they do not learn those views, and must largely rely on their own imaginations, they should be cautious about attempting, in present cases, to project their formulations too far and too firmly into the days yet to come. To cope with the present is none too easy, in part because the present is only a moving line dividing yesterdays and tomorrows, so that reflections on what will happen are unavoidable elements of current problems. But, although continuity, both backwards and forwards, is to some extent a necessity, judges should not shirk the present aspect of today's problems in favor of too much illusory tinkering with tomorrow's.¹³ The future can become as perniciously tyrannical as the past. Posterity-worship can be as bad as ancestor-worship.¹⁴

Dean Leon Green's tentative analysis of the factors which affect upper court decisions helps to reveal the extent to which the judges of those courts, when deciding cases, often interest themselves in the future at the expense of the present.¹⁵ He refers to (1) the "administrative" factor, (2) the "ethical or moral" factor, (3) the "economic" factor, (4) the "prophylactic or preventive" factor, and (5) the "justice" factor (the "merits" of the particular case). The "administrative" factor, for instance, relates to "the workability" of a rule, its "ease and certainty of performance" in the future. Thus we find courts saying that, if recovery were allowed "in this class of cases, it would naturally result in a flood of litigation in cases where the injury complained of may be easily feigned without detection";¹⁶ or that "in practice it is impossible satisfactorily to administer any other rule";¹⁷ or that a rule "is an arbitrary exception, based upon a notion of what is practicable."¹⁸ The "prophylactic" factor, bred of a desire of judges "to fashion rules for a healthy future," is frequently operative, for "judges are inveterate prophets and legislators"; they "scale their penalties, they impose damages, both punitive and exemplary, not merely for the individual offender's lesson, but as a preventive of future harms"; they "spend much time fashioning prophylactic rules both of substantive and procedural design in their efforts to purify the social stream through the judicial process."¹⁹ Those and similar factors are undeniably important. But it is not always fortunate when judges

¹³ It is noteworthy that in constitutional cases, where there is a peculiar necessity of regarding the interests of those who are not parties to the suits which raise constitutional questions, the Supreme Court has increasingly given less and less weight to stare decisis, recognizing the need for adaptation to changing circumstances. Cf. Graves v. Schmidlapp, March 30, 1942, 62 S.Ct. 870, 86 L.Ed. 1097.

¹⁴ The problem can be restated, in age-old terms, as that of reconciling the need for generality in legal rules and the need for the individualization of—or equitable treatment—of specific cases. Cf. tend first to consider such factors before turning their attention to the parties to the particular actual cases which they are called upon to decide.

The elaborate (and sometimes fatuous) concern with the future potentialities of expressions in judicial opinions, which accompany and justify specific decisions is, in considerable measure, due to uncritical veneration of the doctrine of "standing by the precedents"; for, if an opinion does, in truth, lay down rules which must thereafter be followed by the courts themselves in later cases, the responsibility in deciding existing controversies is far greater than that of being fair to the parties to those controversies, for then a judge is playing the important role of legislator. That responsibility, however, can be too much underscored.

Stare decisis, within limits, has undeniable worth. As we said recently, "Of course, courts should be exceedingly cautious in disturbing (at least retrospectively) precedents in reliance on which men may have importantly changed their positions."²⁰ As I have said elsewhere, "undeniably, in order to achieve impartial administration of justice, 'equality before the law,' and legal certainty, as far as is practicable, it is important, generally, that a court should not deviate, except prospectively, from its own decision in a prior case, even if that decision was in error, especially where such deviation will harm persons who acted in reliance upon that decision—as, for instance, a decision assigning specific legal consequences to specific words in a deed or lease."²¹ But precedent-worship has been so unreflective that there has been insufficient inquiry into its practical workings. There is need to apply to it more of that constructive scepticism voiced by Wigmore twenty-five years ago.²² We have paid too little heed to the way in which John Chipman Gray—a successful practicing lawyer in the field of real property where, above all, precedent has been traditionally sanctified—challenged the fundamental thesis of stare decisis when

United States, 2 Cir., 121 F.2d 192, 204, where we quoted Dicey: "If the Courts were to apply to the decision of substantially the same case one principle today and another tomorrow, men would lose rights they already possessed."

But, as we also there noted, some of the pressure for stare decisis stems from the desire of lawyers to protect their vested interest in their laboriously acquired knowledge of previous judicial rulings. See Wigmore's remarks quoted in the Barnett case, supra, at 1011, and also note 15.

he said that few men, in the conduct of their practical affairs, actually rely on past judicial rulings.²³ Perhaps his scepticism went too far. Yet, in the twenty years which have elapsed since he issued that challenge, few persons have met it, and most lawyers and many judges go on declaiming that life would be unbearably uncertain if courts did not adhere to their earlier formulations of "rules" and "principles." We know virtually nothing of the extent to which men do, in fact, rely on past judicial utterances. If, as is often said, stare decisis is bottomed on something like estoppel, courts should not be too hesitant about changing their previous formulations when change is highly desirable, in the absence of proof of actual reliance by the litigant who opposes such a change. It might be well to hold that such reliance will be presumed but that that presumption is rebuttable. And, in any event, such changes, as Wigmore suggested, can be made prospective, and not retroactive, where there is any likelihood that there was reliance.²⁴ If the sanctity of stare decisis were thus moderately diminished, and if authorities were employed as they were by the much abused scholastics, i. e., only when shown to be reasonable,²⁵ up-

²³ "Practically, in its application to actual affairs, for most of the laity, the law, except for a few crude notions of the equity involved in some of its general principles, is all ex post facto. When a man marries, or enters into a partnership, or engages in any other transaction, he has the vaguest possible idea of the law governing the situation, and with our complicated system of jurisprudence, it is impossible it should be otherwise. If he delayed to make a contract or do an act until he understood exactly all the consequences it involved, the contract would never be made or the act done. Now the law of which a man has no knowledge is the same to him as if it did not exist." Gray, The Nature and Sources of Law (1921) s. 225. Cf. Austin, Jurisprudence, 4th Ed., 674.

Doubtless where lawyers draft instruments, there is reliance on the decisions as interpreted by the lawyers. Our larger institutions probably therefore are often reliers. But the great majority of men seldom consult lawyers before acting. Perhaps, even so, some vague knowledge of what the courts have decided filters through to them, but no one knows how much.

Patterson, who is keenly aware of the relatively small amount of actual reliance, seems, at times, to imply that, nevertheless, the judicial formulations often reflect community attitudes; but that implication appears to be a matter of faith not of proof. But he concludes that "definite rules and precedents have guidance value, if not for laymen, at least for lawyers and judges in the orderly functioning of the law." Constructive Conditions in Contracts, 42 Col.L.Rev. (1942) 903, 954. Is his reference, so far as it relates to lawyers, to their vested interests in their acquired knowledge or to the reliance of clients on their lawyers? And, so far as he refers to judges, does he have in mind what Green calls the "administrative factor"?

²⁴ Wigmore, loc. cit.; cf. Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Sunburst Oil & Refining Co., 287 U.S. 358, 365, 366, 53 S.Ct. 145, 77 L.Ed. 360, 85 A.L.R. 254; People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 P. 187; People v. Ryan, 152 Cal. 364, 92 P. 553; Cardozo, The Nature of The Judicial Process, 146-149.

The new rule could be made applicable, as Wigmore suggests, to cases arising after a given date, or to future cases in which there is no proof of actual reliance on the old rule.

Prospective over-ruling would relieve the courts of the embarrassment which retroactive over-ruling now occasions. For a recent reference to such embarrassment, see dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Jackson in State Tax Comm. of Utah v. Aldrich, April 27, 1942, 316 U.S. 174, 62 S.Ct. 1008, 86 L.Ed. 1353, 139 A.L.R. 1438.

²⁵ "But the common criticism that scholastic problems were solved by reference only to authority is without foundation; a good scholastic was one who could find authority for either side of a question and who was convinced further that truth could be discovered best by examining the interplay of such possible contradictory statements. Authority was only the reason of past thinkers solidified in per court judges might lose some of their prestige, but they could, by reducing their Jovian aloofness, devote more time to the interests of litigants in specific actual cases and less to the possible future harm of "just" decisions of those actual controversies.²⁶

Fortunately, wise judges have devised escapes from improvidently formulated rulings.²⁷ For instance, the courts have recognized the fact that chance circumstances—such as the peculiar interests of the parties to a suit²⁸ or the laziness or incompetence of their lawyers²⁹—may prevent the adequate presentation of all the aspects of a case and thus induce judicial neglect of those aspects, with resultant inadequacy in the judicial generalizations.³⁰ So the Supreme Court has brief statements, and if reason could not be found for it, the opinion could not be held. Authority, as one of the scholastics remarked, has a nose of wax: it may be turned in any direction whatsoever unless it is fortified by reason." 1 McKeon, Selections from Medieval Philosophers (1929), General Introduction, XV. Roger Bacon said that one of the "four chief hindrances to the understanding of truth" is "the example of frail and unsuited authority."

It is of interest that Hobbes's criticism of the uncritical use of authorities, including Aristotle, on the ground that "the praise of ancient authors proceeds not from the reference of the dead, but from the competition and mutual envy of the living," is a sort of echo of Aristotle himself. See Hobbes, Leviathan (1651) 395; Aristotle, Rhetoric, Bk. 2, Ch. 10, 1388b, 4-10.

I confess that, at one time, I voiced the conventional comments on scholastic thinking.

Of course the selection of the relevant "facts" of a case is not a simple process, especially where the evidence is conflicting. The choice of a pertinent legal rule may affect the selection of the "facts," and vice versa. The inter-action of those two choices may be highly complicated. And the process may not always be 100% conscious; intuition often plays an important role. Perkins v. Endicott Johnson Corp., 2 Cir., 128 F.2d 208, 220 and note 46.

In this connection, it is tempting, but unsound, to classify judges as those who are stimulated primarily by rules—i. e., the general aspects of cases—and those who are activated primarily by particulars. Such a classification recalls Maurois' description of the differences between Gladstone and Disraeli: "Gladstone liked to choose an abstract principle and from that to deduce his preferences. Disraeli had a horror of abstract principles. He liked certain ideas because they appealed to his imagination. He left to action the care of putting them to the test. When Disraeli changed his views, he admitted the change and was ready to appear changeable; Gladstone fastened his constancy to blades of straw and thought they were planks. . . . Disraeli, the doctrinaire, prided himself on being an opportunist; Gladstone, the opportunist, prided himself on being a doctrinaire." Whether such clear-cut differences between those two men actually existed may be doubted. But assuming that they did, it might be said that every judge is in part a Gladstone and in part a Disraeli. The percentage of those components seems to vary from judge to judge—and even in a particular judge from time to time.

²⁷ Permitting arguments to be made by "friends of the court" is one device often helpful in preventing such improvident rulings.

²⁹ Cf. Quong Wing v. Kirkendall, 223 U.S. 59, 64, 32 S.Ct. 192, 56 L.Ed. 350; In re Barnett, 2 Cir., 124 F.2d 1005, 1006.

³⁰ Macaulay stated the conventional attitude when he said "that a tribunal will decide a judicial question most fairly when it has heard two able men argue, as unfairly as possible, on the two opposite sides of it. . . . Sometimes, it is true, superior eloquence and dexterity will make the worse appear the better reason; but it is at least certain that the judge will be compelled to contemplate the case wisely said, "Questions which merely lurk in the record, neither brought to the attention of the court nor ruled upon are not to be considered as having been so decided as to constitute precedents."³¹

But, no matter what is done, the problem of deciding cases so that decisions will not be hurtful, as precedents, to future litigants is not too easy of solution. . . .

B. Law Making by Refusal to Follow Persuasive Precedent

LITTLE v. CHICAGO, ST. P., M. & O. RY. CO.

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1896. 65 Minn. 48, 67 N.W. 846, 60 Am.St.Rep. 421.

MITCHELL, J. This action was brought to recover damages for injuries to real estate situated in Wisconsin, caused by the negligence of the defendant. The question presented is, can the courts of this state take cognizance of actions to recover damages to real estate lying without the state; in other words, is such an action local or transitory in its nature? The history of the progress of the English common law respecting the locality of actions will aid in determining how this question ought to be decided on principle. Originally, all actions were local. This arose out of the constitution of the old jury, who were but witnesses to prove or disprove the allegations of the parties, and hence every case had to be tried by a jury of the vicinage, who were presumed to have personal knowledge of the parties as well as of the facts. But, as circumstances and conditions changed, the courts modified the rule in fact, although not in form. For that purpose they invented a fiction by which a party was permitted to allege, under a videlicet, that the place where the contract was made or the transaction occurred was in any county in England. The courts took upon themselves to determine when this fictitious averment should and when it should not be traversable. They would hold it not traversable for the purpose of defeating an action it was invented to sustain, but always traversable for the purpose of contesting a jurisdiction not intended to be protected by the fiction. Those actions in which it was held not traversable came to be known as transitory, and those in which it was held traversable as local, actions. Actions for personal torts, wherever committed, and upon under two different aspects. It is certain that no important consideration will altogether escape note." Essay on History (1828).

Undoubtedly, the usual two-sided contentious mode of court procedure does often help to bring out most of the points. In re Barnett, supra, 124 F.2d at page 1011. But, for the reasons noted above, in the text, that is not what invariably happens in law suits.

Moreover, there are sometimes more than "two different aspects" of a case. As Demogue suggests, the "duellistic" nature of litigation may create a false dualistic attitude towards the facts or the pertinent legal rules. Demogue, loc. cit., 397, 505. Cf. Green, loc. cit. 27 note 2, 197, 198.

contracts (including those respecting lands), wherever executed, were deemed transitory, and might be brought wherever the defendant could be found. As respects actions for injuries to real property, we cannot discover that it was definitely settled in England to which class they belonged prior to the American Revolution. As late as 1774, in the leading case of Mostyn v. Fabrigas, 1 Cowp. 161, 2 Smith, Lead.Cas.Eq. 916, Lord Mansfield, who did more than any other jurist to brush away those mere technicalities which had so long obstructed the course of justice, referred to two cases in which he had held that actions would lie in England for injuries to real estate situated abroad. In that same case he said: "Can it be doubted that actions may be maintained here, not only upon contracts, which follow the persons, but for injuries done by subject to subject, where the whole that is prayed is a reparation in damages or satisfaction to be made by process against the person or his effects within the jurisdiction of the court." While all that is there said as to actions for injuries to real property is obiter, yet it clearly indicates the views of that great jurist on the subject. And we cannot discover that it was fully settled in England that actions for injuries to lands were local until the decision of Doulson v. Matthews, 4 Term R. 503, in 1792,—16 years after the declaration of American independence. The courts of England seem to have finally settled down upon the rule that an action is transitory where the transaction on which it is founded might have taken place anywhere; but is local when the transaction is necessarily local,—that is, could only have happened in a particular place. As an injury to land can only be committed where the land lies, it followed that, according to this test, actions for such injuries were held to be local. As the distinction between local and transitory venues was abolished by the judicature act of 1873, we infer that actions for injuries to lands lying abroad may now be maintained in England. It is somewhat surprising that the American courts have generally given more weight to the English decisions on the subject rendered after the Revolution than to those rendered before, and hence have almost universally held that actions for injuries to lands are local. In the leading case of Livingston v. Jefferson, 1 Brock. 203, Fed.Cas. No.8,411, which has done more than any other to mold the law on the subject in this country, Chief Justice Marshall argued against the rule, showing that it was merely technical, founded on no sound principle, and often defeated justice; but concluded that it was so thoroughly established by authority that he was not at liberty to disregard it. But so unsatisfactory and unreasonable is the rule that since that time it has, in a number of states, been changed by statute, and in others the courts have frequently evaded it by meta-physical distinctions in order to prevent a miscarriage of justice. Chief Justice Marshall's own state of Virginia changed the rule by statute as early as 1819. Some courts have made a subtle distinction between faults of omission and of commission. Thus in Titus v. Inhabitants of Frankfort, 15 Me. 89, which was an action against a town for damages sustained by reason of defects in a highway, it was held that, while highways must be local, the neglect of the defendant to do its duty, being a mere nonfeasance, was transitory. It has also been held that where trespass upon land is followed by the asportation of timber severed from the land, if the plaintiff waives the original trespass, and sues simply for the conversion of the property so carried away, the action would become transitory. Telegraph Co. v. Middleton, 80 N.Y. 408; Whidden v. Seelye, 40 Me. 247. Again, it has been sometimes held that an action for injuries to real estate is transitory where the gravamen of the action is negligence,—as for negligently setting fire to the plaintiff's premises. Home Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 11 Hun, 182; Barney v. Burstenbinder, 7 Lans. 210. In Ohio the rule has been repudiated, at least as to causes of action arising within the state, as being wholly unsuited to their condition, because under their judicial system it would result in many cases in a total denial of justice. Genin v. Grier, 10 Ohio, 209. Almost every court or judge who has ever discussed the question has criticised or condemned the rule as technical, wrong on principle, and often resulting in a total denial of justice, and yet have considered themselves bound to adhere to it under the doctrine of stare decisis. An action for damages for injuries to real property is on principle just as transitory in its nature as one on contract or for a tort committed on the person or personal property. The reparation is purely personal, and for damages. Such an action is purely personal, and in no sense real.

Every argument founded on practical considerations against entertaining jurisdiction of actions for injuries to lands lying in another state could be urged as to actions on contracts executed, or for personal torts committed, out of the state, at least where the subject-matter of the transaction is not within the state. Take, for example, personal actions on contracts respecting lands which are conceded to be transitory. An investigation of title, of boundaries, etc., may be desirable, and often would be essential to the determination of the case, yet such considerations have never been held to render the actions local. Another serious objection to the rule is that under it a party may have a clear, legal right without a remedy where the wrongdoer cannot be found, and has no property, within the state where the land is situated. As suggested by plaintiff's counsel, if the rule be adhered to, all that the one who commits an injury to land, whether negligently or willfully, has to do in order to escape liability, is to depart from the state where the tort was committed, and refrain from returning. In such case the owner of the land is absolutely remediless. We recognize the respect due to judicial precedents, and the authority of the doctrine of stare decisis; but, inasmuch as this rule is in no sense a rule of property, and as it is purely technical, wrong in principle, and in practice often results in a total denial of justice, and has been so generally criticised by eminent jurists, we do not feel bound to adhere to it, notwithstanding the great array of judicial decisions in its favor. If the courts of England, generations ago, were at liberty to invent a fiction in order to change the ancient rule that all actions were local, and then fix their own limitations to the application of the fiction, we cannot see why the courts of the present day should deem themselves slavishly bound by those limitations.

It is suggested that the statutes of this state, in conformity to the old rule, make actions for injuries to real property local. Gen.St. 1894, §§ 5182, 5183. This is true, and, strangely enough, in 1885, the legislature went so far as to provide that, if the county designated in the complaint is not the proper one, the court should have no jurisdiction of the action. But this statute has no application to causes of action arising out of the state. While it settles the rule, and indicates the policy of this state as to actions for injuries to real property within the state, we do not think it ought to have any weight in determining what the rule should be as to causes of action arising out of the state, which can have no local venue here under the provisions of the statute. It does not appear whether the plaintiff lives in this state or in Wisconsin, but this is immaterial, for the place of his residence cannot affect the nature of the action. It is also true that in this particular case jurisdiction of the defendant could be obtained in Wisconsin, but this fact is likewise immaterial, and for the same reason. Order reversed.

BUCK, J. I dissent. The doctrine laid down in the foregoing opinion is conceded to be against the great weight of judicial authority, and, according to my view, is unsound in principle, and contrary to a wise public policy. . . . I prefer that the rule should be that for injuries to real property the jurisdiction of our courts should only be co-extensive with its territorial sovereignty. This doctrine, which is so strongly imbedded in the common law and judicial authorities of the country, is further adhered to by our own statute, which provides that actions for injuries to real property shall be brought in the county where the subject of the action is situated, and prohibits the court from having jurisdiction if brought in any other county. Gen.St.1894, § 5183. Thus we have a legislative recognition of the doctrine that actions for injuries to real estate are local. If there is any implication arising from legislative enactments as to the jurisdiction of courts to try actions for injury to real estate elsewhere, it would be against the contention of the plaintiff. The statute makes no distinction between trespass to lands within and without the state. It does not make the action for trespass to lands outside the state transitory. There is no warrant in the language of the constitution or statute which justifies the majority opinion, and, if sound, it must rest upon some other foundation than is to be found in the letter of the law. It is a rule which is more favorable to the plaintiff than the defendant. The former can select his own forum; the latter is helpless. No change of venue can be granted, because none is authorized. . . .

C. Law Making in the United States by Over-Ruling Precedent

ERIE RAILROAD CO. v. TOMPKINS

304 U.S. 64, 58 S.Ct. 817, 82 L.Ed. 1188, 114 A.L.R. 1487.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question for decision is whether the oft-challenged doctrine of *Swift v. Tyson*¹ shall now be disapproved.

Tompkins, a citizen of Pennsylvania, was injured on a dark night by a passing freight train of the Erie Railroad Company while walking along its right of way at Hughestown in that state. He claimed that the accident occurred through negligence in the operation, or maintenance, of the train; that he was rightfully on the premises as licensee because on a commonly used beaten footpath which ran for a short distance alongside the tracks; and that he was struck by something which looked like a door projecting from one of the moving cars. To enforce that claim he brought an action in the federal court for Southern New York, which had jurisdiction because the company is a corporation of that state. It denied liability; and the case was tried by a jury.

The Erie insisted that its duty to Tompkins was no greater than that owed to a trespasser. It contended, among other things, that its duty to Tompkins, and hence its liability, should be determined in accordance with the Pennsylvania law; that under the law of Pennsylvania, as declared by its highest court, persons who use pathways along the railroad right of way—that is, a longitudinal pathway as distinguished from a crossing—are to be deemed trespassers; and that the railroad is not liable for injuries to undiscovered trespassers resulting from its negligence, unless it be wanton or willful. Tompkins denied that any such rule had been established by the decisions of the Pennsylvania courts; and contended that, since there was no statute of the state on the subject, the railroad's duty and liability is to be determined in federal courts as a matter of general law.

The trial judge refused to rule that the applicable law precluded recovery. The jury brought in a verdict of $30,000; and the judgment entered thereon was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, which held (2 Cir., 90 F.2d 603, 604), that it was unnecessary to consider whether the law of Pennsylvania was as contended, because the question was one not of local, but of general, law, and that "upon questions of general law the federal courts are free, in absence of a local statute, to exercise their independent judgment as to what the law is; and it is well settled that the question of the responsibility of a railroad for injuries caused by its servants is one of general law. . . . Where the public has made open and notorious use of a railroad right of way for a long period of time and without objection, the company owes to persons on such permissive pathway a duty of care in the operation of its trains. . . . It is likewise generally recognized law that a jury may find that negligence exists toward a pedestrian using a permissive path on the railroad right of way if he is hit by some object projecting from the side of the train."

The Erie had contended that application of the Pennsylvania rule was required, among other things, by section 34 of the Federal Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789, c. 20, 28 U.S.C. § 725, 28 U.S.C.A. § 725, which provides: "The laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."

Because of the importance of the question whether the federal court was free to disregard the alleged rule of the Pennsylvania common law, we granted certiorari. 302 U.S. 671, 58 S.Ct. 50, 82 L.Ed. 518.

First. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1, 18, 10 L.Ed. 865, held that federal courts exercising jurisdiction on the ground of diversity of citizenship need not, in matters of general jurisprudence, apply the unwritten law of the state as declared by its highest court; that they are free to exercise an independent judgment as to what the common law of the state is—or should be; and that, as there stated by Mr. Justice Story, "the true interpretation of the 34th section limited its application to state laws, strictly local, that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state, and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intra-territorial in their nature and character. It never has been supposed by us, that the section did apply, or was designed to apply, to questions of a more general nature, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation, as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial law, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves, that is, to ascertain, upon general reasoning and legal analogies, what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case."

The Court in applying the rule of section 34 to equity cases, in Mason v. United States, 260 U.S. 545, 559, 43 S.Ct. 200, 204, 67 L.Ed. 396, said: "The statute, however, is merely declarative of the rule which would exist in the absence of the statute."² The federal courts assumed, in the broad field of "general law," the power to declare rules of decision which Congress was confessedly without power to enact as statutes. Doubt was repeatedly expressed as to the correctness of the construction given section 34,³ and as to the soundness of the rule which it introduced.⁴ But it was the more recent research of a competent scholar, who examined the original document, which established that the construction given to it by the Court was erroneous; and that the purpose of the section was merely to make certain that, in all matters except those in which some federal law is controlling, the federal courts exercising jurisdiction in diversity of citizenship cases would apply as their rules of decision the law of the state, unwritten as well as written.⁵

Criticism of the doctrine became widespread after the decision of Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab & Transfer Co., 276 U.S. 518, 48 S.Ct. 404, 72 L.Ed. 681, 57 A.L.R. 426.⁶ There, Brown & Yellow, a Kentucky corporation owned by Kentuckians, and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, also a Ken-

Barney's Lessee*, 5 Pet. 457, 464, 8 L.Ed. 190, it was stated that section 34 "has been uniformly held to be no more than a declaration of what the law would have been without it: to wit, that the lex loci must be the governing rule of private right, under whatever jurisdiction private right comes to be examined." tucky corporation, wished that the former should have the exclusive privilege of soliciting passenger and baggage transportation at the Bowling Green, Ky., railroad station; and that the Black & White, a competing Kentucky corporation, should be prevented from interfering with that privilege. Knowing that such a contract would be void under the common law of Kentucky, it was arranged that the Brown & Yellow reincorporate under the law of Tennessee, and that the contract with the railroad should be executed there. The suit was then brought by the Tennessee corporation in the federal court for Western Kentucky to enjoin competition by the Black & White; an injunction issued by the District Court was sustained by the Court of Appeals; and this Court, citing many decisions in which the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson had been applied, affirmed the decree.

Second. Experience in applying the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson, had revealed its defects, political and social; and the benefits expected to flow from the rule did not accrue. Persistence of state courts in their own opinions on questions of common law prevented uniformity;⁷ and the impossibility of discovering a satisfactory line of demarcation between the province of general law and that of local law developed a new well of uncertainties.⁸

On the other hand, the mischievous results of the doctrine had become apparent. Diversity of citizenship jurisdiction was conferred in order to prevent apprehended discrimination in state courts against those not citizens of the state. Swift v. Tyson introduced grave discrimination by noncitizens against citizens. It made rights enjoyed under the unwritten "general law" vary according to whether enforcement was sought in the state or in the federal court; and the privilege of selecting the court in which the right should be determined was conferred upon the noncitizen.⁹ Thus, the doctrine rendered impossible equal protection of the law. In attempting to promote uniformity of law throughout the United States, the doctrine had prevented uniformity in the administration of the law of the state.

⁷ Compare Mr. Justice Miller in Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175, 209, 17 L.Ed. 520. The conflicts listed in Holt, The Concurrent Jurisdiction of the Federal and State Courts (1888) 160 et seq. cover twenty-eight pages. See, also, Frankfurter, supra note 6, at 524-530; Dawson, supra note 6; Note, Aftermath of the Supreme Court's Stop, Look and Listen Rule (1930) 43 Harv.L.Rev. 926; cf. Yntema and Jaffin, Preliminary Analysis of Concurrent Jurisdiction (1931) 79 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 889, 881-886. Moreover, as pointed out by Judge Augustus N. Hand in Cole v. Pennsylvania R. Co., D.C., 43 F.2d 953, 956, 957, 71 A.L.R. 1096, decisions of this Court on common-law questions are less likely than formerly to promote uniformity.

The discrimination resulting became in practice far-reaching. This resulted in part from the broad province accorded to the so-called "general law" as to which federal courts exercised an independent judgment.¹⁰ In addition to questions of purely commercial law, "general law" was held to include the obligations under contracts entered into and to be performed within the state, the extent to which a carrier operating within a state may stipulate for exemption from liability for his own negligence or that of his employee; the liability for torts committed within the state upon persons resident or property located there, even where the question of liability depended upon the scope of a property right conferred by the state; and the right to exemplary or punitive damages. Furthermore, state decisions construing local deeds, mineral conveyances, and even devises of real estate, were disregarded.

In part the discrimination resulted from the wide range of persons held entitled to avail themselves of the federal rule by resort to the diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. Through this jurisdiction individual citizens willing to remove from their own state and become citizens of another might avail themselves of the federal rule. And, without even change of residence, a corporate citizen of the state could avail itself of the federal rule by reincorporating under the laws of another state, as was done in the Taxicab Case.

The injustice and confusion incident to the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson have been repeatedly urged as reasons for abolishing or limiting diversity of citizenship jurisdiction.²⁰ Other legislative relief has been proposed.²¹ If only a question of statutory construction were involved, we should not be prepared to abandon a doctrine so widely applied throughout nearly a century.²² But the unconstitutionality of the course pursued has now been made clear, and compels us to do so.

²² The doctrine has not been without defenders. [Citing articles from legal periodicals. Ed.]

Third. Except in matters governed by the Federal Constitution or by acts of Congress, the law to be applied in any case is the law of the state. And whether the law of the state shall be declared by its Legislature in a statute or by its highest court in a decision is not a matter of federal concern. There is no federal general common law. Congress has no power to declare substantive rules of common law applicable in a state whether they be local in their nature or "general," be they commercial law or a part of the law of torts. And no clause in the Constitution purports to confer such a power upon the federal courts. As stated by Mr. Justice Field when protesting in Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U.S. 368, 401, 13 S.Ct. 914, 927, 37 L.Ed. 772, against ignoring the Ohio common law of fellow-servant liability: I am aware that what has been termed the general law of the country—which is often little less than what the judge advancing the doctrine thinks at the time should be the general law on a particular subject—has been often advanced in judicial opinions of this court to control a conflicting law of a state. I admit that learned judges have fallen into the habit of repeating this doctrine as a convenient mode of brushing aside the law of a state in conflict with their views. And I confess that, moved and governed by the authority of the great names of those judges, I have, myself, in many instances; unhesitatingly and confidently, but I think now erroneously, repeated the same doctrine. But, notwithstanding the great names which may be cited in favor of the doctrine, and notwithstanding the frequency with which the doctrine has been reiterated, there stands, as a perpetual protest against its repetition, the constitution of the United States, which recognizes and preserves the autonomy and independence of the states,—independence in their legislative and independence in their judicial departments. Supervision over either the legislative or the judicial action of the states is in no case permissible except as to matters by the constitution specifically authorized or delegated to the United States. Any interference with either, except as thus permitted, is an invasion of the authority of the state, and, to that extent, a denial of its independence."

The fallacy underlying the rule declared in Swift v. Tyson is made clear by Mr. Justice Holmes.²³ The doctrine rests upon the assumption that there is "a transcendental body of law outside of any particular State but obligatory within it unless and until changed by statute," that federal courts have the power to use their judgment as to what the rules of common law are; and that in the federal courts "the parties are entitled to an independent judgment on matters of general law":

"But law in the sense in which courts speak of it today does not exist without some definite authority behind it. The common law so far as it is enforced in a State whether called common law or not, is not the common law generally but the law of that State existing by the authority of that State without regard to what it may have been in England or anywhere else. . . .

"The authority and only authority is the State, and if that be so, the voice adopted by the State as its own [whether it be of its Legislature or of its Supreme Court] should utter the last word."

Thus the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson is, as Mr. Justice Holmes said, "an unconstitutional assumption of powers by the Courts of the United States which no lapse of time or respectable array of opinion should make us hesitate to correct." In disapproving that doctrine we do not hold unconstitutional section 34 of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789 or any other act of Congress. We merely declare that in applying the doctrine this Court and the lower courts have invaded rights which in our opinion are reserved by the Constitution to the several states.

Fourth. The defendant contended that by the common law of Pennsylvania as declared by its highest court in Falchetti v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 307 Pa. 203, 160 A. 859, the only duty owed to the plaintiff was to refrain from willful or wanton injury. The plaintiff denied that such is the Pennsylvania law. In support of their respective contentions the parties discussed and cited many decisions of the Supreme Court of the state. The Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the question of liability is one of general law; and on that ground declined to decide the issue of state law. As we hold this was error, the judgment is reversed and the case remanded to it for further proceedings in conformity with our opinion.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE CARDOZO took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

MR. JUSTICE BUTLER (dissenting). . . .

The opinion just announced states that: "The question for decision is whether the oft-challenged doctrine of Swift v. Tyson [1842, 16 Pet. 1, 10 L.Ed. 865] shall now be disapproved."

That case involved the construction of the Judiciary Act of 1789, § 34, 28 U.S.C.A. § 725: "The laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." Expressing the view of all the members of the Court, Mr. Justice Story said (16 Pet. 1, at page 18, 10 L.Ed. 865): "In the ordinary use of language, it will hardly be contended, that the decisions of courts constitute laws. They are, at most, only evidence of what the laws are, and are not, of themselves, laws. They are often reexamined, reversed, and qualified by courts themselves, whenever they are found to be either defective, or ill-founded, or otherwise incorrect. The laws of a state are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long-established local customs having the force of laws. In all the various cases, which have hitherto come before us for decision, this court have uniformly supposed, that the true interpretation of the 34th section limited its application to state laws strictly local, that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state, and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character. It never has been supposed by us, that the section did apply, or was designed to apply, to questions of a more general nature, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation, as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial law, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves, that is, to ascertain, upon general reasoning and legal analogies, what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case. And we have not now the slightest difficulty in holding, that this section, upon its true intendment and construction, is strictly limited to local statutes and local usages of the character before stated, and does not extend to contracts and other instruments of a commercial nature, the true interpretation and effect whereof are to be sought, not in the decisions of the local tribunals, but in the general principles and doctrines of commercial jurisprudence. Undoubtedly, the decisions of the local tribunals upon such subjects are entitled to, and will receive, the most deliberate attention and respect of this court; but they cannot furnish positive rules or conclusive authority, by which our own judgments are to be bound up and governed." (Italics added.)

The doctrine of that case has been followed by this Court in an unbroken line of decisions. So far as appears, it was not questioned until more than 50 years later, and then by a single judge.¹ Baltimore & O. Railroad Co. v. Baugh, 149 U.S. 368, 390, 13 S.Ct. 914, 37 L. Ed. 772. In that case, Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the Court, truly said (149 U.S. 368, at page 373, 13 S.Ct. 914, 916, 37 L.Ed. 772): "Whatever differences of opinion may have been expressed have not been on the question whether a matter of general law should be settled by the independent judgment of this court, rather than through an adherence to the decisions of the state courts, but upon the other question, whether a given matter is one of local or of general law."

And since that decision, the division of opinion in this Court has been of the same character as it was before. In 1910, Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for himself and two other Justices, dissented from the holding that a court of the United States was bound to exercise its own independent judgment in the construction of a conveyance made before the state courts had rendered an authoritative decision as to its meaning and effect. Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co., 215 U.S. 349, 30 S.Ct. 140, 54 L.Ed. 228. But that dissent accepted (215 U.S. 349, at page 371, 30 S.Ct. 140, 54 L.Ed. 228) as "settled" the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson, and insisted (215 U.S. 349, at page 372, 30 S.Ct. 140, 54 L.Ed. 228) merely that the case under consideration was by nature and necessity peculiarly local.

No more unqualified application of the doctrine can be found than in decisions of this Court speaking through Mr. Justice Holmes. United Zinc Co. v. Britt, 258 U.S. 268, 42 S.Ct. 299, 66 L.Ed. 615, 36 A.L.R. 28; Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Goodman, 275 U.S. 66, 70, 48 S.Ct. 24, 25, 72 L.Ed. 167, 56 A.L.R. 645. Without in the slightest departing from that doctrine, but implicitly applying it, the strictness of the rule laid down in the Goodman Case was somewhat ameliorated by Pokora v. Wabash Ry. Co., 292 U.S. 98, 54 S.Ct. 580, 78 L.Ed. 1149, 91 A.L.R. 1049.

Whenever possible, consistently with standards sustained by reason and authority constituting the general law, this Court has followed applicable decisions of state courts. . . . Unquestionably, the determination of the issues of negligence and contributory negligence upon which decision of this case depends are questions of general law. . . .

While amendments to section 34 have from time to time been suggested, the section stands as originally enacted. Evidently Congress has intended throughout the years that the rule of decision as construed should continue to govern federal courts in trials at common law. The opinion just announced suggests that Mr. Warren's research has established that from the beginning this Court has erroneously construed section 34. But that author's "New Light on the History of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789" does not purport to be authoritative, and was intended to be no more than suggestive. The weight to be given to his discovery has never been discussed at this bar. Nor does the opinion indicate the ground disclosed by the research. In his dissenting opinion in the Taxicab Case, Mr. Justice Holmes referred to Mr. Warren's work, but failed to persuade the Court that "laws" as used in section 34 included varying and possibly ill-considered rulings by the courts of a state on questions of common law. See, e. g., Swift v. Tyson, supra, 16 Pet. 1, 16, 17, 10 L.Ed. 865. It well may be that, if the Court should now call for argument of counsel on the basis of Mr. Warren's research, it would adhere to the construction it has always put upon section 34. Indeed, the opinion in this case so indicates. For it declares: "If only a question of statutory construction were involved, we should not be prepared to abandon a doctrine so widely applied throughout nearly a century. But the unconstitutionality of the course pursued has now been made clear and compels us to do so." This means that, so far as concerns the rule of decision now condemned, the Judiciary Act of 1789, passed to establish judicial courts to exert the judicial power of the United States, and especially section 34 of that act as construed, is unconstitutional; that federal courts are now bound to follow decisions of the courts of the state in which the controversies arise; and that Congress is powerless otherwise to ordain. It is hard to foresee the consequences of the radical change so made. Our opinion in the Taxicab Case cites numerous decisions of this Court which serve in part to indicate the field from which it is now intended forever to bar the federal courts. It extends to all matters of contracts and torts not positively governed by state enactments. Counsel searching for precedent and reasoning to disclose common-law principles on which to guide clients and conduct litigation are by this decision told that as to all of these questions the decisions of this Court and other federal courts are no longer anywhere authoritative.

This Court has often emphasized its reluctance to consider constitutional questions and that legislation will not be held invalid as repugnant to the fundamental law if the case may be decided upon any other ground. In view of grave consequences liable to result from erroneous exertion of its power to set aside legislation, the Court should move cautiously, seek assistance of counsel, act only after ample deliberation, show that the question is before the Court, that its decision cannot be avoided by construction of the statute assailed or otherwise, indicate precisely the principle or provision of the Constitution held to have been transgressed, and fully disclose the reasons and authorities found to warrant the conclusion of invalidity. These safeguards against the improvident use of the great power to invalidate legislation are so well-grounded and familiar that statement of reasons or citation of authority to support them is no longer necessary. . . .

So far as appears, no litigant has ever challenged the power of Congress to establish the rule as construed. It has so long endured that its destruction now without appropriate deliberation cannot be justified. There is nothing in the opinion to suggest that consideration of any constitutional question is necessary to a decision of the case. By way of reasoning, it contains nothing that requires the conclusion reached. Admittedly, there is no authority to support that conclusion. Against the protest of those joining in this opinion, the Court declines to assign the case for reargument. It may not justly be assumed that the labor and argument of counsel for the parties would not disclose the right conclusion and aid the Court in the statement of reasons to support it. Indeed, it would have been appropriate to give Congress opportunity to be heard before divesting it of power to prescribe rules of decision to be followed in the courts of the United States. See Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 176, 47 S.Ct. 21, 45, 71 L.Ed. 160.

The course pursued by the Court in this case is repugnant to the Act of Congress of August 24, 1937, 50 Stat. 751, 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 17 and note, 349a, 380a and note, 401. It declares that: "Whenever the constitutionality of any Act of Congress affecting the public interest is drawn in question in any court of the United States in any suit or proceeding to which the United States, or any agency thereof, or any officer or employee thereof, as such officer or employee, is not a party, the court having jurisdiction of the suit or proceeding shall certify such fact to the Attorney General. In any such case the court shall permit the United States to intervene and become a party for presentation of evidence (if evidence is otherwise receivable in such suit or proceeding) and argument upon the question of the constitutionality of such Act. In any such suit or proceeding the United States shall, subject to the applicable provisions of law, have all the rights of a party and the liabilities of a party as to court costs to the extent necessary for a proper presentation of the facts and law relating to the constitutionality of such Act." Section 1, 28 U.S.C.A. § 401. That provision extends to this Court. Section 5, 28 U.S.C.A. § 380a note. If defendant had applied for and obtained the writ of certiorari upon the claim that, as now held, Congress has no power to prescribe the rule of decision, section 34 as construed, it would have been the duty of this Court to issue the prescribed certificate to the Attorney General in order that the United States might intervene and be heard on the constitutional question. Within the purpose of the statute and its true intent and meaning, the constitutionality of that measure has been "drawn in question." Congress intended to give the United States the right to be heard in every case involving constitutionality of an act affecting the public interest. In view of the rule that, in the absence of challenge of constitutionality, statutes will not here be invalidated on that ground, the Act of August 24, 1937 extends to cases where constitutionality is first "drawn in question" by the Court. No extraordinary or unusual action by the Court after submission of the cause should be permitted to frustrate the wholesome purpose of that act. The duty it imposes ought here to be willingly assumed. If it were doubtful whether this case is within the scope of the act, the Court should give the United States opportunity to intervene and, if so advised, to present argument on the constitutional question, for undoubtedly it is one of great public importance. That would be to construe the act according to its meaning.

The Court's opinion in its first sentence defines the question to be whether the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson shall now be disapproved; it recites (third page, 58 S.Ct. 819) that Congress is without power to prescribe rules of decision that have been followed by federal courts as a result of the construction of section 34 in Swift v. Tyson and since; after discussion, it declares (seventh page, 58 S.Ct. 822) that "the unconstitutionality of the course pursued [meaning the rule of decision resulting from that construction] . . . compels" abandonment of the doctrine so long applied; and then near the end of the last page, 58 S.Ct. 823, the Court states that it does not hold section 34 unconstitutional, but merely that, in applying the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson construing it, this Court and the lower courts have invaded rights which are reserved by the Constitution to the several states. But, plainly through the form of words employed, the substance of the decision appears; it strikes down as unconstitutional section 34 as construed by our decisions; it divests the Congress of power to prescribe rules to be followed by federal courts when deciding questions of general law. In that broad field it compels this and the lower federal courts to follow decisions of the courts of a particular state.

I am of opinion that the constitutional validity of the rule need not be considered, because under the law, as found by the courts of Pennsylvania and generally throughout the country, it is plain that the evidence required a finding that plaintiff was guilty of negligence that contributed to cause his injuries, and that the judgment below should be reversed upon that ground.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS, concurs in this opinion.

MR. JUSTICE REED (concurring in part).

I concur in the conclusion reached in this case, in the disapproval of the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson, and in the reasoning of the majority opinion, except in so far as it relies upon the unconstitutionality of the "course pursued" by the federal courts. . . .

NOTES

1. The principal case wiped out a large segment of the law on federal jurisdiction, and has been the subject of innumerable articles. One very good discussion is Clark, "State Law in the Federal Courts. The Brooding Omnipresence of Erie v. Tompkins," 55 Yale L.J. 267 (1946). Cf. Reasons given for over-ruling in the principal case with those in Girouard v. United States, infra, p. 1088.

2. In Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U.S. 106 at pp. 119-122, 60 S.Ct. 444, at pp. 451-453, 84 L.Ed. 604, 125 A.L.R. 1368 (1940), Frankfurter, J., said: "We recognize that stare decisis embodies an important social policy. It represents an element of continuity in law, and is rooted in the psychologic need to satisfy reasonable expectations. But stare decisis is a principle of policy and not a mechanical formula of adherence to the latest decision, however recent and questionable, when such adherence involves collision with a prior doctrine more embracing in its scope, intrinsically sounder, and verified by experience. . . .

"This court, unlike the House of Lords (but the rule is otherwise in the Privy Council), has from the beginning rejected a doctrine of disability of self-correction."

JOSEPH C. HUTCHESON, JR., CINCINNATI CONFERENCE ON THE STATUS OF THE RULE OF JUDICIAL PRECEDENT

14 U. of Cinc.L.Rev. 203, 248-249 (1940).

I think the probable source of the only danger we have to fear from the court today, is the thing that finally killed Swift v. Tyson. The too complete acceptance of Gray's notion that judges don't find the law like they do the eggs on Easter Day, that they make it like the legislatures do, against Blackstone's and Carter's, that they find it. When you have that notion in mind very strongly and everybody lets you talk out in meeting and say, decisions are in reality legislation, a great many judges want to be legislating and not just judging. The doctrine of precedent relaxes too much and whirl tends to become king. Of course every decision is legislative in its grounds if it marks out a new way. But, if this idea is run into the ground and you get to a place where you have the power to legislate, administer and adjudicate at the same time, and all from the same bench, like Br'er Fox said to Br'er Rabbit, "You is getting to be a mighty big man—too big!"

But, my considered opinion is that after the zeal for being precedent makers has found vent for a while and has either dissipated itself or has worked itself out because the precedent makers have boxed the compass on the theories of the law—everything will settle down again in peace and quiet! I have been a judge myself for twenty-one years, but I never did have a crack at making a precedent anybody had to obey. I have been District Judge,—Circuit Judge,—but always there have been some fellows above me, and I really can't speak with authority. But, if you will read the history of the Supreme Court I believe you will find that the biggest bunch of precedent busters, and therefore precedent makers, will in good time turn out to be the biggest bunch of precedent followers. And you are going to have as hard a time getting them to abandon some precedent they have made, in favor of some rule of right that you see, as people have always had in the past history of the Court with precedent makers before them.

I would, I think, like to see a little of the civilian notion come into our doctrine of precedent, especially in constitutional common law. I believe that the doctrine which says that a course of decisions is necessary for a precedent, is probably a better one than ours is with its every decision a precedent. I know it is a better doctrine than the English one, as Sir John Salmond states it, "We don't look to a decision as an evidence of law, it is the law." Well, a good many decisions I have written, I have been not so pleased with later as binding precedents, and I am a good, average scrub judge, and if that is the situation with me it is perhaps the situation with a good many others.

Erie v. Tompkins doesn't bother me much, both because I know the true doctrine of precedent and because legislation has touched and changed most of the common law. Nearly everything coming up to us has had some legislation affecting it. Our court has always been trained and well disposed to follow the state courts, if we can find them. Just after Erie came down, I had some fun with my colleagues on the Texas Supreme Court. I said to them: "I don't mind following you, but my trouble is that half the time I don't know where to find you, and how in the hell can I follow you if I can't find you."

ROYAL A. STONE, THE WANING JUSTIFICATION FOR CONSIDERATION AS THE SOLE TEST OF CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATION

Delivered before Hennepin County Bar Ass'n, (Minu.) Oct. 10, 1933.

. . . . It is not for the people to deny their needs or retard their development to keep within traditional concepts of law. It is rather for the law to keep abreast of the ever growing needs and the ever widening concepts of the people. If it does not, so much the worse for both law and people. In proportion as law is wanting in adaptability to the accomplished facts of healthful evolution, both it and its practitioners will deserve to, and will, lose caste.

Now for an issue of every day occurrence, and of very practical present importance, the conventional legal solution of which is nothing less than nonsensical from the lay viewpoint or any other. B owes A $1,000. It is economically wise and important for both that the debt be discharged for $500 in cash. The parties so agree and so attempt to proceed. B sells securities, for which some banker friend got him to pay $1,000 or even more, for $500 in money. He pays that sum to A who gives him a written release. Both consider the matter settled, the whole debt discharged. But A happens to tell a lawyer about it. The latter volunteers the information that he can collect the balance because there was no consideration for his release on the unpaid moiety. A is sufficiently hard pressed and sufficiently dishonest to sue B for the remaining $500. Under our present law, he must recover. Dunnell, Sec. 39.

The result is absurd. Its utter injustice thwarts the dominant, lawful and plainly expressed purpose of the parties. The result comes from an impractical attenuation of the doctrine of consideration. A could have made B an executed gift of any corporeal chattel. Why not also a gift of half B's debt to him? But that evasive means of escape aside, does not the transaction and its absurd result suggest strongly that we are carrying too far the traditional notion that consideration must remain the exclusive test of contractual obligation?

A's intent to be bound appearing clearly from the written memorial of the transaction, why should we inquire further? Neither a seal, nor any additional flourish that could be called consideration, could make plainer the actual intention of the parties.

The utter nonsense of the whole thing becomes still more glaring when we consider that if, instead of cash, B had given his promissory note for the $500, with one or more worthless sureties, taking the same release as before, there would have been an enforceable compromise, because, whereas B was bound to pay the whole $1,000, he was not bound to give a negotiable note, with sureties, for any sum. Mason v. Campbell, 27 Minn. 54, 6 N.W. 405. Hence the note, even though valueless in fact, is considered by the law a valuable consideration, sufficient to uphold the contract of release, although the payment of $500 in good cash could have had no such effect.

RYE v. PHILLIPS

ROYAL A. STONE, JUSTICE. Action by indorsee, not a holder in due course, upon a promissory note. The complaint avers certain indorsements of payment which indicate that the statute of limitations had not run. The answer tendered judgment for an admitted balance, but interposed a defense as to the amount over and above that sum. The defense was wiped out as matter of law by the direction of a verdict for plaintiff for the full amount claimed. Defendant appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. There has been some argument for defendant about the statute of limitations. That defense is out of the case on the pleadings. From the complaint it did not appear that the statute had run. If defendant wished any advantage of the affirmative defense of the statute, he should have said so by demurrer or answer. Schmitt v. Hager, 88 Minn. 413, 93 N.W. 110; see Board of County Commissioners v. Miller, 101 Minn. 294, 112 N.W. 276; Dunnell, Minn.Dig. (2 Ed. & Supp.) § 5661. On top of all that is defendant's formal admission by answer of liability for a concededly unpaid balance of the debt.

2. We come now to the important point. The answer sets up a defense in the nature of a release or an accord and satisfaction (executed in part at least) in these words:

"That in the early part of the year 1930, one Kooima, referred to in the complaint herein, held and owned the note described in the said complaint; at that time the plaintiff was the owner of a Chevrolet car, . . . and the defendant then was hopelessly insolvent and unable to pay his debts or obligations, all of which the plaintiff and Kooima then well knew. The plaintiff at that time approached the defendant and Kooima and offered to purchase said note from Kooima by turning over said car, valued at $250 and no more. As a part of said transaction and as consideration for same defendant agreed to turn over to plaintiff livestock or produce of the value of $250, or some livestock and the balance in cash, and to pay the car license on said plaintiff's car that he was then and there trading to Kooima. In pursuance of said agreements, carried out, defendant turned over to plaintiff livestock and cash aggregating the amount admitted as paid in the complaint, and additionally paid the said car license fee to the plaintiff; all of which was a compromise and settlement of all liability on the part of the defendant on said note referred to in the complaint herein."

On the ground that the answer failed to plead a defense, plaintiff objected to the introduction of any evidence. The objection was sustained, and plaintiff's motion for directed verdict granted upon the ground that "a mere promise of a creditor to receive, and of the debtor to pay, a sum less than the debt in full satisfaction of it, is without consideration, and binds neither party." Dunnell, Minn.Dig. (2 Ed. & Supp.) § 39; Trunkey v. Crosby, 33 Minn. 464, 23 N.W. 846.

The doctrine thus invoked is one of the relics of antique law which should have been discarded long ago. It is evidence of the former capacity of lawyers and judges to make the requirement of consideration an overworked shibboleth rather than a logical and just standard of actionability.

In Oien v. St. Paul City Ry. Co., 198 Minn. 363, 373, 270 N.W. 1, we made such observations concerning it that the bar should have been advised thereby that we were ready to label the proposition as a museum piece of the law and shelve it accordingly. As Mr. Dunnell suggests, Minn.Dig. (2 Ed.) 1932 Supp. § 39, the doctrine may have sprouted from "a mistake in reporting," in Pinnel's Case, 5 Co.Rep. 117, in 1602. It is characterized as "an artificial and groundless rule which has been consistently condemned." Allen, Law in the Making (Oxford, 1930) 189. Its true status is accurately stated in Selected Readings on the Law of Contracts (MacMillan, 1931) 325, as follows: "And the rule is commonly thought to be a corollary of the doctrine of consideration. But this is a total misconception. The rule is older than the doctrine of consideration and is simply the survival of a bit of formal logic of the mediaeval lawyers." The law has been changed by statute in at least ten of our states. Id. 328. But, being a judge made rule, no vested rights depending on it, judges are just as competent to get rid of it as the legislature.

There is more than one ground of logic and good law upon which this old and indefensible rule may be discarded. There is no reason why a person should be prevented from making an executed gift of incorporeal as well as corporeal property. Why should a receipt in full for the entire debt not be taken in a proper case as sufficient evidence of an executed gift of the unpaid portion of the debt? Again, where there is proof, or on adequate evidence a finding, that a completed legal act such as a waiver has set a matter at rest, why is it necessary to search for any consideration?

The modern view is that a new promise to pay a debt barred by the statute of limitations or discharged in bankruptcy is binding without consideration. I Restatement, Contracts, §§ 86, 87. In that field at least, judges have recognized the futility of their former efforts to create a synthetic consideration where there was no actual consideration.

What has just been said may appear mere dictum, but judicial frankness justifies it to the end that both bar and public may be advised of our attitude.

3. We have no hesitation in saying that, while perhaps it might have been pleaded more clearly, the paragraph of the answer above quoted pleads a defense. It avers a new contract, not alone between plaintiff and defendant, but between both of them and Kooima, the payee of the note. Furthermore, it shows that the agreement was executed. The new tripartite contract pleaded had plenty of consideration. Kooima got an automobile instead of cash for his note. Plaintiff got the note. Insofar as defendant agreed to turn over livestock and pay the license tax he assumed new obligations which were not his as maker of the note. Hence, it is immaterial whether the obligation substituted by the new contract for the old one under the note would or would not be the latter's equivalent in money value.

For these reasons it was reversible error to exclude defendant's offered evidence in support of his defense and to direct a verdict for plaintiff.

Order reversed.

PATTRIDGE v. PALMER

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1937. 201 Minn. 387, 277 N.W. 18.

ROYAL A. STONE, JUSTICE. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment, adverse to him in so far as it denies him recovery for two-thirds of his claim.

Plaintiff sued on a $2,000 note dated December 1, 1924, executed in Los Angeles, Cal., and payable to the estate of Otis L. Pattridge, one year after date at Tracy, Minn. When the note was given, the estate of Otis L. Pattridge was in the probate court of Lyon county, in which Tracy is located. Plaintiff, the son, and his mother, the widow, were the heirs of Otis L. Pattridge, deceased. They were citizens and residents of Minnesota at the date of the note. Plaintiff ever since has continued resident in this state. His mother so continued until her death. During the same period, defendant has been a resident of California. October 5, 1925, before the note matured, the probate court assigned a one-third interest in the note to plaintiff and two-thirds to his mother, who died December 24, 1929. Her estate was probated, and, August 8, 1930, the probate court assigned her two-thirds interest in the note to plaintiff, who thereby became its sole owner.

Defendant claims that the cause of action on the note arose in California and that, as to the two-thirds interest which plaintiff acquired from his mother, his action is barred by the statute of limitations of California (section 337, Code of Civil Procedure of California), and cannot be maintained because of Mason's Minn.St.1927, § 9201, which provides: "When a cause of action has arisen outside of this state, and, by the laws of the place where it arose, an action thereon is there barred by lapse of time, no such action shall be maintained in this state unless the plaintiff be a citizen of the state who has owned the cause of action ever since it accrued."

The cited California statute provides that an action upon an obligation in writing must be commenced within 4 years. In the stipulated facts it is agreed that, if the cause of action here involved arose and accrued in California, the same arose and accrued on December 2, 1925, and by the law of California the statute of limitations of that state commenced to run on that date.

Plaintiff contends that the cause of action did not arise in California but in Minnesota, and therefore does not come within the provisions of Mason's Minn.St.1927, § 9201. The court below gave judgment in favor of plaintiff for one-third of the face of the note, together with interest, costs, and disbursements, amounting in all to $868.10. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The decision below is correct under the rule of Luce v. Clarke, 49 Minn. 356, 361, 51 N.W. 1162, 1163. See, also, Powers Mercantile Co. v. Blethen, 91 Minn. 339, 97 N.W. 1056; Drake v. Bigelow, 93 Minn. 112, 100 N.W. 664. That rule resulted from a construction of our statute (section 9201) as intending "to recognize the effect of the limitation laws of any other state whenever a cause of action has come under the operation of such laws, and been barred by them." The reasoning in support of that conclusion is this: "All statutes of limitation, in prescribing the periods, have reference for the beginning of such periods to the time when the opportunity to commence the action arises. And so there never was a statute of limitations for the purpose of which, in the case we have supposed, the cause of action would be deemed to have arisen as the debt fell due in the state where the debt was made payable, there being then in that state neither creditor to sue nor debtor to be sued; nor for the purpose of which it would be deemed then to have arisen in the state of the creditor's residence, there being no debtor there to be sued."

If the question were now to be decided by logic alone and the inquiry confined to an abstract consideration of the nature and essentials of a cause of action, a contrary result might well be reached. But for now over 50 years the statute, section 9201, as construed in Luce v. Clarke, supra, has been our law and we prefer not to change it.

Putting aside pure theory in the interest of realism, there is much to be said for the reasoning of Mr. Justice Gilfillan in Luce v. Clarke, supra. While no cause of action arises until the necessary breach or default of the obligor, it is not true that when that default occurs the result in respect to remedy is confined in territorial operation to the jurisdiction where it occurs. The result there may remain in the realm of theory, for no opportunity may ever come for enforcement there of the cause of action by suit thereon.

In this case defendant's default occurred December 1, 1925, in Minnesota, and the cause of action accrued or originated here. But did it also not arise (even though it did not originate) simultaneously in California? Certainly so, for defendant could have been sued instantly and successfully in that state. So a cause of action against defendant had "arisen" in California for the purpose of action and limitation of action. If, then, because of defendant's continuous residence there during the necessary period, that cause of action is barred in California, we are not prepared to say that the reasoning of our earlier decisions; that under section 9201 the action is also barred here, is so bad after all.

It is one of those numerous problems concerning which there is, and long has been, a division of judicial opinion. On which side the weight lies, we do not determine. See notes, 4 L.R.A.,N.S., 1029; 14 L.R.A., N.S., 776; 17 R.C.L. 691. But, inasmuch as so long ago this court had to and did take a position on one side of the fence, we simply decline now to jump over to the other side.

Another thought which occurs to us is that the statute of limitations is a measure of repose. We lessen substantially its intended effect if, upon the ground indicated, we overrule our earlier decisions. That idea has special application to this case where defendant, maker of the note, was a resident of California at the time it was signed and has remained such ever since, at all times being within reach of the process of the courts of that state.

"A judicial construction of a statute becomes a part of it, and as to rights which accrue afterwards it should be adhered to for the protection of those rights. To divest them by a change of the construction is to legislate retroactively." 2 Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 485, following, inter alia, Fairfield v. County of Gallatin, 100 U.S. 47, 25 L.Ed. 544.

That rule has its ordinary application where a change of the judicial construction of a statute would operate adversely on vested rights. There are none such here, but the fact remains that, were we to overrule Luce v. Clarke, supra, and adopt the rule which the court there refused to adopt, we would as a practical matter be amending a statute which has stood with its present effect for over 50 years, with no thought on the part of the Legislature that it should be changed. We would be removing the bar and reinstating the remedy as to causes of action, the number and character of which nobody can now estimate. That observation shows that, whatever the criticism of Luce v. Clarke, supra, its error, if any, is on the side of enhancing the repose intended by a statute of repose. It did not have the injurious import of Fitzgerald v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co., 29 Minn. 336, 13 N.W. 168, 43 Am. Rep. 212, overruled by Rosse v. St. Paul & D. Ry. Co., 68 Minn. 216, 71 N.W. 20, 37 L.R.A. 591, 64 Am.St.Rep. 472.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

PETERSON, JUSTICE (dissenting). . . . A cause of action cannot be said to arise, under the statute (section 9201), at more than one place. The distinction between the place where a cause of action arises and the debtor's domicile is erased, as it must be, to reach the decision in this case. Both statute and decision law recognize the distinction. Thus in the Restatement, Conflict of Laws, § 604, comment b, it is said: "Statutes frequently provide that an action may not be maintained if it has been barred by the statute of limitations at the place where the action accrued, or, in some cases, at the domicile of the defendant."

Riser v. Snoddy, 7 Ind. 442, 65 Am.Dec. 740, considers a statute which provided that the bar should be that of the state of the debtor's domicile. Under our statute, the bar is that of the place where the cause of action arises. By holding that the cause of action arises at the debtor's domicile instead of at the place where it arises as a matter of law, the statute has been amended by judicially legislating to substitute the court's notion of what the law is or should be for the Legislature's express provision. We should not forget that we are construing a statute which by its implications restrains the process of construction. It is plain that the statute contemplates that the cause of action arises in one place. Therefore it is useless to talk about the possibility of a cause of action arising in more than one place because the statute allows to be asserted here the bar "of the place where it [the cause of action] arose." It does not provide for admitting the bar of the places where the debtor might have been or resided. See 3 Beale, Conflict of Laws, § 604.2, p. 1622.

3. The doctrine of stare decisis does not compel adherence to Luce v. Clarke, supra, and other cases which have followed it. The rule of that case is not only erroneous as a legal proposition, as the court admits, but it is unjust to our citizens in that they are deprived, by our decision law, of the right to assert their claims as against citizens of California under section 9201, while citizens of California are accorded the privilege by the decision law of that state of asserting their claims against the citizens of our and other states. See McKee v. Dodd, 152 Cal. 637, 93 P. 854, 14 L.R.A.,N.S., 780, 125 Am.St.Rep. 82. Of course no one will deny that the rule of stare decisis is a wholesome one and should not be minimized. In State v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 106 Minn. 303, at page 335, 119 N.W. 202, 210, we held that hasty and crude decisions "ought to be examined without fear, and revised without reluctance," and that even a series of decisions is not always conclusive of what is the law. In 7 R.C.L. 1008, § 35, the rule is thus stated: "But the strong respect for precedent which is ingrained in our legal system is a reasonable respect which balks at the perpetuation of error, and it is the manifest policy of our courts to hold the doctrine of stare decisis subordinate to legal reason and justice, and to depart therefrom when such departure is necessary to avoid the perpetuation of pernicious error."

Nor do I think we should be frightened by our apprehensions. Mr. Justice Cardozo minimizes them. He says that the "picture of the bewildered litigant lured into a course of action by the false light of a decision, only to meet ruin when the light is extinguished and the decision overruled, is for the most part a figment of excited brains," and that "the only rules there is ever any thought of changing are those that are invoked by injustice after the event to shelter and intrench itself." He observes that only "in the rarest instances, if ever, would conduct have been different if the rule had been known and the change foreseen." Cardozo, The Growth of the Law, p. 122. . . .

The decision below should be reversed.

EPSTEIN v. GLUCKIN

Court of Appeals of New York, 1922. 233 N.Y. 400, 135 N.E. 861.

CARDOZO, J. One Rose Gluckin made a contract to sell a house and lot in Brooklyn to Weinstein and Joblin. The price, $12,550, was to be paid partly in cash and partly by the execution of a purchase-money bond and mortgage, payable in semiannual installments within a period of three years. The vendees assigned to the plaintiff their interest in the contract and in the land therein described. A suit for specific performance followed the vendor's refusal to convey. The Special Term gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The Appellate Division reversed on the ground that specific performance will not be granted at the suit of an assignee, unless the assignment of the contract is coupled with an assumption of its burdens. The result has been thought to be a deduction from cases which have conditioned relief in equity upon mutuality of remedy. We think the deduction must be rejected as unsound.

The assignee of such a contract succeeds by force of the assignment to the position of the original vendee as "the equitable owner" of the subject of the sale. Lenman v. Jones, 222 U.S. 51, 54, 32 S.Ct. 18, 56 L.Ed. 89; cf. Elterman v. Hyman, 192 N.Y. 113, 119, 120, 84 N.E. 937, 127 Am.St.Rep. 862, 15 Ann.Cas. 819. Equity, while recognizing his right, will not leave him powerless to vindicate it, by withholding the equitable remedies without which the right is ineffective. The anomaly is not presented of a trust which equity establishes, but refuses to enforce. Assignee and assignor alike, upon fulfillment of the agreed conditions, may have the aid of the court in converting the equitable right into a legal estate. For this, the precedents are ample. [Citing cases.] In such an exercise of jurisdiction, there is no risk of hardship or injustice to the vendor. The assignee, by the very act of invoking the aid of equity, assumes the duty of performance, and subjects himself to any conditions of the judgment appropriate thereto. [Citing cases.] At first the vendor had the obligation of the vendees, and of no one else. The obligation thus imposed has not been lost, but another has been added. Some one has at all times been charged with the duty of performance. The continuity of remedy is unbroken from contract to decree.

We hold, then, that specific performance was available to assignee as to assignor. Nothing to the contrary was intended by our decisions in Wadick v. Mace, 191 N.Y. 1, 83 N.E. 571, and Levin v. Dietz, 194

N.Y. 376, 87 N.E. 454, 20 L.R.A.,N.S., 251. Later cases have made it clear that the decisions there made will be closely confined, and not extended by analogy. If there ever was a rule that mutuality of remedy existing, not merely at the time of the decree, but at the time of the formation of the contract, is a condition of equitable relief, it has been so qualified by exceptions that, viewed as a precept of general validity, it has ceased to be a rule to-day. [Citing cases.] Stone, The Mutuality Rule in New York, 16 Columbia Law Review, 443; 3 Williston, Contracts, §§ 1433, 1436, 1440, and cases there cited. What equity exacts to-day as a condition of relief is the assurance that the decree, if rendered, will operate without injustice or oppression either to plaintiff or to defendant. Williston, supra; Stone, supra; Ames, Lectures on Legal History, p. 370; Lewis, Want of Mutuality in Specific Performance, 40 Am.Law Reg. (N.S.) 270, 382, 447, 507, 559; 42 Am.Law Reg. (N.S.) 591. Mutuality of remedy is important in so far only as its presence is essential to the attainment of that end. The formula had its origin in an attempt to fit the equitable remedy to the needs of equal justice. We may not suffer it to petrify at the cost of its animating principle.

The order of the Appellate Division should be reversed.

HERBERT R. BAER AND GEORGE T. WASHINGTON, LAWYERS, TAXES AND THE SUPREME COURT

25 Cornell L.Q. 537-541, 546-547, 549-555 (1940).

RICHEY: . . . If I find a decision of the United States Supreme Court saying that white is white, and I tell my client to act accordingly, I get mighty sore when the Supreme Court turns around and says that white is black,² and my client is liable. It may be progress, but it looks like bad law to me.

MASON: Give me a concrete example. From where I sit, it looks as if the new Court has been handing down some pretty good law.

RICHEY: All right. I'm a tax man: I make my living telling people what the tax law is. I've got to know the law. I've got to set up trusts, advise about tax-free reorganizations, and so on. But nowadays I look up the cases—and I just can't rely on them. I don't know what to tell my clients.³

[Footnote 1 is omitted. Ed.]

² "In this Court dissents have gradually become majority opinions . . .," said Mr. Justice Frankfurter in his concurring opinion in Graves v. New York ex rel. O'Keefe, 306 U.S. 466, 491, 59 S.Ct. 595, 83 L.Ed. 927, 120 A.L.R. 1406 (1939). This process has been referred to as the ". . . judicial miracle of the loaves and fishes, four becoming five," by Judge William Clark of the Third Circuit in Rothensies v. Cassell, 103 F.2d 834, 837 (C.C.A.Pa.1939).

³ Mr. Richey would undoubtedly obtain the friendly ear of Mr. Justice Roberts who said in his dissent in Higgins v. Smith, 308 U.S. 473, 487, 60 S.Ct. 355, 84 L.Ed. 406 (1940): "I am of the opinion that the courts should not disappoint the well-

MASON: You mean you can't tell whether a certain deal is taxable or not?

RICHEY: That's the trouble. I'm pretty sure most of them are going to be taxable. A client tells me he's about to put through a deal—says he doesn't want to pay a tax. I look up the law, I find a Supreme Court case in 1930 telling me that if the deal is put through in a certain way it will be nontaxable. And then I have a terrible feeling that that case isn't going to be followed any more. I tell my client I can't be sure the deal is tax-free. Then he goes to some other tax man, or he drops the deal. I don't get much of a fee when that happens. It's terrible for business—my business and the client's business. And that's not the worst of it. I'm worried about some of the things I set up in the good old days. I used to feel like the Rock of Gibraltar—I'd look up the law, and find a set-up that was tax-free. Then I'd put it through, and everybody was happy. But now they're coming along and taxing the very deals that the United States Supreme Court once said were not taxable—getting the very people that paid me good money for sound advice!

MASON: I'm afraid I don't know much tax law. You mean that a trust set up in 1930, and tax-free in 1930, is being taxed in 1940?

RICHEY: Let me explain. Take a simple case. It used to be the law that a man could set up a trust for his children or for his wife, transferring all his interest in the property to the trustee, but creating a possibility of reverter, so that he could get the property back in case they died before he did. In the old days before the Court Fight that was considered a complete gift at the time it was made, and if he died before his wife or children the property was not subject to a tax.⁴

MASON: You're speaking of the federal estate tax, I suppose?

RICHEY: Yes. The Court was saying that the death of the old man passed nothing to the children, and hence there was no transfer that could be taxed. His death simply extinguished a possibility of reverter. But I should explain that there would be a tax if the father gave the property to the children for their life, retaining a remainder interest in case the children predeceased him, but on the understand-founded expectation of citizens that, until Congress speaks to the contrary, they may, with confidence, rely upon the uniform judicial interpretation of a statute. The action taken in this case seems to me to make it impossible for a citizen safely to conduct his affairs in reliance upon any settled body of court decisions." . . .

⁴ Richey undoubtedly has reference to Helvering v. St. Louis Union Trust Co., 296 U.S. 30, 56 S.Ct. 74, 80 L.Ed. 29, 100 A.L.R. 1239 (1935), noted with disapproval in (1936) 40 Harv.L.Rev. 661, and Becker v. St. Louis Union Trust Co., 296 U.S. 48, 56 S.Ct. 78 (1935). See on these cases Lowndes, A Day in the Supreme Court with the Federal Estate Tax (1936) 22 Va.L.Rev. 261, 279 et seq.; and Comment (1936) 45 Yale L.J. 684, 690. For articles on this subject, see Leaphart, The Use of the Trust to Escape the Imposition of Federal Income and Estate Taxes (1930) 15 Cornell L.Q. 587; Payne, Inter Vivos Transfers and the Federal Estate Tax (1933) 81 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 937; Rottschaefer, Taxation of Transfers Intended to Take Effect in Possession or Enjoyment at Grantor's Death (1930) 14 Minn.L.Rev. 453. See also note (1930) 5 St. John's L.Rev. 147.

ing that if he died before they did, it was all theirs. Of course, I never advised keeping a remainder interest.⁵

MASON: I'm a bit rusty on my property law, but if I understood you, a man could keep a possibility of reverter and avoid the tax, whereas if he kept a remainder there would be a tax.

RICHEY: Correct.

MASON: Is there really any difference in the two situations? Why should one man's estate be taxed and not the other's? Both of them are doing exactly the same thing.⁶

RICHEY: Not at all. The man who didn't get good tax advice kept a remainder and got nicked—my clients got good advice and kept a possibility of reverter, and weren't taxed. But the Supreme Court has changed its mind. Now they say that the tax must be paid in both cases!⁷

MASON: Well, I can see that if your clients have to pay a tax, when you've told them they wouldn't have to, they're going to be pretty sore. But they can't blame you, can they?

RICHEY: Maybe not, but what's to bring them back to me for more advice if my first advice doesn't hold up? I relied on the Supreme Court, my clients relied, and what good did it do? It's downright discouraging to people who look up the law and try to act accordingly. Justice Roberts dissented—more power to him—he had some pretty sound things to say on the subject.⁸

⁶ A similar view expressed by Mr. Justice Stone in his dissent in Helvering v. St. Louis Union Trust Co., supra note 4, where he said (296 U.S. at 47, 56 S.Ct. 74): "Instead, by using a different form of words, he [the settlor] attained the same end and has escaped the tax. Having in mind the purpose of the statute and the breadth of its language it would seem to be of no consequence what particular conveyancers' device—what particular string—the decedent selected to hold in suspense the ultimate disposition of his property until the moment of his death. In determining whether a taxable transfer becomes complete only at death we look to substance, not to form."

⁸ "If there ever was an instance in which the doctrine of stare decisis should govern, this is it. Aside from the obvious hardship involved in treating the taxpayers in the present cases differently from many others whose cases have been decided or closed in accordance with the settled rule, there are the weightier con-

MASON: So you think the Supreme Court used to be right and now is wrong?

RICHEY: Let's not get into the question of whether the old decision was "right" or "wrong." It's enough to say that it was the law, that my clients relied on it, and that it looks mighty like legislation when the Court changes the law overnight and makes people pay a tax who weren't supposed to!

MASON: Legislation? One swallow doesn't make a summer.

RICHEY: Well, if you want more examples, there are plenty of them.

MASON: But suppose the Supreme Court—or, rather, the new judges—honestly think that the old rules are bad and should be changed. Are you going to tell them the old rules have to be followed whether they like them or not?

RICHEY: Yes, sir. Where people have relied, it seems to me to be just plain unconstitutional to change the law from what it was when they took action.²⁶ If Congress wants to change the law so as to catch future transactions, well and good. But as to past transactions, it's wrong—it's devilish—to go back and collect a tax. It's like the gold clause. Our government broke its sacred word of honor—a sin and a crime that will haunt us forevermore. You mark my words—it's just as McReynolds said, "The Constitution is gone."²⁷ . . .

siderations that the judgments now rendered disappoint the just expectations of those who have acted in reliance upon the uniform construction of the statute by this and all other federal tribunals; and that, to upset these precedents now, must necessarily shake the confidence of the bar and the public in the stability of the rulings of the courts and make it impossible for inferior tribunals to adjudicate controversies in reliance on the decisions of this court." Mr. Justice Roberts, dissenting in Helvering v. Hallock, supra note 7, 60 S.Ct. at 456.

See also the remarks of Mr. Hugh M. Bennett before the Cincinnati Conference on the Status of the Rule of Stare Decisis: "These cases [recent tax decisions of the Supreme Court] indicate more than a mere trend, in fact, they indicate to me a tornado in progress, wiping out what most of us thought were stout and sturdy foundations upon which our legal precepts have been built." (1940) 14 U. of Cin. L.Rev. at 232.

²⁶ Does Richey mean to imply that the court should be estopped? If so, he might well consider the language of Mr. Justice Frankfurter, speaking for the majority in Helvering v. Hallock, supra note 7. After stating that the court recognized in stare decisis "an important social policy" rooted in the "psychological need to satisfy reasonable expectations," he pointed out that none of the settlers had in fact relied on the St. Louis Union Trust decisions since their grants were made and their deaths took place before those cases. He added, however (60 S.Ct. at 451): "We do not mean to imply that the inevitably empiric process of construing tax legislation should give rise to an estoppel against the responsible exercise of the judicial process." (Italics supplied.)

At this point, a man who has been sitting some distance away comes over and pulls up a chair. He is Professor Garvey Stiles, of the faculty of a well-known law school located near-by.

STILES: Good afternoon, Mr. Richey! Mr. Mason! May I join you?

MASON AND RICHEY: Certainly! Certainly!

STILES: I couldn't help overhearing part of your discussion. Your voices were raised somewhat above the usual level. I am deeply interested in some of the questions you have been discussing. As a matter of fact, I am preparing an article on the subject for one of the reviews. It seems to me that the solution of some, at least, of the problems raised lies in the adoption of a more frankly legislative technique on the part of the judiciary.

RICHEY: Good God!

STILES: Wait. Let me finish. Suppose that the Supreme Court does not wish to follow a previous holding, but still wishes to protect a litigant who has relied on the former statement of the law. Why should it not adopt the policy of following the old law in the instant case, but announcing a new rule for the future?

RICHEY: Is there any precedent for such a proceeding?

STILES: Yes. There is excellent authority for it. Judge Cardozo³¹ and Professor Kocourek³² both advocated it, and in fact the Supreme Court itself once considered it. Judge Cardozo wrote the opinion, as it happened. The Montana Supreme Court had held a defendant liable, but had announced a new rule for the future under which no li-opinion in the same cases, Mr. Justice McReynolds said: "Loss of reputation for honorable dealing will bring us unending humiliation; the impending legal and moral chaos is appalling." Norman v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R., 294 U.S. 240, 381, 55 S.Ct. 407, 79 L.Ed. 885, 95 A.L.R. 1352 (1935).

³¹ Reference here is probably made to the address given by Mr. Justice Cardozo, while Chief Judge of the New York Court of Appeals, before the New York State Bar Association on January 22, 1932. See Report of the New York State Bar Association (1932) vol. LV, pp. 263 et seq. He cited an instance in which the majority of the New York Court of Appeals, in order that injustice might not be done in the instant case, felt obliged to follow precedent with which it no longer agreed; the minority wished to overrule this precedent, with retroactive effect. He then added (p. 296): "But was there not a third thing that might better have been done, better than what the majority or the dissenting judge approved? Would it not have been the sensible thing to say, this judgment will be affirmed because injustice would otherwise be done to the seller of the ranges who relied upon a declaration of the law now believed to have been wrong, but as to all who propose to have like transactions in the future, we give notice here and now that they are not to trust to the mistaken declaration to guide their course hereafter?"

ability would be imposed.³³ The defendant claimed that this was a denial of due process, and went to the United States Supreme Court. The Court said that there was no denial of due process.

MASON: What sort of case was it? A tax case?

STILES: No, it was a suit to recover an overcharge from a railroad.

MASON: You mean that the court let the plaintiff recover in this case, but then said, "Never again"?

STILES: That is correct.

MASON: So the Montana court said, "We're sorry. We have misled the bar."³⁴ There is no overcharge, and the railroad should not be liable. But since we've misled the bar, and let the plaintiff spend a little money on counsel fees, we'll give the plaintiff a big, fat judgment against the railroad. But we give notice that in the future we're going to enforce the correct rule and let the railroad off." Is that right, Professor?

STILES: Substantially so.

MASON: Sounds like rotten law to me. The court says to the defendant, "You really aren't liable under the law, but you've got to pay, because we can't have it said that the court misled the legal profession."

STILES: That's putting it rather harshly, Mr. Mason. After all, the law did impose liability,³⁵ as far as anyone knew, going by the old decisions. And the United States Supreme Court said that since it wouldn't have been a denial of due process to follow the old decisions, it wasn't a denial to follow the old decisions and then tag on the announcement that from now on the rule would be different.³⁶

³⁴ "Having written that opinion for the court [i.e., in Doney v. Northern Pac. Ry., supra note 33], the author hereof expresses apology for having misled the profession, and welcomes this opportunity to correct the error made in interpreting our statutes. . . . We were then apparently satisfied with the correctness of the holding, and thenceforth the profession and others were entitled to place reliance thereon." (italics supplied.) Such were the humble words of Judge Galen in Montana Horse Products Co. v. Great Northern Ry., supra note 33, at 205, 211.

³⁵ The professor here deprives us of what would undoubtedly be a very learned discourse on the nature of law. Apparently, he is of that school of thought which believes that judges create as well as discover law, for otherwise he would tell us in true Blackstonian style that the former decision never was the law. For a very recent discussion of this age-old problem, see Spruill, The Effect of an Overruling Decision (1940) 18 N.C.L.Rev. 199. See also Carpenter, Court Decisions and the Common Law (1917) 17 Col.L.Rev. 503.

RICHEY: I admit that Montana case seems pretty raw to me, Professor, but I think your idea has some real possibilities in the tax field—providing always that we apply it for the protection of the taxpayer and not of the tax gatherer. In fact, come to think of it, I think it would be unconstitutional to apply such an idea in favor of the government. You couldn't have the court saying that a man would have to pay a tax just because the court had formerly announced a mistaken rule that a tax was due in such a situation, and then go on and say that in the future there would be a new rule of no tax liability. That would be ridiculous—in fact, I guess we'd all agree that that would be un-American. But the other way round—a rule for the protection of the taxpayer—I think you've got something there, Professor.

MASON: Is that your idea, Professor Stiles—a one-way street leading out of taxation?

STILES: Well, Mr. Mason, I had not thought of it in exactly that light. In tort cases, where a man has been non-negligent under older judicial decisions, but is considered negligent by a modern court, I have no great sympathy for him. He probably was not relying on a court decision when he did the act which is now held to be negligent.³⁷ But in contract cases and property cases, my sympathies are very much on the side of the man who has relied on court decisions.³⁸ It seems to me that he should be protected—that the court should in his case follow the decision on which he relied, even though it may at the

On Reading and Using the New Jurisprudence (1940) 40 Col.L.Rev. 581, 26 A.B.A.J. 300, he refers to the decision as one "fraught with destiny" and comments on the glacial slowness of the state courts in adopting its doctrine.

Mr. Justice Cardozo, in delivering the opinion in the Sunburst case, said (287 U.S. at 364): "A state in defining the limits of adherence to precedent may make a choice for itself between the principal of forward operation and that of relation backward. It may say that decisions of its highest court, though later overruled, are law none the less for intermediate transactions." Professor Kocourek, who had advocated the statute mentioned supra note 32, was extremely heartened by this decision. In his joint article with Mr. Koven, Renovation of the Common Law through Stare Decisis (1935) 29 Ill.L.Rev. 971, he no longer finds need for the suggested statute, but says p. 999:) "The courts already inherently have the power to accomplish this program. No statute is needed. No change in any constitution is required." For a comment on Kocourek's and Koven's article, see Stare Decisis Freed from Baneful Effect, (1935) 19 J.Am.Jud.Soc. 37.

³⁸ Professor Stiles might well have quoted Professor Wigmore's The Judicial Function, a preface to Volume 9 of the Modern Legal Philosophy Series (1917), where it is said: "In so far as the faith of contracts is involved, and the security of property, there must be adherence to prior declarations of law in so far as such faith and such security have been rested upon them, but so far only." (P. xxxvii).

For an able article reviewing the situations in which overruling decisions are not given retroactive effect, see Freeman, The Protection Afforded against the Retroactive Operation of an Overruling Decision (1918) 18 Col.L.Rev. 230. Mr. Freeman concluded that courts generally were making every effort to avoid injustice by refusing to give retroactive effect to overruling decisions.

same time announce a new rule for the future. So the question is, are the tax cases like the contract cases?

RICHEY: Yes—emphatically, yes. The price paid for stock, for example, will often depend on whether the transaction can be put in the form of a tax-free reorganization. If it can, and there is no tax, a contract is made to reflect that situation. If later a tax is imposed, the expectations of the parties are upset.

MASON: But look at it from the other side. The government has to go on—somebody has to pay the taxes. If you let one man out of paying a tax, it means somebody else is going to have to pay a bigger tax. It seems to me that if the court concludes that a certain transaction is taxable, it should hold that the tax must be paid, even though the court has held the opposite in some previous case.³⁹ Otherwise, you will be putting an undeserved burden on the rest of the public.

RICHEY: Everybody's bearing an undeserved burden, if you should ask me.

STILES: Your thought is an interesting one, Mr. Mason. But is there not much to be said for a policy of encouraging reliance on past decisions, while at the same time permitting free expression of the court's opinion as to the rule to be followed in the future?⁴⁰

See also Professor Llewellyn's letter reviewing the proceedings of the Cincinnati Conference, supra note 8, in which he says: "Indeed, as to the tax cases in particular, it has seemed to me that one who has followed the current of opinion, judicial and other, over the past ten years, and has observed the pressure all over the country to open sources of revenue, must have been aware that some important shifts of ground have been impending." (1940) 14 U. of Cin.L.Rev. at 345.

⁴⁰ While much has been said for the policy advocated by the professor (see Kocourek and Koven, loc. cit. supra note 36), there has likewise been able criticism of the theory. Chief Justice von Moschzisker, in Stare Decisis in Courts of Last Resort (1924) 37 Harv.L.Rev. 400, points out that if an overruling decision is given only prospective effect legislation by the court is the result; the declaration of the rule to be followed in the future is mere dictum; and as a practical matter a litigant would not attempt to induce a court to overrule its former decision, for he would realize that the battle as to him is already lost, even should he succeed in obtaining a correct declaration of the law for the future. Kocourek and Koven counter by saying that if overruling a prior precedent is not judicial legislation, it is difficult to see how postponing the effect of the overruling decision is any more a matter of legislation. As to the argument that the rule announced for the future is mere dictum, it is said the court would feel morally bound to follow such a dictum and could be relied upon to adhere to it in the future. In regard to the practical effect on the individual litigant, it is conceded that the man with but a single case will not be inclined to appeal, but it is suggested that those business interests which are repeatedly involved in the operation of certain rules of law, as railroads, utilities.

MASON: How is this thing going to work? I take it that we have decision on a tax matter in 1930, holding a certain type of transaction is not taxable. Then many people, relying on the decision, enter into such transactions.

STILES: Correct.

MASON: Right. Now, in 1940, the Supreme Court wants to change the rule. What does it do? Wait for a case which brings up the exact point, or issue a decree?

STILES: Of course, it has to wait till a case comes up. It couldn't act in the absence of an actual case before it.

MASON: Well, we know that the taxpayers won't be anxious to bring the point up. They're hanging on to the old cases for dear life. So it will be the government which drags the taxpayer through the courts, knowing that the particular taxpayer will win, but hoping for a decision which will impose a tax in future cases.

STILES: Is that so different from present practice? Except, of course, that the government now hopes to win in the instant case as well as to obtain a new rule for the future.

MASON: Well, let's finish painting our picture. The Court's decision comes down, say, on November 1, 1940, at 10:30 A. M. So the public is now warned that while all transactions of a certain type occurring between the old decision date in 1930 and November 1, 1940, at 10:30 A. M. are tax-free, all similar transactions occurring after November 1, 1940, at 10:30 A. M. are taxable. Is that right?

STILES: Yes. It would be exactly like a statute—effective when officially promulgated.

MASON: I don't like your proposition, Professor, because it locks the barn door after the horse is stolen—or, rather, after it has died of old age. What good does it do to announce a new tax rule, effective after November 1, 1940? Everybody will run to friend Richey and be steered into other ways of getting out of taxes. And the government would lose its revenue on a big crop of transactions that took place between 1930 and 1940. No, sir, what's good law for the future is good law right here and now. In my opinion, a judge isn't living up to his oath of office if he doesn't decide each case according to the best that's in him—no matter if some other judge made a mistake ten years ago.⁴¹ and insurance companies, would find it to their interest to establish the new and correct rule for the future.

The Kentucky Supreme Court has on several occasions followed the Kocourek suggestion, citing Great Northern Ry. v. Sunburst Oil & Refining Co., supra note 36, in support of its position. Payne v. City of Covington, 276 Ky. 380, 123 S.W.2d 1045, 122 A.L.R. 321 (1938); World Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Tapp, 279 Ky. 423, 130 S.W.2d 848 (1939).

Compare the remarks of Honorable Murray Seasongood before the Cincinnati

RICHEY: My feelings are a bit mixed on this idea, Professor. In the first place, I don't like to hear you say that the Court's decision is going to be exactly like a statute. It's un-American. The courts are there to decide cases according to the law—not to put through new legislation. I like to hear a court say that such and such was the law in 1930, is the law in 1940, and will be the law in 1950, unless Congress changes it by vote of the people's elected representatives. The law's the law—and it should stay put!⁴² But—and here's where I start to agree with you—if we're going to have judges who insist on changing the law, anything you can do to ease up the effects is O. K. with me. Just so my clients get the kind of treatment I told them they'd get—and the courts told them they'd get—that's all I ask. . . .

VINSON, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE. This is an appeal from the District Court's discharge of a writ of habeas corpus. The litigation grows out of the same earlier proceedings as did the case of Warring v. Huff,¹ also decided today.

Conference, supra note 8: "So I conclude, whether we like it or not, in constitutional cases, the doctrine of stare decisis nowadays is practically non-existent. When it is established in the United States Supreme Court that about everything is constitutional, taxable and, for administrative tribunals, permissible, the present majority of the Court may be expected to give greater effect in constitutional cases, to the doctrine of stare decisis. (Applause.)" (1940) 14 U. of Cin.L.Rev. at 243.

⁴² A man after Richey's heart was that Pennsylvania jurist, Judge Black, who in Hole v. Rittenhouse, 2 Phila. 411, 418 (Pa. 1856), voiced the following dissenting views: "The majority of this Court changes on the average once every nine years, without counting the chances of death and resignation. If each new set of Judges shall consider themselves at liberty to overthrow the doctrines of their predecessors, our system of jurisprudence (if system it can be called) would be the most fickle, uncertain and vicious that the civilized world ever saw. A French constitution, or a South American republic, or a Mexican administration would be an immortal thing in comparison to the short-lived principles of Pennsylvania law. The rules of property which ought to be as steadfast as the hills, will become as unstable as the waves. To avoid this great calamity, I know of no resource but that of stare decisis. I claim nothing for the great men who have gone before us on the score of their marked and manifest superiority. But I would stand by their decisions, because they have passed into the law and become a part of it—have been relied and acted on—and rights have grown up under them which it is unjust and cruel to take away." ¹ 74 App.D.C. 302, 122 F.2d 641, decided July 29, 1941.

Appellant was sentenced on February 24, 1939, upon pleas of guilty, to four criminal contempt charges. The first charge stated that appellant had used money to influence a prospective juror. The second charge stated that appellant had investigated the possibility of influencing another prospective juror. Admittedly, and as shown by the rule to show cause, these acts occurred some days before the trial commenced, and some distance from the court house, although within the District of Columbia.

Appellant contends that the court had no power to convict him in a criminal contempt proceeding on these charges, for the statute delineating the court's contempt power provides, inter alia, "Such power to punish contempts shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person in their [courts'] presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice," (Ital. supplied.) Appellant then concludes that since he has served the valid sentences imposed upon him (the other two contempt sentences and a criminal conspiracy one), he should be discharged from custody on this writ of habeas corpus.

The "so near thereto" is old law as far as Congressional enactment goes. It was passed in 1831.³ It succeeded the Act of 1789 which provided simply that courts had power to punish contempts of their authority.⁴ The contempt provision of the Act of 1831 was Section 1. Section 2 of that Act listed certain acts which obstruct justice as offenses which were liable to punishment after indictment.⁵ Thus reading Section 2 with Section 1 and considering the background⁶ which brought about the Act of 1831, it is reasonable to believe that Congress meant that the courts should have a contempt power less broad than they possessed under the Act of 1789.

³ "That the power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishments for contempts of court, shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehaviour of any person or persons in the presence of the said courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehaviour of any of the officers of the said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of the said courts, party, juror, witness, or any other person or persons, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts." 4 Stat. 487-S, § 1.

⁴ "That all the said courts of the United States * * * shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oaths or affirmations, and to punish by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of said courts, all contempts of authority in any cause or hearing before the same." 1 Stat. 83, § 17.

To learn how much less, it is natural to turn to the cases. We find that Section 1 of the Act of 1831 has had varying constructions and varying interpretations of those constructions.⁷ It is probably correct to say that throughout the remainder of the nineteenth century the provision received a continually broadening construction. In 1905 this court clearly held that the attempt to influence a juror no matter where fell within the Section.⁸ In 1911 this court reaffirmed that conclusion.⁹ There can be no doubt that the Supreme Court's "reasonable tendency" (to obstruct the administration of justice) test enunciated in the Toledo Newspaper¹⁰ case (1918) included all attempts to influence jurors wherever they were. And to our minds, at least twice¹¹ since then, the Supreme Court construed the Section in such manner as would make the acts of the present appellant subject to contempt proceedings.

Under this state of the law,¹² appellant, after pleading guilty, was convicted of criminal contempt. On April 14th of this year the Supreme Court, in the Nye¹³ case, said that the words "so near thereto" must be given a geographical not a causal construction. In reaching this conclusion the Court expressly overruled its Toledo decision. We believe that appellee has properly conceded that if appellant's wrongful acts had occurred on April 15, 1941, the court should conclude that it had no power to punish him in criminal contempt proceedings. This is particularly true in light of the emphasis in the Nye opinion placed on Section 2 of the Act of 1831 in construing Section 1. Section 2 makes the endeavor to influence jurors, the wrongful acts here, liable to punishment after indictment.¹⁴

Is one entitled to a discharge under a writ of habeas corpus where the court had power under the statutory construction to punish his acts in a criminal contempt proceeding at the time the acts were done and the sentence imposed, the court not having such power under a new statutory construction at the time the writ of habeas corpus was filed? That is the question in this case. And so far as we have been able to ascertain it is a question of first impression.

This is a habeas corpus proceeding, a collateral attack upon a previous judgment of the District Court, accepted at the time as final.

¹⁴ See Footnote 5, compare footnote 3.

It is increasingly evident that "jurisdiction" in the normal case is not subject to collateral attack.¹⁵ While habeas corpus is regarded more liberally than most forms of collateral attack, it is not to be used as an appeal or a writ of error.¹⁶ We believe that appellant would be entitled to discharge under the writ, if the District Court clearly did not have power to act.¹⁷ If there was doubt about the Court's power, a direct appeal would usually be the proper means of questioning the conclusion; extraordinary circumstances might justify the issuance of the writ.¹⁸ If the court had the power, appellant is not entitled to discharge.¹⁹

Thus the question in this case becomes whether the Nye case (1941) with its geographical construction of the statutory words took away the District Court's power to adjudge one guilty of contempt for these acts as of 1939, when in that year the Court had the power under the "reasonable tendency" construction.

When a case is decided it is expected that people will make their behavior conform to the rule it lays down and also to the principle expressed in so far as it can be determined. This is true whether the decision is regarded as "the law", "the best evidence of the law", or "a prediction of what the court will do next time". When hard cases arise under the principle, counter principles are emphasized, distinctions pointed out, and the determination of what is significant may become easier or more difficult. If, at last, the first decision is overruled, then there is new law, better evidence, or an enlightened basis for prediction. Those transactions which occurred between the two decisions, are, for the most part, accepted history. This is true even though a person had presented, in proper fashion, his case to the courts. His rights being finally determined, an attempt to reopen the question, in view of the new enlightenment, would be greeted with the powerful answer of res judicata. In one respect the new law is applied to an old set of facts. Traditionally, he who questioned the law or the best evidence of it is given the benefit of the new law or the better evidence of it. This is not always the case. There has arisen, for example, when contract rights or property rights growing out of contracts are involved, the exception that the one who argued against the established law is not given the benefit of the change he helped bring about inasmuch as his adversary relied upon the previous law.²⁰ Such decisions apply the old law to the case at hand while establishing new law for the future. The Supreme Court has found no constitutional limitation on state courts proceeding in this manner.²¹ Federal courts have proceeded similarly.²² Obviously courts are free to follow the more traditional method.²³

Now if a legislature makes some law, again it is expected that people will conform to its provisions. If a court later construes the Act, it is expected, likewise, that behavior will be adjusted compatibly with the decision even though the court says that the statute means something other than what most people thought that it meant. There would be uncertainty and criticism if each person proceeded to conduct himself according to his own notion of what the statute meant in face of what the court had said. If later the court reverses its construction, a new angle of thought is often injected. There are those who reason that this is different from overruling a common law case.²⁴ After all, the statute always was the law. It is on a higher plane than the judicial construction of it. Since the two constructions are inconsistent, to be practical, the latter must be chosen as right and the former never was the law. That means that just about everybody was fooled. This reasoning would seem to be more in accordance with the traditional thought habit of the civil law than of the common law although both always tend to modify themselves toward each other. But courts have often concluded that to apply the new construction to a previous transaction would be unjust.²⁵

If instead of a court changing the construction of a statute, the legislature passes a new act which in effect repeals the old one, there would be little doubt that the old act was the law until the new one was enacted. For example if the contempt statute of 1789 had still been in effect in 1939 when appellant was sentenced, and then on April 14, 1941, a new act of Congress had become effective which limited the court's power to breaches committed within the court house, probably no one upon second thought would have decided that appellant was entitled to discharge upon a writ of habeas corpus.

We have mentioned three types of alterations in the law: a court's overruling decision in the realm of common law, a court changing its construction of a statute, and the enacting of a new statute which partially or totally repeals an old act. In an attempt to complete the picture we point out a fourth situation and compare it with the instant problem.

It has been commonly thought that if an act is declared unconstitutional, it never had any force or effect. Yet a realistic approach is eroding this doctrine. In the instant case the reason why it is considered that appellant may be entitled to discharge is because the statute never gave the court contempt "jurisdiction" over his type of offense. Yet the courts had said there was jurisdiction. It is now said that there is no jurisdiction. But to say that there never was jurisdiction is to place the Nye case on a higher plane than, for example, the Toledo decision. True the Nye case is the law now and will be followed until changed. But the Supreme Court's construction had been otherwise. Those decisions that made it otherwise were on the same plane as the Nye case. All of the decisions were construing the statute. When a statute is declared unconstitutional it falls because it must yield to the basic, superior law. There is much more reason to argue that the unconstitutional statute never was the law. Yet today even such a statute is an operative fact and decisions made under its color have the blessing of res judicata.²⁶

All of the loose ends presented in this discussion on the effect of altering the law can be pretty well tied together when it is realized that law is not a pure science, that law loses its vital meaning if it is not correlated to the organic society in which it lives, that law is a present and prospective force, that law needs some stability of administration, that the law is all the law there is, that law is more for the parties than for the courts, that people will rely upon and adjust their behavior in accordance with all the law be it legislative or judicial or both.

These considerations should guide the lawmakers and the law-apppliers in making their determinations in respect of whether a change in the law is to be effective only for the future or also for the past, and if the latter, to what extent.²⁷ And these considerations should be applicable to both sides of a potential litigation, civil or criminal, so that we may have our rules of the game as we go. The Supreme Court in the Nye case applied its new law to the litigation then before it. Inasmuch as personal liberty was involved and the courts usually apply law this much after the fact, such a result was meritorious. But the Court did not indicate whether its new law was to be applied to cases decided under the old law previous to its decision. That question is now for us, another court.

We believe that appellant is not entitled to discharge upon the habeas corpus writ. The District Court had the power to sentence him in a criminal contempt proceeding in 1939. The Nye case of 1941 should not be applied so as to sweep away that power as of 1939. This collateral attack, then, is unavailing. We reject the idea that if a court was considered to have the power in 1939 to do a certain thing under existing statutory construction, and in 1941 that construction is changed so that it no longer has the power to do that thing, it should be concluded that it never had the power in 1939. It has often been said that the living should not be governed by the dead, for that would be to close our eyes to the changing conditions which time imposes. It seems even sounder to say that the living should not be governed by their posterity, for that, in turn, would be downright chaotic.

Affirmed.

BURADUS v. GENERAL CEMENT PRODUCTS CO.

Superior Court of Pennsylvania, 1946. 159 Pa.Super. 501, 48 A.2d 883.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Mrs. Fannie Buradus, claimant, to recover compensation for the death of Edward Buradus, employee, opposed by the General Cement Products Company, employer, and the Maryland Casualty Company, insurance carrier. From a judgment for claimant on appeal from the Workmen's Compensation Board's order denying compensation, the employer and insurance carrier appeal.

HIRT, JUDGE. It was admitted that Edward Buradus died on April 5, 1943, from injury in the course of his employment with General Cement Products Company. Claimant in this case asserted that she was his common-law wife, and as such, was entitled to compensation. Her testimony was to this effect: After an acquaintance of three weeks, she agreed to marry Buradus. On November 16, 1941, she went to the house of John Powell, where Buradus roomed, and there in the presence of Powell and his wife, in words of the present, took him for her lawful husband and he, her, as his wife. Both Powell and his wife, as witnesses for claimant, recounted what was said by the parties on entering into the marriage contract. In formal respects the testimony of claimant and these witnesses met legal requirements in almost the exact language of our decisions. Claimant testified that she then went with Buradus to his room and that she continued to live with him there and was supported by him, up to the time of his death. Both the referee and the board accepted this testimony and found that claimant had met the burden of establishing a common-law marriage with Buradus. The board, however, considered itself bound by our dicta in Fisher v. Sweet & McClain, 154 Pa.Super.Ct. 216, 35 A.2d 756, 760, and on that ground alone refused an award. Following our order, affirming the judgment in that case, we, on January 27, 1944, gave notice of a prospective change in our construction of the Act of May 17, 1939, P.L. 148, in this language: ". . . that a valid common-law marriage cannot hereafter be entered into in this Commonwealth without first complying with the Act of 1939 and securing a marriage license pursuant to its provisions." There was no license to marry in the present case. But since the marriage contract, found by the board, was entered into before the date of our opinion in the Fisher case, the lower court held that the marriage was not invalidated thereby and entered judgment for claimant as on an award.

There has been a growing judicial impatience of the invitation to perjury in cases depending for recovery on marriage at common law and a progressive change in judicial view requiring higher degrees of proof where such marriages are asserted. In the Orphans' Court the proofs of a common-law marriage must be sufficient in substance and credibility to convince the mind and satisfy the conscience of a chancellor, whose findings become final when approved by a court en banc. In re Krystkiewicz's Estate, 310 Pa. 298, 165 A. 230. In workmen's compensation cases there must be substantial credible and competent testimony sufficient to satisfy a reasonable mind as adequate proof of a marriage at common law. Wilbert v. Commonwealth Second Injury Reserve Account, 143 Pa.Super.Ct. 37, 17 A. 2d 732. But it is still not difficult for unprincipled claimants to convert illicit relationships into honest marriages, to their advantage, on spurious claims for workmen's compensation or against the estate of a decedent. In the present case however, with the question of credibility of the witnesses resolved in favor of claimant, there is evidence sufficient to support the finding of a common-law marriage and we may not interfere with that finding, judicially, Kiska v. C. H. Ziegenfuss Co., Inc., 154 Pa.Super.Ct. 100, 35 A.2d 532. But this claim is not atypical and is not above suspicion. Claimant at the time of the alleged marriage was but little more than sixteen years old, although she said that her father consented to the marriage. She had an illegitimate child by a former alliance. In defendant's testimony, Buradus was described as a police character; he was frequently in conflict with the law, and, after the marriage, admittedly served him in the Allegheny County Work House on a conviction of larceny. He had left claimant in Pittsburgh, on another occasion after the marriage, and spent six months in Cleveland and Detroit. There is credible evidence also that he lived with two other women, in succession in meretricious relationship after the marriage with claimant and that he was not living with her at the time of his death.

Marriage without civil or religious ceremony (perhaps mistakenly accepted here, as the then common law of England, Cf. Bishop on Marriage, Divorce and Separation, § 390 et seq.; In re Roberts' Estate, 58 Wyo. 438, 133 P.2d 492) is still valid, under the common law of Pennsylvania. And although, with the ready means of transportation everywhere available, common-law marriage may be an anachronism in the present day—born as it was of the exigencies of pioneer life—we have not presumed to question it as an institution sanctioned by our law. The question here is whether we may give effect to our dicta in the Fisher case and declare claimant's marriage void for want of a license in accordance with the Act of 1939.

It well may be questioned that we, on a change of view in the construction of an act of assembly, have the power to limit the application of the revised construction to conduct occurring thereafter. In general, the construction placed upon a statute by the courts becomes a part of the act, from the very beginning. And when former decisions are overruled, the reconsidered pronouncement becomes the law of the statute from the date of its enactment. People ex rel. Rice v. Graves, 242 App.Div. 128, 273 N.Y.S. 582, affirmed in 270 N.Y. 498, 200 N.E. 288, certiorari denied, 298 U.S. 683, 56 S.Ct. 953, 80 L.Ed. 1403; City of Philadelphia v. Schaller, 148 Pa.Super.Ct. 276, 25 A. 2d 406, allocatur refused, certiorari denied 317 U.S. 649, 63 S.Ct. 43, 87 L.Ed. 522. Cf. Crawford Statutory Construction, § 184.

On any view, this is not a proper case in which to give effect to our dicta in the Fisher case since the parties were married before the date of the decision. What we there said was but notice of a prospective change in the law. By our language, limiting its intended application to common-law marriages contracted after the date of our opinion, claimant would have been justified in the belief that any contemplated change in legal construction would not affect her marital status nor require a subsequent marriage, duly licensed, to make it valid. We are not justified in now saying that her position of security, whether or not she did in fact rely on our language, was false. Although we well might direct the entry of an award on that ground, as did the lower court, frankness compels us to say that we, on re-examination of the question, have found our declaration in the Fisher case, untenable.

Our addendum to the Fisher case was pure dicta; the question of the general application of the 1939 act as a health measure was not involved and was not raised nor argued in that appeal. Because not necessary to the determination of that case our contemplated change in construction of the 1939 act did not become presently effective and did not work a change in the law, under the doctrine of stare decisis.

The incidents of a common-law marriage always have been, marriage, contracted without civil or religious ceremony, and without prior license (Freedman on Marriage and Divorce, §§ 48, 49) and until the Fisher case, our appellate courts have tacitly held that no statutes affect either the method of contracting a common-law marriage or its validity. The provision of the Act of June 23, 1885, P.L. 146, 48 P.S. § 2, that "no person within this commonwealth shall be joined in marriage, until a license shall have been obtained for that purpose," relates solely to civil and religious ceremonial marriages and marriages solemnized in writing by the parties themselves under § 4 of the act. 48 P.S. § 7. Common-law marriage was not affected by that act or its amendments. The 1939 act, requiring a serological test for syphilis, was also a marriage license regulation, though in the interest of public health. It is significant that the act does not refer to common-law marriages specifically. It therefore may not be presumed to make any change in the common law. Even though the expression of an act is in general terms, only such modification will be recognized as the statute clearly and definitely prescribes. In the absence of express declaration, the law presumes that the act did not intend to make any change in the common law, for if the legislature had that design they would have expressed it.¹ Pettit v. Fretz's Ex'r, 33 Pa. 118. Bishop on Marriage, Divorce and Separation, § 424, is authority for the statement that a common-law marriage is valid notwithstanding a statute, unless the statute contains express words of nullity. Cf. L.R.A.1915E 19; 39 A.L.R. 538.

Moreover the history of the act indicates that the legislature did not actually intend to include common-law marriage within its purview. Earlier in the session of 1939, an act, identical in material respects, was passed by both houses. Governor James vetoed the measure on the ground that it made no reference to common-law marriage, as well as because of defects in the prescribed procedure on summary conviction for violation of the act. In a redraft, the suggested changes of procedure were made but the language of the prior bill was not modified in other respects, in the act which became the law on May 17, 1939. There was no discussion on the floor of either the Senate or the House during its passage. By ignoring the suggestion of the governor, no inference is possible other than that the legislature deliberately refused to make any change in the law of common-law marriage in that act. In 1943 the legislature had before it a suggested revised marriage code which proposed specifically to abolish common-law marriage. The provisions of the 1939 act were incorporated in it. Though passed by the House, it never reached the floor of the Senate. That proposed act is of no significance except to demonstrate that the legislature again had the question of common law marriage before it for consideration and did not see fit to make any change in the existing law. On March 9, 1945, P.L. 41, the legislature reenacted the 1939 act without material changes in language. Later in the same session it incorporated the same provisions, almost verbatim, in an "Act for the prevention . . . of venereal diseases". This Act of May 16, 1945, P.L. 577, 35 P.S. § 587.6 repealed the 1939 act as well as the prior 1945 act. There is no presumption, in the absence of a change in language, of a legislative change of intent in the Act of May 16, 1945, to require license as a prerequisite to a valid common-law marriage. The inference is inescapable that the legislature with our suggested change before it, chose to leave the law as it was.

Because of our high respect for the wisdom of our late President Judge, in his development of the law and its practical application, we have stated these conclusions with much reluctance. Our experience with cases such as this has been unsatisfactory and we are in agreement that some badge of integrity should be required by law to identify the rarely actual common-law marriage and distinguish it from the spurious; thus, removing the temptation from finders of facts of rewarding "imposture by fiction". But whether the suggestion of the Fisher case is to be given effect will be exclusively for the legislature to determine.

On amendment, by substituting General Cement Products Company as defendant employer (in accordance with agreement of counsel) the judgment is affirmed.

ROBERT HILL FREEMAN, THE PROTECTION AFFORDED AGAINST THE RETROACTIVE OPERATION OF AN OVERRULING DECISION

18 Colum.L.Rev. 230, 250-251 (1918).

Summary.

Our review of the cases discloses that the doctrine of stare decisis, generally accepted as it is by our courts, forms a strong, if only moral, force to prevent the capricious change of decisions by a Court. Further, that where a change is made, protection is afforded in various ways against the retroactive operation of the overruling decision. We may tabulate the results as follows:

1. In cases originating in the federal courts, the last decision of a state court, overruling former decisions, will not be followed where to do so would interfere with rights acquired in reliance upon the first decisions.

2. The state courts, on one theory or another, almost universally protect property rights acquired in reliance upon a statute or constitutional provision as then interpreted by the courts.

3. Men are not punished as criminals for acts which were done when the highest court of the state had declared them lawful.

4. The tendency is to extend the same protection to rights acquired in reliance upon decisions interpreting the common or unwritten law.

From the above results it is not too much to say that ultimately, where the courts feel impelled to abandon a position formerly taken, all rights will be protected against the retroactive effect of the overruling decision, and the people may rely upon the court decisions as announcing the law by which they are to be governed. True, it may like a statute, be repealed; but the repealing decision will, like the repealing statute, operate prospectively only.

The doctrine of stare decisis will not cover all cases. There will be cases where a change of ruling is desirable or necessary; and where legislative action to work the change will be impracticable. In such cases, the courts should be free and feel free to make the change. A doctrine which would permit the saving of rights based upon the first decision would make them the less reluctant to do so.

There are, of course, serious objections to be overcome. Constitutional difficulties have been suggested. A whole hearted repudiation of the theory that the courts only declare law—a theory which, as we have seen has already been abrogated and eaten into by exceptions—may be necessary. The suggestion that the courts have power to announce a new and better rule for regulating future transactions, while applying the old rule to the case in hand, may be accepted. Or, as suggested above, the courts may take the view that an overruling decision may operate so as to deprive a person of his liberty or property without due process of law. Certainly the tendency of the courts as reflected in the cases, some of which we have discussed, is to the view that the advantages of the result outweigh the objections to the basis.

VAN VRANKEN v. HELVERING

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1940. 115 F.2d 709.

L. HAND, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This appeal brings up a deficiency in income taxes assessed against the taxpayer for the year 1935, and depends upon what shall be taken as the "basis" in calculating her gain or loss upon the sale in that year of certain shares of stock, inherited from her father as part of a remainder, limited to her in a testamentary trust. He died on August 16, 1915, having devised and bequeathed the residue of his estate to his executors in trust for the life of his wife, the taxpayer's mother; then upon her death "to transfer, deliver and pay over to my daughter, Elsie Van Vranken" (the taxpayer) "if she shall outlive my wife, the remaining equal one-half part of the remainder of my estate. . . . If my daughter, Elsie Van Vranken, should die during her mother's lifetime, leaving lawful issue her surviving, then upon the death of my wife, I order and direct my said Executor and Trustees to transfer, deliver and pay over the remaining one-half part to the issue of my daughter, Elsie Van Vranken, in equal shares." The testator's wife out-lived him and died on April 26, 1930; shortly thereafter the trustees delivered to the taxpayer the shares now in question, which, as we have said, she sold in 1935. The only question is whether the "basis" for computing her gain or loss is the value of the shares at the time of the testator's death or at the time of his wife's. In the first event there would be a gain; in the second, a loss. The Commission held that the date of the testator's death fixed the "basis," and so the Board found, basing its decision, however, upon the law of New York under which it held that the remainder was vested. We do not find it necessary to consider that question because we think that the testator's death is the proper date, even if the remainder was contingent.

Section 202(a) (3) of the Revenue Act of 1921, 42 Stat. 229, defined the "basis" for the sale of property "acquired" by will or descent as its value "at the time of . . . acquisition"; and the Acts of 1924 and 1926 (§ 204(a) (5)) 26 U.S.C.A.Int.Rev.Acts, pages 8, 152, were the same. In 1928 this was changed; specific bequests and all real property, whether passing by devise or descent, were valued as of the death of the decedent, and so was all property passing from him to his "state"; but all else was valued as of "the time of the distribution to the taxpayer." § 113(a) (5), 26 U.S.C.A.Int.Rev.Acts, p. 380. The Act of 1932 was in the same form, 26 U.S.C.A.Int.Rev.Acts, page 515, but in 1934 Congress went back to the original, 26 U.S.C.A.Int.Rev.Acts, page 697, which it has repeated in the Acts of 1936 and 1938, 26 U.S.C.A.Int.Rev.Acts, pages 860, 1048. The phrase, "at the time of acquisition," seems to have been borrowed from the regulations promulgated under the Revenue Act of 1918 (Art. 56 of Regulations 45) where it first appeared. Very shortly thereafter the Commissioner construed this regulation as meaning the death of the testator, when the remainder was vested, and the occurrence of the limiting condition, when it was contingent. The first intimation to the contrary was in the regulations of 1934, which provided that the date of the decedent's death should be that of "acquisition" whether the remainder was vested or contingent (Article 113(a) (5), Regulations 86) and this all later regulations have repeated.

There had, meanwhile, grown up a large body of judicial construction of the acts before 1934 which uniformly accepted the administrative ruling. . . . Under the well-recognized canon of statutory construction that the reenactment of a statute incorporates preceding judicial interpretations, a strong case can therefore be made against the regulation of 1934, which Judge Soper put most persuasively in Reynolds v. Commissioner, 4 Cir., 114 F.2d 804. Moreover, although an argument the other way might have been based upon the change in 1934 from "distribution" back to "acquisition," the Senate Committee Report shows that Congress was then concerned only to end the option which "distribution" had given to executors to choose the most profitable time for setting up testamentary trusts. Brewster v. Gage, 280 U.S. 327, 50 S.Ct. 115, 74 L.Ed. 457, had decided that under the statute before 1928 a legatee "acquired" his bequest at the death of the testator, and Congress wished to make this the date for trustees in all cases. Were it not for the change in the attitude of the Supreme Court towards the common-law distinction between contingent and vested remainders (Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U.S. 106, 60 S.Ct. 444, 84 L.Ed. 604, 125 A.L.R. 1368) we should therefore find it difficult to escape the force of the reasoning in Reynolds v. Commissioner, supra (114 F.2d 804).

It is true that the question before the Supreme Court was very different from that at bar; it did not even concern income taxes at all; it was whether a remainder limited upon a life estate could be said to have passed by a transfer "intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment" at the settlor's death, when that event, by determining that the remainderman was the survivor, ended the possibility that the settlor might take the property. But in deciding that question the court declared that the whole distinction of the common law between vested and contingent remainders was irrelevant; it was enough that the remainder, which had before been subject to defeat, became indefeasible by the settlor's death; that alone was a "transfer." The supposititious difference between an existing interest, subject to a condition, and an interest, non-existent before condition fulfilled, was said to preclude "a fair and workable tax system"; the "elusive and subtle casuistries" which it involved might "have historic justification," but were of no moment "for tax purposes" (309 U.S. page 118, 60 S.Ct. page 450, 84 L.Ed. 604, 125 A.L.R. 1368). In the case at bar we have substantially the same question though in a different form; we are to say whether a remainderman "acquires" any interest before it becomes certain that he will ever enjoy it. Whether one is forced to regard conditional existence as non-existence is after all a question in ontology which judges are ill fitted to answer. Practically a conditional interest "exists" in the sense that the holder can sell it and—if the condition is not his own survivorship—can bequeath it; and, as a new matter divorced from history, we should say that its "acquisition" dates from the time when he achieves that much control over it, like an unconditional interest whose enjoyment is merely postponed. But the problem is not that, for nobody disputes that under the rulings on which the taxpayer relies a "vested" remainder, "subject to be divested," is "acquired" when it "vests." We may start with that as datum and have only to say whether there is any difference for the purposes of taxation between such a remainder and one which the common law would have regarded as "contingent" ab initio; the choice is not between a conditional and an unconditional interest simpliciter, but between conditional remainders as they were differently classified by the phantom casuistry of the common law. That distinction we understand the Supreme Court to have repudiated as a determinant of tax liabilities.

It may indeed be reasonable à priori to say that our fiscal system was meant to fit upon the old mould as a whole; convenience in administration might make up for the lame correspondence between concept and polity. If Helvering v. Hallock, supra (309 U.S. 106, 60 S.Ct. 444, 84 L.Ed. 604, 125 A.L.R. 1368), had merely decided that the later cases were erroneously decided under the ancient rubrics, its decision would not be helpful here. But that was not the measure of the holding; it meant to jettison the distinction as an archaism no longer appropriate to existing needs; and it is as little appropriate to § 113(a) (5) as to § 202(c) of the Estate Tax. Moreover, quite aside from the asymmetry which its survival would create, it would be particularly unsuitable for salvage here. Any increase in value between the testator's death and the death of the life holder—or whatever other event may put an end to the condition upon the remainder—is certainly a “gain” if it is “realized.” One may debate the propriety of taxing it to the remainderman rather than to the estate; but one cannot dispute that it is properly taxable to some one under the system as it stands. Nor is this conclusion shaken by the fact that the doctrine will permit the deductions of losses as well as the addition of gains, for prima facie all “realized” changes in value are factors in computing income.

The canon which the taxpayer invokes is sometimes a help, but we must never ignore the more important, though impalpable, factors. Indeed, nothing is so likely to lead us astray as an abject reliance upon canons of any sort; so much the whole history of verbal interpretation teaches, if it teaches anything. At times one is more likely to reach the truth by an unanalyzed and intuitive conclusion from the text as a whole, than by following, step by step, the accredited guides. Therefore, while without Helvering v. Hallock, supra (309 U.S. 106, 60 S.Ct. 444, 84 L.Ed. 604, 125 A.L.R. 1368), we should probably have felt obliged to hold that the statute incorporated the earlier rulings of the lower courts, it appears to us that, with that decision before us, we should not preserve what would now be no more than an egregious exception in the fiscal scheme as a whole.

Order affirmed.

D. Some Cases of "Unprecedented" Law Making

OPPENHEIM v. KRIDEL

Court of Appeals of New York, 1923.
236 N.Y. 150, 140 N.E. 227, 28 A.L.R. 320.

Appeal from Supreme Court, Appellate Division, First Department.

CRANE, J. Can a wife maintain an action for criminal conversation as well as a husband? This is the question presented by this appeal.

The plaintiff and her husband were married in 1884 and had one child, who was married in 1909. They lived together in the same house or apartment until 1917. It can be gathered from the evidence that in 1913 the parties had ceased to live together as husband and wife. It is about this time that the defendant, a widow with children, entered into the lives of these two parties. From 1913 until a final separation in 1917, the husband seems to have lost his love and affection for his wife. During this time he was seeing the defendant with more or less frequency. Intimacy increased with the years until in January, 1919, he and the defendant were found in his apartment in New York City under such circumstances as to leave no doubt that they had committed adultery. The fact is conceded.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Jennie M. Oppenheim, thereupon brought this action against Mrs. Martha Kridel, the guilty party, alleging in her complaint:

"That the defendant, well knowing said Myron H. Oppenheim to be the plaintiff's husband, and maliciously and willfully intending to injure the plaintiff and deprive her of the comfort, society, aid, assistance, and support of her said husband, and to alienate and destroy his affection for her, heretofore, and on or about the 12th day of January, 1919, and on divers other days and times during the last four years last past, and before the commencement of this action, at the premises No. 207 West Fifty-Sixth street, borough of Manhattan, city of New York, and at divers other premises and places, wrongfully and wickedly, and without the privity or connivance of plaintiff, debauched and carnally knew the said Myron H. Oppenheim, by means whereof the affection of the said Myron H. Oppenheim for the said plaintiff was wholly alienated and destroyed, and by reason of the premises the plaintiff has wholly lost the affection, comfort, society, aid, assistance, and support of her said husband."

On the trial the justice refused to consider the case as one for alienation of affections and submitted it to the jury solely as an action for criminal conversation. He charged:

"You are not to concern yourselves with any question as to whether or not the defendant alienated the affections of plaintiff's husband. There is now no such question in this case."

He further said:

"It is only necessary for the plaintiff to prove her marriage and the criminal intercourse between her husband and the defendant, and that such criminal intercourse was without her consent."

The jury, however, were permitted to consider the loss of the husband's affections and his society and the mental anguish and disgrace sustained by the plaintiff, if any, on the question of damages.

On appeal the judgment for the plaintiff, entered upon the verdict of a jury in her favor, was reversed by a divided court, and the complaint dismissed under a ruling that an action for criminal conversation could not be maintained in this state by a wife. We have arrived at the conclusion, after a full review of the authorities, that, whatever may have been the rights of the wife in this particular under ancient law, there is no reason or law against her maintaining such an action to-day so long as the husband may do so.

At common law the wife had no cause of action against a woman for alienating the affections of her husband or for the act of adultery committed with him known by the technical name of an action for criminal conversation. The husband could bring such action against a man for enticing away the affections of his wife or for committing adultery with her. Some of the reasons assigned as the basis of the action by the husband for criminal conversation sound somewhat strange in our ears to-day. The gist of the action was the possibility that by the infidelity of a wife the husband might be called upon to support illegitimate children, or the legitimacy of his own offspring be cast into doubt. The husband, so it was said, had a property in the body, and a right to the personal enjoyment, of his wife, for the invasion of which right the law permitted him to sue as husband. The wrongful act was treated as an actual trespass upon the marital rights of the husband, although the consequent injury to him was on account of the corruption of the body and mind of the wife. Tinker v. Colwell, 193 U.S. 473-483, 24 S.Ct. 505, 48 L.Ed. 754. These old authorities and reasons have carried the respondent to the logical conclusion which he states in his brief as follows:

"The husband's cause of action is based upon his proprietary right in the person of his wife. . . . The assertion that husband and wife are now equal in the eyes of the law has no bearing on the cause of action for criminal conversation, which was predicated upon the possessory right of the superior being in the body of the inferior."

The basis for some of these apparently harsh reasons mentioned in the early common law arose out of forms of action and difficulties in procedure. They were written into the law at a time when forms of action were rigid and limited, and fictitious reasons were sought to justify relief under existing, but inappropriate, forms. The adultery was treated as an assault upon the person of the husband. This search for a remedy was referred to as follows:

"The assault vi et armis is a fiction of the law, assumed at first, in early times, to give jurisdiction of the cause of action as a trespass, to the courts, which then proceeded to permit the recovery of damages by the husband for his wounded feelings and honor, the defilement of the marriage bed, and for the doubt thrown upon the legitimacy of children." Tinker v. Colwell, 193 U.S. 473, 481, 24 S.Ct. 505, 506 (48 L.Ed. 754).

Barring the fictions which apply only to procedure, whatever reasons there were for giving the husband at common law the right to maintain an action for adultery committed with his wife exist to-day in behalf of the woman for a like illegal act committed with her husband. If he had feelings and honor which were hurt by such improper conduct, who will say to-day that she has not the same, perhaps a keener, sense of the wrong done to her and to the home? If he considered it a defilement of the marriage bed, why should not she view it in the same light? The statement that he had a property interest in her body and a right to the personal enjoyment of his wife are archaic, unless used in a refined sense worthy of the times, and which give to the wife the same interest in her husband. The fiction of assault, whereby courts were given jurisdiction, has long since vanished, except for historical interest. The danger of doubt being thrown upon the legitimacy of the children, which seems to be the principal reason assigned in all the authorities for the protection of the husband and the maintenance of the action by him, may be offset by the interest which the wife has in the bodily and mental health of her children when they are legitimate. Science to-day teaches us the dire consequences which sometimes follow promiscuous intercourse by a man. It is common knowledge that the sins of the father are sometimes visited, not only upon the children, but upon the wife, in the resultant diseases contracted through breaches of the marriage contract. The husband must not have discredit thrown upon the legitimacy of his children. The wife should have no doubt about the health and cleanliness of her husband or of her offspring. Legitimacy is important. Children of sound mind and body are equally as important.

It is said in this case that the affections of the husband and wife had already been alienated, and that the defendant could cause the wife no harm by her illegal relations with the husband, as the husband had ceased to live with the wife and his love for her had already vanished. Such a proposition loses sight of the fact that the parties were still husband and wife, the marriage bonds had not been dissolved, and that there was always the possibility of reconciliation rendered perhaps too remote by the defendant's illicit relationship.

So far as I can see, there is no sound and legitimate reason for denying a cause of action for criminal conversation to the wife while giving it to the husband. Surely she is as much interested as the husband in maintaining the home and wholesome, clean, and affectionate relationships. Her feelings must be as sensitive as his toward the intruder, and it would be mere willful blindness on the part of the courts to ignore these facts. Both the courts of this state and the statutes have recognized this change in the status, rights, and privileges of a married woman. As stated before, the common law gave a married woman no action either for alienation of affections or for criminal conversation. Yet this court has recognized that under the statutes giving her the power to maintain actions in her own name she may now sue another woman for alienating the affections of her husband. Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N.Y. 584, 23 N.E. 17, 6 L.R.A. 553. It is true that this case was not decided upon the theory that the Married Women's Acts of 1860 (Laws 1860, c. 90) and of 1862 (Laws 1862, c. 162), permitting her to sue in her own name, gave her a cause of action which she did not previously possess. The question put and answered by that case was the following:

"Can it be sustained upon the theory that the right of action belongs to the wife according to the general principles of the common law and that she may now maintain it, being permitted to sue in her own name?" 116 N.Y. 584, 589, 23 N.E. 17, 18 (6 L.R.A. 553).

In answering this question in the affirmative, this court proceeded upon a theory that the right always existed in the woman at common law, but that she could not enforce it by reason of the rules of practice which prohibited her from maintaining actions, and which also gave to the husband her property. This was pure theory, as it is difficult to understand how any substantial right could exist at common law for which there was no remedy afforded. The fact is the Bennett Case established the rule that, as the husband could sue for the alienation of his wife's affections, there was no reason why the wife should not also maintain such an action under our forms of procedure, when the results were as injurious to her from the alienation of her husband's affections as they would be to the husband by the alienation of her affections. The question was again asked in the opinion in that case:

"Has she such a legal right to the conjugal society of her husband as to enable her to recover against one who wrongfully deprives her of that right?"

And the court again answered by these general reflections upon the facts as they existed and were known by everybody to exist:

"The actual injury to the wife from the loss of consortium, which is the basis of the action, is the same as the actual injury to the husband from that cause. His right to the conjugal society of his wife is no greater than her right to the conjugal society of her husband. Marriage gives to each the same rights in that regard. Each is entitled to the comfort, companionship, and affection of the other. The rights of the one and the obligations of the other spring from the marriage contract, are mutual in character, and attach to the husband as husband and to the wife as wife. Any interference with these rights, whether of the husband or of the wife, is a violation not only of a natural right, but also of a legal right arising out of the marriage relation. It is a wrongful interference with that which the law both confers and protects. A remedy, not provided by statute, but springing from the flexibility of the common law and its adaptability to the changing nature of human affairs, has long existed for the redress of the wrongs of the husband. As the wrongs of the wife are the same in principle and are caused by acts of the same nature as those of the husband, the remedy should be the same. What reason is there for any distinction? Is there not the same concurrence of loss and injury in the one case as in the other? Why should he have a right of action for the loss of her society unless she also has a right of action for the loss of his society? Does not the principle that 'the law will never suffer an injury and a damage without a remedy' apply with equal force to either case? Since her society has a value to him capable of admeasurement in damages, why is his society of no legal value to her? Does not she need the protection of the law in this respect at least as much as he does? Will the law give its aid to him and withhold it from her?" 116 N.Y. 584, 590, 23 N.E. 17 (6 L.R.A. 553).

What is here said about "natural right" and the "flexibility of the common law" is equally applicable to an action for criminal conversation. If the husband has such an action, why should not the wife? The reasons for giving the action to the one are as potent for giving the action to the other, as I have above demonstrated. The common law is not rigid and inflexible, a thing dead to all surrounding and changing conditions, it does expand with reason. The common law is not a compendium of mechanical rules, written in fixed and indelible characters, but a living organism which grows and moves in response to the larger and fuller development of the nation. In Colwell v. Tinker, 169 N.Y. 531, 62 N.E. 668, 58 L.R.A. 765, 98 Am.St.Rep. 587, this court said regarding an action for criminal conversation brought by a husband:

"While loss of service is usually pleaded in this form of action, yet its real foundation is the personal injury inflicted upon the husband. The offense charged is a most grievous wrong against social order and society; it strikes at the foundations of the home and the legitimacy of offspring. The husband, who is entitled to live with his wife and enjoy her society in the marriage relation, finds himself humiliated and to a certain extent disgraced by a public scandal; the marriage bed is dishonored; his domestic peace and comfort are destroyed, and he is subjected to great mental suffering." 169 N.Y. 531, 536, 62 N.E. 668, 670 (58 L.R.A. 765, 98 Am.St.Rep. 587).

Are we prepared to say that humiliation, disgrace, dishonor and mental suffering afflict a husband but do not afflict a wife? The law is not so foolish. The United States Supreme Court in this same case (193 U.S. 473, 24 S.Ct. 505, 48 L.Ed. 754) said:

"Many of the cases hold that the essential injury to the husband consists in the defilement of the marriage bed, in the invasion of his exclusive right to marital intercourse with his wife and to beget his own children. This is a right of the highest kind, upon the thorough maintenance of which the whole social order rests, and in order to the maintenance of the action it may properly be described as a property right." 196 U.S. 484, 24 S.Ct. 507 (48 L.Ed. 754).

With the exception of the begetting of children, all these reasons apply equally to the wife. As I have above stated, his interest in the begetting of his own children is equalized by the wife's interest in having a clean man and healthy children. In fact, there has been no objection raised anywhere to the right of the wife to maintain the action for criminal conversation, except the plea that the ancient law did not give it to her. Reverence for antiquity demands no such denial. Courts exist for the purpose of ameliorating the harshness of ancient laws inconsistent with modern progress, when it can be done without interfering with vested rights. . . .

For the reasons here stated, the judgment of the Appellate Division must be modified, by granting a new trial, and, as so modified, affirmed, with costs in this court and Appellate Division to abide the event.

DAILY v. PARKER.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1945.
152 F.2d 174, 162 A.L.R. 819.

EVANS, CIRCUIT JUDGE. The instant appeal raises this question: Have children, living in Pennsylvania, a cause of action for damages against a woman living in Illinois who caused their father to leave them, their mother, and their home and go to Chicago and live with her and to refuse to further contribute to their maintenance and support? The District Court answered the question in the negative and dismissed the complaint.

An answer to the question necessitates its being broken into several narrower inquiries: (a) Will the Federal Court recognize and enforce such a cause of action in the absence of any direct holding by the state court upholding such cause of action? (b) Should a State or Federal Court recognize such a cause of action in the absence of legislation by the state granting such a cause of action to the minor children? (c) Is there anything in the Illinois or Pennsylvania constitutions or statutes which prevents this court from recognizing such a cause of action in the plaintiffs?

After study and reflection, we answer all three questions in plaintiffs' favor.

Plaintiffs are the four minor children of Mrs. Olive Means Daily and Wilfred J. Daily. They bring this action through their mother as next Friend, against the defendant, Mrs. Marian Parker, who they allege, enticed their father from his and their home and to go to Chicago where he lives with defendant, a married woman, and they further allege that their father fails and refuses to maintain or support them or their home. All of this conduct or misconduct on their father's part is allegedly due to defendant's successful efforts in using her feminine charms, to entice and lure said father from his home that he might live and cohabit with defendant in Chicago.

Our approach to the question must be based on a study of the rights and obligations of all who are parties to a family. The father, the mother, and the children ordinarily constitute the family. Each is entitled to the society and the companionship of the others. Within the limits of the others' abilities, each is entitled to the financial aid and support of the others, although generally speaking, the children in their tender years can contribute nothing, and the wife, in view of her place in the home, may make but small financial contribution to the family exchequer. The children are entitled to shelter, food, clothing, and schooling and to the social, the moral support, guidance, and protection of their father, though in turn they can contribute only companionship and the inspiration which comes from their association in the family circle.

Is the family relationship and the rights of the different members therein, arising therefrom, sufficient to support a cause of action in each, the father, mother, or children, against one who breaks it up and destroys rights of the said individual members?

Appellee concedes that such a cause of action exists in favor of the father and within certain limits and certain jurisdictions, also in favor of the wife. She denies that such a cause of action, however, exists in favor of the children.

The history of the development of the family and the family relations and the duties and obligations of the members of the family is a long one, covering centuries. Its development was slow, due to society's acceptance of the relative positions of the parties in the family and its reluctance to change such status. The husband was lord and master, and the rights of all of the members of the family were merged in him. He ruled. He spoke in the first person singular in all matters. He spoke authoritatively for all. Through the centuries, however, there came slowly a change. The father is still the master, it may be said, but the duties of the master have changed. Where it was said to be his duty to rule, he now serves. He recognizes rights of the others and his obligation to meet them.

Perhaps he is still the titular head of the family. If so, his position merely carries with it greater duties and obligations. The duties of each member of the family are measured (at least in theory and in legal conception) by the position, the role, each takes in the family. Thus we see the wife, the breadwinner, and speaking for the family when the husband becomes incapacitated through sickness or invalidism. And children of tender years take on the family financial burdens when father is incapacitated and mother must attend him or for other reasons is unable to contribute to the financial support of the family. Relativity of rights and duties marks the rights and the obligations of the group and relativity is determined in each case by the situation of the family. But relativity does not eliminate or destroy the rights of any member.

It is this conception of the family which must constitute our approach to the question at hand.

Another factor deserving consideration is the division which we must make of the rights of children. For the purpose of considering redress of such rights, we divide them into two groups. (a) The right to recover for injuries which arise from their right to support and maintenance from their parent. These rights are financial in character. (b) The right to recover for injuries to feelings and damages which arise from their rights to the comfort, the protection and the society of the father.

Defendant argues that such rights as here asserted have never been, and should not now be, recognized by any court until and unless legislation has been enacted creating such right. She argues that in the past, children's rights have not been judicially recognized, save after legislative enactment and she points to various specific acts¹ which the Illinois Legislature enacted to give rights which were not previously recognized. Particularly does she contend that the Federal Court should not exercise its power to grant redress in such cases where the state courts have not seen fit to recognize it.

Plaintiffs, on the other hand, rely upon the maxim, Ubi Jus Ibi Remedium. Also they refer to the bill of rights of the Illinois Constitution (sec. 19, Art. 2, Smith-Hurd Stats.) where it is provided "Every person ought to find a certain remedy in the laws for all injuries and wrongs which he may receive in his person, property or reputation." They contend that the absence of precedent affords no justification for denial of a common law remedy where the right of an individual has been invaded by the wrongful act of another. Kujok v. Goldman, 150 N.Y. 176, 44 N.E. 773, 34 L.R.A. 156, 55 Am.St.Rep. 670; Pavesich v. New England Life Ins. Co., 122 Ga. 190, 50 S.E. 68, 69 L.R.A. 101, 106 Am.St.Rep. 104, 2 Ann.Cas. 561; Kine v. Zuckerman, 4 Pa. Dist. & Co. R. 227; Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N.Y. 584, 23 N.E. 17, 6 L.R.A. 553.

Instead of holding that there is no remedy, because there is no precedent, they argue for what they assert to be the better rule, and what Dean Pound calls judicial empiricism. In other words, the common law has been and is sufficiently elastic to meet changing conditions. We quote from Dean Pound's book, "The Spirit of the Common Law," page 183:

"Anglo-American law is fortunate indeed in entering upon a new period of growth with a well-established doctrine of law-making by judicial decision. . . . Undoubtedly . . . judicial empiricism was proceeding over-cautiously at the end of the last century.

¹The Dram Shop Act, Smith-Hurd Ill. Ann. Stat., ch. 43, § 135; Lord Campbell's Act; Patelski v. Snyder, 179 Ill. App. 24.

. . . If the last century insisted over-much upon predetermined premises, and a fixed technique, it did not lose to our law the method of applying the judicial experience of the past to the judicial questions of the present."

Also quoted and relied upon are Pollock in his 1939 edition of "Torts," and Cooley in his Third Edition of "Torts," page 464, dealing with the subject of Family Rights.

Our conclusion, without going further into the matter, is that a child today has a right enforceable in a court of law, against one who has invaded and taken from said child the support and maintenance of its father, as well as damages for the destruction of other rights which arise out of the family relationship and which have been destroyed or defeated by a wrongdoing third party. Likewise, we are persuaded that because such rights have not heretofore been recognized, is not a conclusive reason for denying them. They will be denied if it appears that the state court has spoken and denied them. If said rights have not been denied in the state court, we see no reason why the Federal Courts should be more prone to deny them or to grant them than a state court. If the state courts have not acted, we are free to take the course which sound judgment demands. In the absence of a state court ruling our duty is tolerably clear. It is to decide, not avoid, the question.

We have considered the other contentions of the defendant and conclude that they need not be given separate treatment. They all seem to grow out of the age-old philosophy—"whatever is, is right." Probably no institution has given life and breath to this thought as freely as the judiciary. They are ever looking for precedents, as they should be. If none be found, however, they may not give up,—lost in darkness. The situation is not hopeless. In a society as complex as ours, rare is the situation where precedents cannot be found. And even in the common law, in 1945, if no precedents be found, courts can hardly be advisedly called radical if they indulge in lawmaking by decisions, or in a word, engage in judicial empiricism.

On this subject of the family and the rights and obligations of its members there has been a change in the accepted view of the status of the wife and the children. The courts have been rather slow to follow this accepted change. But they have belatedly accepted it and when once they accepted the change they have made law by their decisions.²

In announcing this law, they have applied recognized principles to new or newly accepted views of the political and social conditions revolving about the family and the status of each member thereof. After the first decisions are announced, there has usually been prompt acceptance of the view by other courts.

² . . . Milliken v. Long, 188 Pa. 411, 41 A. 540; Kine v. Zuckerman, 4 Pa. Dist. & Co. R. 227; Graham v. Wallace, 50 App.Div. 101, 63 N.Y.S. 372; Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N.Y. 584, 23 N.E. 17, 6 L.R.A. 553; Waldron v. Waldron, O.C., 45 F. 315.

It might, and probably will be argued, in this case, if it is ever submitted to a jury, that plaintiffs were not and could not be damaged by the loss of their father's society. This, however, would be a factual argument, not an application of the maxim, damnum absque injuria.

There is, we must confess, weight to the argument that no loss was suffered when the children were deprived of the society of a father who deserted them to run away with a married woman and who left his wife and children to struggle as best they could with the task of making a livelihood. In other words, before there can be a loss measured in damages, there must be something to lose. And a father should have at least a shadow of character before his loss can be said to create a claim for damages in his children. This question of the amount of damages is, however, for the jury and the loss of financial support conceding there was nothing lost in the way of society when the father left his family, is still present.

The judgment is reversed with directions to proceed in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

SECTION 3. THREE EARLY LAW REFORMING STATUTES

STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER II (In consimili casu)

13 Edw. I, Ch. 24 (1285).

... whensoever from henceforth it shall happen in the Chancery that there is to be found a writ in one case, but not in another case although involving the same law and requiring the same remedy, the clerks of the Chancery shall agree in farming a writ, or else they shall adjourn the plaintiffs to the next Parliament, or else they shall write down the points upon which they cannot agree and refer them to the next Parliament, and so a writ shall be framed by the consent of the learned in the law; to the end that the court from henceforth shall no longer fail those who seek justice.

(As translated in Plucknett, "A Concise History of the Common Law," 3rd Ed. 1940, 28.)

Hanbury, "Modern Equity", 3rd Ed., (1943), p. 2, f.n. 3, states:

"The relation of the development of the action on the case to the statute (in consimili casu) has recently formed the battleground of interesting controversy. The traditional view is that though the action on the case existed before the statute, it was the statute that facilitated its crystallization as trespass on the case. A more modern view is that the action owed its origin to the statute, and existed in no form prior to 1285. This view, as is pointed out by P. A. Landon, in 52 L.Q.R. 68, ignores the implications of the Provisions of Oxford, which were purposeless if they were not enacted to check the attempted expansion by the Chancellor of the older writs. Professor T. Plucknett has gone to the opposite extreme, in maintaining in 31 Col.L.R. 778, that the action on the case is quite unconnected with the statute. He defends his view in 52 L.Q.R. 220, in reply to Mr. Landon's article in the same volume. Sir William Holdsworth describes it in 47 L.Q.R. 334 as 'a startling thesis'. Professor Plucknett has promised, but not yet provided, a constructive theory to replace that which he seeks to destroy. Miss Dix, in a very learned article in 46 Yale L.J. 1142, takes a middle path. She holds that the statute was interpreted in a very conservative spirit, and ascribes the origin and development of the action on the case to the ever-widening horizon of mediaeval judges."

THE STATUTE OF USES

27 Hen. VIII c. 10 (1535).

Where by the common laws of this realm, lands, tenements and hereditaments be not devisable by testament, (2) nor ought to be transferred from one to another, but by solemn livery and seisin, matter of record, writing sufficient made bona fide, without covin or fraud; (3) yet nevertheless divers and sundry imaginations, subtle inventions and practices have been used, whereby the hereditaments of this realm have been conveyed from one to another by fraudulent feoffments, fines, recoveries and other assurances craftily made to secret uses, intents and trusts; (4) and also by wills and testaments, sometime made by nude parolx and words, sometime by signs and tokens, and sometime by writing, and for the most part made by such persons as we visited with sickness, in their extreme agonies and pains, or at such time as they have scantly had any good memory or remembrance; (5) at which times they being provoked by greedy and covetous persons lying in wait about them, do many times dispose indiscreetly and unadvisedly their lands and inheritances; (6) by reason whereof, and by occasion of which fraudulent feoffments, fines, recoveries and other like assurances to uses, confidences and trusts, divers and many heirs have been unjustly at sundry times disherited, the lords have lost their wards, marriages, reliefs, harriots, escheats, aids pur fair fils chivalier & pur file marier, (7) and scantly any person can be certainly assured of any lands by them purchased, nor know surely against whom they shall use their actions or executions for their rights, titles and duties; (8) also men married have lost their tenancies by the curtesy, (9) women their dowers, (10) manifest perjuries by trial of such secret wills and uses have been committed; (11) the King's highness hath lost the profits and advantages of the lands of persons attainted, (12) and of the lands craftily put in feoffments to the uses of aliens born, (13) and also the profits of waste for a year and a day of lands of felons attainted, (14) and the lords their escheats thereof; (15) and many other inconveniences have happened, and daily do increase among the King's subjects, to their great trouble and inquietness, and to the utter subversion of the ancient common laws of this realm; (16) for the extirping and extinguishment of all such subtle practiced feoffments, fines, recoveries, abuses and errors heretofore used and accustomed in this realm, to the subversion of the good and ancient laws for the same, and to the intent that the King's highness, or any other his subjects of this realm, shall not in any wise hereafter by any means or inventions be deceived, damaged or hurt, by reason of such trusts, uses or confidences: (17) it may please the King's most royal majesty, That it may be enacted by his Highness, by the assent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, in manner and form following, that is to say,

That where any person or persons stand or be seized, or at any time hereafter shall happen to be seized, of and in any honours, castles, manors, lands, tenements, rents, services, reversions, remainders or other hereditaments, to the use, confidence or trust of any other person or persons, or of any body politick, by reason of any bargain, sale, feoffment, fine, recovery, covenant, contract, agreement, will or otherwise, by any manner means whatsoever it be; that in every such case, all and every such person and persons, the bodies politick, that have or hereafter shall have any such use, confidence or trust, in fee simple, fee tail, for term of life or for years, or otherwise, or any use, confidence or trust, in remainder or reverter, shall from henceforth stand and be seized, deemed and adjudged in lawful seisin, estate and possession of and in the same honours, castles, manors, lands, tenements, rents, services, reversions, remainders and hereditaments, with their appurtenances, to all intents, constructions and purposes in the law, of and in such like estates as they had or shall have in use, trust or confidence of or in the same; (19) and that the estate, title, right and possession that was in such person or persons that were, or hereafter shall be seized of any lands, tenements or hereditaments, to the use, confidence or trust of any such person or persons, or of any body politick, be from henceforth clearly deemed and adjudged to be in him or them that have, or hereafter shall have, such use, confidence or trust, after such quality, manner, form and condition as they had before, in or to the use, confidence or trust that was in them. . . .

WIMBISH v. TAILBOIS

Common Bench, 1550. 1 Plowden 38, 75 E.R. 63.

Cook, Serjeant, recited the case briefly in this manner. You, my Lords, have well understood how that Thomas Wimbish and Elizabeth his wife have sued an action of trespass against Elizabeth Tailbois for a trespass done in land; and the defendant saith, that long before the trespass supposed, one George Tailbois, Knight, grandfather of the wife of the plaintiff, whose heir she is, was seized of the place where, &c. in his demesne as of fee, and being so seized, he, by his deed shewn forth thereof infeoffed the Bishop of Winchester and others in fee, to the use of the said George Tailbois and of the said Elizabeth Tailbois, then being his wife, and the heirs of their two bodies begotten, and for default of such issue, to the use of the said George Tailbois in general tail, by force whereof the said bishop and others his co-feoffees were seized in fee to the uses aforesaid; and she shews in particular that some of the feoffees died, and the others survived them and were seized in fee to the uses aforesaid until the Statute of 27 Hen. 8. of Uses was made, by force of which the said George Tailbois and Elizabeth his wife were seized of the said land in their demesne as of fee tail, and being so seized, the said George Tailbois died, and the said Elizabeth his wife, now defendant, survived him, and was thereof sole seized in her demesne as of fee tail by right of survivorship; and she gives colour to the plaintiffs, and so justifies. And the plaintiffs by their replication say, that well and true it is, that the aforesaid George Tailbois, grandfather of the said Elizabeth, the plaintiff was seized of the said land in fee, and thereof infeoffed the said bishop and the others to the uses aforesaid in manner and form aforesaid, and that some of the said feoffees died, and that the survivors were seized to the uses aforesaid until the statute of 27 Hen. 8. was made, in manner and form as is alleged. And further they say, that after the death of the said George Tailbois, one William Tailbois brought a formedon in descender for the said land against the said Elizabeth, now defendant, and recovered at the first day by ment dedire, and that the feme tenant was not amerced because she came the first day: and the said plaintiffs by protestation say, that the said William Tailbois was not cousin and heir in tail to the aforesaid donees, supposed by his formedon, and for plea further say, that the said recovery was by covin had between the said William Tailbois and the said Elizabeth Tailbois, now defendant, without the assent or consent of the said plaintiffs, or either of them. And further they say, that the wife of the plaintiff, at the time of the said formedon purchased, and of the judgment given, was the same person to whom the interest and title of the said land belongs after the decease of the said Elizabeth Tailbois; by reason of which premisses the said plaintiffs, as in right of the said wife of the plaintiff, by virtue of a certain Act of Parliament made in the eleventh year of the reign of King Henry the Seventh, entered into the said land, and thereof were seized in their demesne as of fee tail in right of the said wife of the plaintiff, viz. to them and to the heirs of the body of the said wife of the plaintiff begotten, until the defendant entered, and did the trespass; and upon this the defendant has demurred in judgment. And it seems to me that the plaintiffs shall be barred, for the replication is not good for divers causes. One cause is, because the plaintiffs in the replication have not shewn certainly how the wife of the plaintiff is heir to the tail, but have averred generally that the wife of the plaintiff is the same person, to whom the interest and title, after the death of the defendant, belongs; and this is not good. For the statute of 11 H. 7. cap. 20. saith, that upon a recovery by covin, it shall be lawful for the person, to whom the interest, title, or inheritance, after the death of such women, belongs, to enter into the same tenements. And then such person as will enter for such cause, ought to shew certainly how the title or inheritance, after the death of the woman, belongs to him, and so ought the wife of the plaintiff here, as to say, that she was the daughter of A., son and heir of the aforesaid George Tailbois and Elizabeth his wife, begotten of their bodies, and upon this issue might arise, as that A. was a bastard, or upon such like matter; but here it altogether wants certainty. . . .

MOUNTAGUE, CHIEF JUSTICE. It seems to me, that for one defect only in the replication the plaintiffs shall not have judgment. First it seems to me, that covin is well averred without special cause shewn. For covin (according to the true definition of it) is a secret agreement determined in the hearts of two or more men, to the prejudice of another. As if tenant for life will secretly conspire with another, that the other shall recover to the prejudice of the reversioner, for by this his reversion should be taken away; and this conspiracy is and may be termed covin, for all the parts of the definition of covin are there fully performed, for there is an union of their two hearts, and it is done secretly, and it is to the prejudice of a third person, and so it is a perfect covin without defect or blemish. And, sir, this covin to have a recovery may be as well where the title of the recovery is good, as where it is feint or bad. . . .

And as to the . . . exception taken, because it was not shewn certainly how the wife of the plaintiff was heir, it seems to me, that for this cause only the replication is bad. For it is a learning in our law, that replications, titles, pleas in abatement of writs, and estoppels ought to comprehend certainty. . . .

And with regard to the words, sir, the first part of the statute 11 H. 7 (which is in the disjunctive) saith, that if any woman who hath had, or afterwards shall have, any estate in dower, for term of life, or in tail, jointly with her husband, or solely to herself, or to her own use, in any tenements, &c. of the inheritance or purchase of the husband, &c. so that the estate in dower may not be referred to in these words, jointly with her husband, for a woman cannot have an estate in dower jointly with her husband, but these words, jointly with her husband, shall be referred to the two other estates, viz. for life, or in tail, and here the estate is in tail, and so within the words. But then the estate is referred to the things following, viz. in manors, lands, tenements, or other hereditaments; and, sir, here it cannot be denied but that the estate is an hereditament, that is to say, in the use, for a use is an hereditament. . . . And then all the words of the statute are satisfied, for here the woman has an estate, what estate? an estate tail; in what? in an hereditament? what hereditament? a use; in what manner? jointly with her husband; how? to her own use; of whose inheritance? of the inheritance of the husband; and so all the words of the first disjunctive sentence are fully performed in the case here. And if the case was not within the words of the first disjunctive sentence, yet should it be within the words of the second disjunctive sentence, which is, or given to the husband and wife in tail by any person seized to the use of the husband, &c. For it cannot be here denied but that the feoffees were seized to the use of the husband until the statute of 27 H. 8, was made, for if they were seized to the use of the husband and wife, ergo they were seized to the use of the husband. And the husband had the entire use, and the wife the entire use, for there are no moieties between husband and wife. And when the statute of 27 H. 8, was made, it gave the land to them that had the use. It is to be seen then, who shall be adjudged in law the donor after the execution of the possession to the use. And, sir, the Parliament, (which is nothing but a Court) may not be adjudged the donor. For what the Parliament did was only a conveyance of the land from one to another, and a conveyance by Parliament does not make the Parliament donor; but it seems to me that the feoffees to use shall be the donors, for when a gift is made by Parliament, every person in the realm is privy to it, and assents to it, but yet the thing shall pass from him that has the most right and authority to give it. As if cestuy que use, and his feoffees join in a feoffment, it shall be said the feoffment of the feoffees, for they have the greatest authority to give it. And if tenant for life, and he in the reversion, join in a feoffment, it shall be adjudged the livery of the tenant for life, because he has the greatest authority to do it. And so if one who is seised in fee of land, and another who has nothing in it join in a feoffment, it shall be said the feoffment of him that hath right, and the confirmation of the other. So here it shall be said the gift of the feoffees by Parliament, and the assent and confirmation of all others. For if it should be adjudged the gift of any other, then the Parliament would do a wrong to the feoffees in taking a thing from them, and making another the donor of it. . . .

And here the land is by the Act of Parliament removed from the owners, that is to say, the feoffees, to the cestuy que use, and the statute would do wrong if it should not adjudge them the donors, for they have the greatest authority to give it, and the Parliament is only a conveyance, and therefore it shall be adjudged the gift of the feoffees by Parliament, and so the gift of the feoffees who were seized to the use of the husband, and then within the words of the second disjunctive sentence of the statute of 11 H. 7. And if the feoffees should not be adjudged the donors, then George Tailbois should, but this seems repugnant for him to be taken to be donor to himself, and therefore the feoffees shall be adjudged the donors ut supra, and so within the words of the statute. And if the case here was out of the words, yet it should be within the equity of the statute. For it is to be considered, that the statute was made for the redress of false covin, and to give a speedier remedy to right. And all such statutes are in advancement of justice, and beneficial to the public weal, and therefore shall be extended by equity. And although it restrains the liberty of tenant in tail, sir, every statute, which shall be extended by equity, restrains some body, and is penal to some body. But yet inasmuch as it is beneficial to the greater number, it shall be taken by equity, and so is this statute, for it tends to the suppression of deceit, and to the advancement of truth. * * *

For which reasons it seems to me that the case here is within the words of the statute of 11 H. 7. And if it be not, yet it is within the equity of it, and so the entry of the plaintiffs is maintainable: but for the said single fault in the replication they shall not recover.

And so note, that all the justices held the case here within the words of the statute of 11 H. 7. and if it was not within the words, that yet it was within the equity of the statute. And they held also, that the heir might enter immediately, that is to say, in the life of the tenant in tail. But no judgment was given.

Jenks, "Short History of English Law", at p. 100 says:

"The fate of the Statute of Uses is one of the most curious in legal history. Its secret and unavowed purpose, of securing the estates of the monasteries for the Crown, it accomplished. Its ostensible purpose, fortified by a wealth of hypocritical justification, it entirely failed to achieve. Not only were devises of lands, after a brief interval, put on a legal footing; but, as is well known, uses of lands, as distinguished from legal estates, soon re-appeared in full vigour. Whilst, in unforeseen directions, the statute worked havoc in the mediaeval system of conveyancing; and gradually modernized it out of existence".

Hanbury, "Modern Equity", 3rd Ed. (1943), at p. 20, after discussing the repeal of the Statute of Uses by the Law of Property Act, 1925, comments:

"The Statute of Uses had purposes that were purely ephemeral, and modern society has long outgrown them. It was in 1925, like an obstinate centenarian that would not die, but though of no use in the world, was determined before he quitted it, to be the cause of as much trouble and annoyance to his juniors as his foolish and capricious brain could invent. Lord Birkenhead never spoke a truer word than when he alluded to the Statute of Uses as having 'no contact of any kind with our modern life'".

Chancery, 1678. 3 Swans App 661, 36 E.R. 1014.

LORD NOTTINGHAM. The bill was to execute a parol agreement before the late act for prevention of frauds and perjuries (29 Car. 2, c. 3), but the bill itself was exhibited since the act; for which cause the Defendant demurred, supposing the new act had barred this suit; but I overruled the demurrer; for the act was not to be construed with a retrospection and to bar agreements precedent, but did only look forward and provide for the future (4 H. 7, 10, pl. 6; 10 H. 7, 22; Jenk, 233, pl. 6.; Jaques v. Withy, 1 H.Bl. 65); the rather because all acts which restrain the common law ought themselves to be restrained by exposition. And I said that I had some reason to know the meaning of this law; for it had its first rise from me, who brought it in the bill into the Lord's House, though it afterwards received some additions and improvements from the Judges and the civilians. And the counsellors at the bar cited another case in the King's Bench this very term, where the same point being specially found, was so likewise adjudged upon argument; which I was glad to hear of; but said, if they had adjudged it otherwise, I should not have altered my opinion. . . .

BROWNE, STATUTE OF FRAUDS

Boston: 1895. Little, Brown, and Co., 5 ed., vii-viii.

. . . The real object and scope of the statute would seem to extend far beyond all questions of the integrity of witnesses, and to comprehend the exclusion of merely oral testimony in certain classes of transactions, as at best of an uncertain and deceptive character. In estimating the value of this enactment, therefore, the important question is not whether the statute has in its practical working let in as much perjury as it has excluded, for no strictness of legislation can bar out from a court of justice the man who deliberately purposes to commit perjury; but it is whether, in the average of large experience since the statute was enacted, the requisition of written testimony in certain cases has not materially served to secure the property of men against illegal and groundless claims. That it has done so will scarcely be disputed, and to the profound practical wisdom with which it was conceived to this end the most enlightened judges and jurists have at all times borne emphatic testimony.

Nevertheless it cannot be said to have been judicially administered with a firm hand and in a consistent spirit. Within a few years after its enactment, and before the generation of its framers had passed away, we find the courts admitting exceptions and distinctions as to its application, and forcing upon it constructions tending to restrict its beneficial operation. In later days there has been evinced, on the whole, a disposition to return to a closer interpretation of its provisions; but even now there are doctrines, too firmly settled by precedent to be overthrown, which, from their very inconsistency with the spirit of the statute, lead continually to great embarrassment in its administration. . . .

1. Street, "Foundations of Legal Liability" (1906), Vol. II, 168:

"Absence of legislative interference is a feature which characterizes in a striking way the account thus far given of the development of English Contract law. We come now to a notable instance of such interference. We refer to the Statute of Frauds (1677), an enactment by which certain simple contracts are required to be in writing." Cf. Rabel, "The Statute of Frauds and Comparative Legal History", 63 L.Q.Rev. 174 (1947).

2. See Hening, "The Original Drafts of the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. II, c. 3), and their Authors", 61 U.Pa.L.Rev. 283 (1913), and Costigan, "The Date and Authorship of the Statute of Frauds", 26 Harv.L.Rev. 329 (1913), both discussing what today would be called the "legislative history" of the statute.

3. Perhaps the great significance of the Statute of Frauds to the student of legal method is the huge gloss of case law that has grown around Section 4, particularly on the following points:

- (1) what constitutes a sufficient memorandum;
 - (2) the doctrine of part performance (wholly judge-made in so far as Section 4 is concerned);
 - (3) whether the statute is substantive or procedural;
 - (4) the rule that the statute cannot be used as an instrument of fraud, that it is "not a sword but a shield" etc.

STEFAN A. RIESENFELD AND WILLIAM E. MUSSMAN, SURETYSHIP AND THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS

The year 1677 marks a very important although probably not altogether propitious event in the history of Anglo-American law. In that year the celebrated Statute of Frauds was enacted, mainly through the joint efforts of Lord Nottingham and Chief Justice North together with other famous contemporary jurists including, in all likelihood, Sir Matthew Hale. Hardly any lawyer will disagree that this act and its American counterparts have been among the most controversial and most frequently litigated pieces of legislation in English speaking countries.

The first treatise on the Statute known to the writers appeared a little more than 125 years after its enactment, and in the preface the author informs us that from the days of Lord Mansfield ". . . a diversity of sentiment has prevailed with respect to the utility of the great Statute of Frauds and Perjuries." Surveying the pronouncements for and against the act he concluded that they were fairly balanced. But in recent days the current of opinion seems to have swung to a condemnation of both the wisdom and beneficial effect of the statute, although voices of praise have not been silenced entirely.

While in fact most of the provisions of this once very comprehensive act have been either repealed or incorporated into other statutes by the British Parliament in the course of time, the famous section 4 requiring a writing for certain types of agreements, among them contracts of guarantee, and section 23 are still in force in the original version. And it is the very section 4, which was inserted in the original draft only at a later stage, that has come to be regarded as the very heart of the statute of frauds.

It is certainly significant that in the country of its origin the English Law Revision Committee recommended in 1937 the repeal of section 4 which contains, in addition to provisions relating to other types of contracts, the famous reference to "any special promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another person." With negligible differences in phraseology, it is reiterated in all American statutes of frauds. The most interesting point for our purpose is the fact that while the Law Revision Committee in general was in agreement upon the advisability of the repeal of the section there was a split with reference to contracts of guarantee. The majority stated explicitly that they had considered the question ". . . whether we ought to recommend that the contract of guarantee should be treated separately . . . by providing that a signed writing should be made essential for this type of promise," but that they had reached a negative conclusion. The minority conversely requested ". . . that it should be provided that a guarantee is to be invalid unless the terms thereof (other than consideration, if any) have been embodied in a written instrument and signed by the guarantor."

The majority of the committee based its position on the ground that first and foremost the Act was a product of conditions in the law of evidence which have long since passed away, that it promoted frauds rather than prevented them, that the selection of promises to be in writing was arbitrary and haphazard, that it was out of step normal business practice, that it was partial and lopsided in its operation and ambiguous and ill drawn. The minority took its stand with respect to guarantees not because the writing would prevent "frauds and perjuries" but for the reason that it would give ". . . the proposed surety an opportunity of pausing and considering, not only the nature of the obligation he is undertaking but also its terms."

In the United States as in England the courts have struggled with the provisions of the statutes of frauds of the various states and a formidable body of case law has developed. And just as in the country of its origin, so the American courts have whittled away much of the literal meaning of the provisions of the statute. While the basic purpose of the act—to secure defendants against unfounded and fraudulent claims—has never been obscure, the courts have had almost insurmountable difficulties in devising a simple and workable scheme of promises without and within the statute. . . .

It is true that the origins of the statute place it in line with a general European trend during the seventeenth century which considered the requirement of a written memorandum as a cure-all for a multitude of evils—particularly the danger of perjury; and it is also true that its various drafts show that the framers of the statute pursued no consistent theory of their own. Nevertheless, the section which we have discussed has become a corrective to certain expansions of the doctrine of consideration. Apparently the courts have felt that promises of guaranty, while binding (although the benefit might enure only to the principal), should not be enforceable unless their formality demonstrates that they were made and not made rashly. The exclusion of situations which fall under the scope of the entire credit test and the independent economic advantage rule in fact takes account of the well-acknowledged informality of commercial contracts.

Underlying the whole problem of the abolition of the statute is a question of fundamental policy. If the section discussed performs the function of correcting certain dangers flowing from the liberalization of the doctrine of consideration, it certainly will not be kindly treated by anyone who believes that modern conditions require that any oral promise which is not directed to an illegal object should be binding under all circumstances. If, on the other hand, it is considered to be a principle of sound legal policy that the promisee must have been justified in relying on the promise, the requirement of certain formalities for promises made where the promisee knows that only himself or a relative or friend of the promisor received an advantage is not so shocking as some critics like to insist.

SECTION 4. LEGISLATION IN AID OF THE COURTS

CROWLEY v. LEWIS

Court of Appeals of New York, 1925. 239 N.Y. 264, 146 N.E. 374.

ANDREWS, J. The question involved on this appeal is whether a contract under seal may be enforced against persons not parties to the instrument on the theory that they are undisclosed principals in whose behalf the contract was executed.

"We find no authority for the proposition that a contract under seal may be turned into the simple contract of a person not in any way appearing on its face to be a party to or interested in it, on proof dehors the instrument, that the nominal party was acting as the agent of another, and especially in the absence of any proof that the alleged principal has received any benefit from it, or has in any way ratified it, and we do not feel at liberty to extend the doctrine applied to simple contracts executed by an agent for an unnamed principal so as to embrace this case." Briggs v. Partridge, 64 N.Y. 357, 365, 21 Am.Rep. 617.

Neither do we find any authority since 1876 in this court for the proposition. Briggs v. Partridge has been cited by us many times, with no hint of disapproval. Kiersted v. Orange & A. R. R. Co., 69 N.Y. 343, 25 Am.Rep. 199; Beardsley v. Duntley, 69 N.Y. 577; Williams v. Gillies, 75 N.Y. 197; Schaefer v. Henkel, 75 N.Y. 378; Tut-hill v. Wilson, 90 N.Y. 423; Whitford v. Laidler, 94 N.Y. 145, 46 Am. Rep. 131; Henricus v. Englert, 137 N.Y. 488, 33 N.E. 550; Elliott v. Brady, 192 N.Y. 221, 85 N.E. 69, 18 L.R.A., N.S., 600, 127 Am.St.Rep. 898; Case v. Case, 203 N.Y. 263, 96 N.E. 440, Ann.Cas.1913B, 311. We repeat that we do not feel at liberty to change a rule so well understood and so often enforced. If such a change is to be made it must be by legislative fiat.

Certainly nothing was said in Harris v. Shorall (230 N.Y. 343, 130 N.E. 572), which indicated any such disposition upon our part, even had the language there used been necessary for the decision. As there pointed out, the importance of the seal in this state has been much diminished, and we referred to certain cases bearing upon the question as to whether a contract under seal might be varied or discharged by a parol agreement and to some conflict upon this point, and we gave some intimation that we might be ready to follow the suggestion made by us upon this subject in Thomson v. Poor, 147 N.Y. 402, 42 N.E. 13. We had no thought, however, that all distinctions between sealed and unsealed instruments were swept aside. Such an idea would have been impossible if for nothing else because of the rules contained in our statutes with regard to the limitations of actions. Equally impossible is such an idea with regard to the subject now before us. Thousands of sealed instruments must have been executed in reliance upon the authority of Briggs v. Partridge. Many times the seal must have been used for the express purpose of relieving the undisclosed principal from personal liability. It may not be unwise to preserve the distinction for this especial purpose. But whether wise or unwise the distinction now exists.

The complaint asks for the specific performance of a contract under seal whereby the plaintiff agreed to exchange a deed conveying certain premises for a $35,000 mortgage upon other lands. The contract is annexed to the complaint, and it does not mention the respondents by name. It is signed by the plaintiff and the defendant Joseph H. Lewis, and all the covenants therein contained are the covenants of the parties thereto. The respondents are sought to be held simply upon the allegation that they were undisclosed principals of their agent Lewis. This may not be done.

The order appealed from should be affirmed, with costs, and the question certified to us should be answered in the negative.

NOTE

Walter E. Treador, at Cincinnati Conference on the Status of the Rule of Judicial Precedent, 14 U. of Cinc.L.Rev. 220, 227, said:

"Another case in the New York Court of Appeals is significant for our discussion, illustrating, after all, what the courts are really doing. It was a case back about 1925, in which the question before the New York Court of Appeals was whether or not a contract under seal made by an agent with a third party could be the basis of liability of an undisclosed principal.

"Of course, by that time, courts and legislatures had limited greatly the legal significance of seals; the doctrine of undisclosed principal and agent was well developed, and there was no question but that on an ordinary contract by an agent the third party could sue an undisclosed principal. So it looked very much as if the New York Court of Appeals would surely recognize that seals no longer should be given effect except where it was required by statute, and recognize, for the sake of symmetry in the doctrine of agency, that an undisclosed principal could be sued on a sealed instrument executed by his agent. I was teaching Agency in those days and I watched that case as it went up in the New York courts, because I thought the New York Court of Appeals would take advantage of such a fine opportunity to remove an anomaly from the law of agency. But the Court of Appeals said that it would not reverse the doctrine of Briggs v. Partridge, that such doctrine was well established." [Crowley v. Lewis, 239 N.Y. 264, 146 N.E. 374.]

"Superficially it appeared to be a case of sticking to the doctrine of stare decisis with a vengeance; but that was not the real reason why the New York Court did not overrule the former decision. The New York Court of Appeals said that ever since that earlier decision, contracts under seal had been made between agents of undisclosed principals, and third parties, for the purpose of relieving the principal from liability to a third party. It had become a common device. The parties understood it. And the court concluded, in view of the fact that undoubtedly there were thousands of such contracts outstanding, that it was the wiser, sounder thing to leave the question of change to the Legislature of New York, whose action would be prospective, and not retrospective.

"The New York Court of Appeals recognized that the ancient historical justification for the rule had ceased; and it seemed to be a case for application of the old maxim that, Where the reason for a rule ends, with it should end the rule. But in the meantime, as the result of current practice, a new content had been put into the rule, so the New York Court of Appeals reached its decision, not because of blind adherence to the doctrine of stare decisis, but because there was a real, substantial situation of the present moment which that rule took care of, and for which the rule should be left. The court did not say that it was a wise rule, or an unwise rule, except to the extent that it was sound and just to protect those interests which definitely had arisen in reliance thereon."

Cf., however, Radin, "The Trail of the Calf," 32 Cornell L.Q. 137, 144-45, 151-152 (1946), who contends that it is only a "speculative assumption" to say that parties have relied on decisions of the courts, and that the legislature, in refraining from changing the law, must have known those decisions. COCHRAN v. TAYLOR

Court of Appeals of New York, 1937. 273 N.Y. 172, 7 N.E.2d 89.

RIPPEY, JUDGE. On October 20, 1934, an agreement in writing and under seal was executed in duplicate, duly acknowledged and delivered by and between defendant and one William B. Chenault, whereby the former gave to Chenault an option to buy certain real and personal property located in Allegany county, N. Y., for $115,000 at any time within 120 days thereafter upon terms and conditions therein specified, and agreed to sell and convey the same to Chenault on condition that Chenault should, within such period of time, give her written notice of his intention to buy. On November 13, 1934, defendant notified Chenault that she revoked, rescinded, and withdrew the offer to sell on the ground, as she asserted, that the contract was without consideration and was obtained from her through duress, fraud, and undue influence. Chenault assigned all of his interest in the agreement to plaintiff on December 21, 1934, and on January 11, 1935, the latter served the required notice of his election to buy. Complying with the provisions of the agreement, plaintiff demanded delivery within thirty days of abstracts of title and of a suitable instrument of conveyance. Upon refusal of defendant to perform, this action for specific performance was brought.

The answer put in issue the material allegations of the complaint. Additionally, defendant set up, as defenses, (1) that the agreement was only an offer to sell, was without consideration, and was revoked and withdrawn before acceptance and prior to the time of assignment to plaintiff who took the assignment with knowledge of the withdrawal and revocation; (2) that the option was not assignable and plaintiff acquired no interest by the assignment; and (3) that defendant's signature to the instrument and its delivery by her were obtained through imposition, fraud, and undue influence. A counterclaim was interposed for damages arising out of the recording of the instruments which, it was asserted, prevented defendant from disposing of her property and from enjoying the full use and benefit thereof, all of which was put in issue by the reply.

The trial court found that there was no valid acceptance or tender of performance by plaintiff or by Chenault and sustained the first two defenses mentioned. No finding or decision was made on the material question of fact as to whether the execution and delivery of the instrument were procured, as defendant asserts, by plaintiff or by Chenault or by both through imposition, undue influence, or fraud. The trial court specifically stated in his opinion that he limited his decision to holding that the option was nudum pactum, that defendant had a right to withdraw, revoke and cancel it, and that, since the option by its terms involved the extension of credit to Chenault, it was not assignable to plaintiff or, in any event, enforceable by plaintiff without a tender of a bond executed by Chenault. Judgment was entered dismissing the complaint, with costs. The Appellate Division in the Fourth Department affirmed by a divided court upon the findings of fact as made by the trial court. The judgment appealed from cannot be sustained unless it can be held, as matter of law, that the option was without consideration, was not assignable, and was not accepted according to its terms.

It is the rule that an offer or an option, not under seal or given for a consideration, may be revoked at any time before acceptance. 1 Williston on Contracts (Rev.Ed.1936) § 55; Petterson v. Pattberg, 248 N.Y. 86, 88, 161 N.E. 428; Boston & M. R. v. Bartlett, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 224. That rule has no application here. In the instant case the agreement was under seal and the receipt of a consideration was acknowledged and confessed. In the body of the instrument the parties recited that they attached their seals, thereby establishing their intention concerning the sealing of the instrument, and, at the end, added the seal in the form required by section 44 of the General Construction Law (Consol.Laws, c. 22). It cannot be successfully argued that the agreement was not a sealed instrument carrying with it all the force and implications attributable to an instrument so executed. The cases of Matter of Pirie, 198 N.Y. 209, 91 N.E. 587, 19 Ann.Cas. 672, and Empire Trust Co. v. Heinze, 242 N.Y. 475, 152 N.E. 266, hold nothing to the contrary. In the Pirie Case the seal was present but an expression of intent to make the instrument one under seal was lacking. In the Heinze Case the intention was expressed but the seal was lacking. . . .

The first statute in this state in any manner affecting the common-law rule as to the conclusive character of the seal was the act of 1828

(2 R.S. [1st Ed.] 406, pt. 3, ch. 7, tit. 3, § 77), which provided that the seal should be only "presumptive evidence of a sufficient consideration which may be rebutted in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if such instrument were not sealed." That act remained in effect until amended by chapter 448 of the Laws of 1876 (Code of Remedial Justice, § 840) to read: "A seal upon an executory instrument is only presumptive evidence of a sufficient consideration, which may be rebutted, as if the instrument was not sealed." In chapter 416 of the Laws of 1877 (Code Civ.Proc. § 840) the words "hereafter executed" were inserted after the first word "instrument." In that form the statute remained until 1920 (Civil Practice Act, § 342, enacted by Laws 1920, c. 925), when the words "hereafter executed" were stricken out and the statute, thus amended, continued to September 1, 1935. These statutory changes in the common-law rule refer only to the question of "sufficient consideration," and, as to the sufficiency of the consideration, the seal, it is declared, shall be only presumptive evidence. The memorandum opinion in Baird v. Baird, 145 N.Y. 659, 665, 40 N.E. 222, 224, 28 L.R.A. 375, where it was said, among other things that under section 840 of the Code of Civil Procedure "it is now open to the maker of such an instrument to allege and prove the absence of any consideration in fact as a defense," did not receive the approval of a majority of this court. The question of sufficiency of consideration has always been open to inquiry, and the statute is merely declaratory of the common law, but the "consideration implied by the seal cannot be impeached for the purpose of invalidating the instrument or destroying its character as a specialty." McMillan v. Ames, supra; Fuller v. Artman, supra. Whether the intent and effect of chapter 708 of the Laws of 1935 (in effect September 1, 1935) was to destroy the conclusive effect of the seal on a written instrument, we are not here called upon to determine. The instrument in suit was executed and delivered prior to the time that act went into effect. . . .

The written option, being under seal and founded upon a valid consideration, could not be withdrawn, revoked, or rescinded at will by defendant within the time within which she agreed that Chenault and his assigns might accept. Fuller v. Artman, supra; Thomason v. Bescher, 176 N.C. 622, 97 S.E. 654, 2 A.L.R. 631, note; 6 R.C.L. (contracts) § 26. It was a unilateral contract to convey, subject only to one express condition. Heller v. Pope, 250 N.Y. 132, 164 N.E. 881. When Chenault's assignee gave written notice within the time specified that he elected to buy, the condition was fulfilled and the unilateral option was thereby converted into a bilateral contract. Heller v. Pope, supra; Thomason v. Bescher, supra. The contract was reasonably certain in its terms, its subject matter, its purposes, and its parties. By acceptance, it became mutual in its obligations and its remedies. Upon the defendant's refusal to perform, the contract was enforceable by the assignee in an action for specific performance, in the absence of any available and satisfactorily established defense or counterclaim of an equitable character existing against the assignee or against Chenault before notice to defendant of the assignment. Trustees of Hamilton College v. Roberts, 223 N. Y. 56, 119 N.E. 97; 4 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.), § 1405; 1 Williston on Contracts (Rev. Ed. 1936), § 415. Cf. State Bank v. Central Mercantile Bank of New York, 248 N.Y. 428, 434-436, 162 N.E. 475, 59 A.L.R. 1473.

The judgment of the Appellate Division and that of the Trial Term should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to the appellant to abide the event.

NOTE

New York Statutes dealing with the effect of the seal on a contract up to Cochrane v. Taylor were:

The Civil Practice Act, § 342 (Laws 1920, c. 925): "A seal upon an executory instrument is only presumptive evidence of a sufficient consideration, which may be rebutted, as if the instrument was not sealed." This section is little different from the original provision in the Act of 1828 (2 R.S. 1st ed. 406 Pt. 3, Ch. 7, tit. 3, §. 77).

(The history of Section 342 is set out in Cochrane v. Taylor.)

Laws of 1935, c. 708:

"s. 342. Seal on written instrument as evidence of consideration. A seal upon a written instrument hereafter executed shall not be received as conclusive or presumptive evidence of a sufficient consideration. A written instrument, hereafter executed which modifies, varies or cancels a sealed instrument, executed prior to the effective date of this section shall not be deemed invalid or ineffectual because of the absence of a seal thereon.

"This act shall take effect September 1, 1935."

Laws of 1936, c. 353:

"Sec. 342. Common Law effect of seal abolished. The common law effect heretofore given to a seal upon a written instrument is hereby abolished as to all instruments executed after this section takes effect. If a sealed instrument is modified, varied or cancelled after this section takes effect, such modification, variation or cancellation shall not be deemed invalid to any extent for want of a seal upon the instrument constituting the same.

"This act shall take effect September 1, 1936." (Became law April 9, 1936.)

Laws of 1936, c. 685:

"s. 342. Seal on written instrument; evidence of consideration; modification of sealed instrument; undisclosed principal.

"1. A seal upon a written instrument hereafter executed shall not be received as conclusive or presumptive evidence of consideration. A written instrument, hereafter executed, which changes or modifies or which discharges in whole or in part a sealed instrument shall not be deemed invalid or ineffectual because of the absence of a seal thereon. A sealed instrument may not be changed, modified or discharged by an executory agreement unless such agreement is in writing and signed by the party against whom it is sought to enforce the change, modification or discharge. A sealed instrument so changed or modified shall continue to be construed as an instrument under seal.

"2. The rights and liabilities of an undisclosed principal under any sealed instrument hereafter executed shall be the same as if the instrument had not been sealed.

"(2) Chapter 353 of the laws of 1936 entitled 'An act to amend the civil practice act, in relation to abolishing the common law effect of seals upon written instruments hereafter executed and repealing section 342 thereof, relating to the effect of such seals' is hereby repealed.

"(3) This act shall take effect September 1, 1936." (Became law May 23, 1936.)

RECOMMENDATION OF THE LAW REVISION COMMISSION TO THE LEGISLATURE RELATING TO THE SEAL AND TO THE ENFORCEMENT OF CERTAIN WRITTEN CONTRACTS

(1941) N.Y. Legislative Document No. 65(M), 13-20.
1941 Report, Recommendations and Studies,
Law Revision Commission, 357-364.

In 1934 the Commission began a comprehensive study of the law concerning the seal with a view to ascertaining whether the then existing rules had outlived their usefulness. At the same time the Commission began a similar study of the law of consideration in the field of contracts. Because of the interrelation between the seal and consideration, the two studies were combined into one.

In 1936 the Commission published the results of its studies on both subjects (see Leg.Doc. (1936) Nos. 65 (C) and (D); Report, Recommendations and Studies (1936) pp. 65-80, 81-374), and made certain recommendations to the Legislature which resulted in the following important changes in the law with respect to the seal:

1. The old rule that a sealed instrument could be modified only by a sealed instrument was changed to permit a modification by a written although unsealed instrument.

2. The old rule that an undisclosed principal could neither sue nor be sued upon a sealed instrument was changed to permit such actions.

3. The old rule that a seal upon "an executory instrument" was "presumptive evidence of a sufficient consideration" had been changed in 1935 to read that a seal upon "a written instrument . . . shall not be received as conclusive or presumptive evidence of a sufficient consideration." In its 1936 recommendation, the Commission retained the substance of the 1935 amendment, with a single change in wording, which change was made by the Legislature in 1936. The rule, as amended, now provides that a seal upon "a written instrument . . . shall not be received as conclusive or presumptive evidence of consideration." Civil Practice Act, § 342. At the time of its recommendation in 1936, the Commission was of the opinion that the change in the rule made in 1935 manifested a clear desire by the Legislature to obliterate the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments with respect to the requirement of consideration. However, in Cochran v. Taylor, 273 N.Y. 172, 7 N.E.2d 89 (1937), the Court of Appeals, after deciding that under the law prior to 1935 a seal upon an instrument dispensed with the necessity of consideration, raised but left unanswered the question whether the amendments to section 342 of the Civil Practice Act made in 1935 and 1936 had changed the rule. But the language and reasoning of the opinion have raised doubts as to the effect of these amendments.

Whatever may be the final answer to this question, the following distinctions between sealed and unsealed instruments remained in the law after the amendments in 1936:

1. The modification of a sealed instrument could not be made by an oral executory agreement—a writing is required.
2. The 20-year statute of limitations applies to causes of action based upon a sealed instrument.
3. The presence of a seal on a document in certain cases is evidence of its authenticity.

Simultaneously with its recommendations in 1936 regarding the seal, the Commission also made recommendations dispensing with the requirement of consideration in certain cases. Pursuant to these recommendations the following changes in the law were made:

1. A release, in writing, was made binding regardless of a seal or consideration.
2. An agreement, in writing, to change, or modify, or to discharge in whole or in part, any contract, obligation, or lease, or any mortgage or other security interest in personal or real property, was made binding regardless of consideration.

In line with these changes, the Legislature in 1937, upon the recommendation of the Commission, changed the law with respect to accord and satisfaction so as to make binding written executory accords.

It will thus be seen that the general policy of recent legislation respecting the law concerning the seal and consideration, has been to do away with the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments, when the distinction appeared to serve no useful purpose, but to preserve them where it seemed desirable.

For example, the Commission could see no sound reason for the rule that a sealed instrument could be modified only by a sealed instrument. On the other hand the Commission recognized the desirability of a device whereby a party to a written agreement could protect himself against the danger of false claims of an oral modification. The old rule with respect to the modification of sealed instruments provided such a device, but it was the requirement that the modification be in writing rather than under seal that was important. Consequently, the requirement of a writing was preserved, but the requirement of a seal was abrogated.

Likewise, the requirement of consideration to make agreements binding seemed in general to serve a useful purpose, particularly in the inception of contractual relations, but there were cases where there appeared to be no sound reason for the requirement, provided there were proper safeguards against fraud, such as the requirement of a writing. Accordingly, the requirement of consideration was dispensed with in the cases of a release in writing, or an agreement in writing modifying an existing agreement.

Whether there should be some method whereby a person could make any kind of promise binding without consideration is a debatable question. According to the opinion of the Court of Appeals in Cochran v. Taylor, supra, the seal, at common law, provided such a device. If this device has not been destroyed by the amendments to section 342 of the Civil Practice Act made in 1935 and 1936, the questions remain whether the seal is the best device, and whether it or some other device should be limited in scope. On the other hand, if the amendments to section 342 of the Civil Practice Act made in 1935 and 1936 have destroyed the seal as a device for making promises binding without consideration, the question arises whether some such device should not be created and, if so, what limitations should be placed upon its use.

There are several objections to the use of the seal as such a device. The seal has degenerated into an L. S. or other scrawl which, in modern practice, is frequently a printed L. S. upon a printed form. To the average man it conveys no meaning, and frequently the parties to instruments upon which it appears have no idea of its legal effects.¹ Moreover, under the present law, the character of an instrument which bears the magic letters, but which contains no recital of sealing, is left uncertain as to whether it is sealed, depending upon parol evidence of intent to be later adduced (Transbel Investment Co. v. Venetos, 279 N.Y. 207, 18 N.E.2d 129 (1938)). It would seem, therefore, that if a method of making promises binding without consideration is desirable, some method should be devised which more clearly than the seal brings to the attention of the promisor what he is doing, and which fixes the character of the instrument as of the time of its execution.

Likewise, assuming the desirability of a device whereby a party to a written agreement can protect himself against the danger of false claims of an oral modification, a function which the seal now performs, it would seem that a more appropriate method of accomplishing this end would be one which more clearly than the seal brings to the attention of the parties that such is the effect of their acts, and definitely fixes the character of the instrument as of the time of its execution.

The Commission believes a method more appropriate than the use of the seal for permitting a party to a written agreement to protect himself against the danger of false claims of an oral modification, would be to make binding a stipulation to this effect contained in the original written agreement.

Concerning the broader question whether, and to what extent, a person should be able to bind himself by a promise without consideration, the Commission doubts the wisdom of any device that is applicable to all kinds of promises under all circumstances. Certainly the seal is not the best device, assuming some such device is desirable. The Uniform Obligations Act, proposed by the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, is a more appropriate device than the seal for accomplishing this end, but it is subject to the same objection that it applies to all kinds of promises. Moreover, in the two states which have adopted it, many difficulties have been encountered in its application. The Commission believes that a sounder policy would be to make the requirement of consideration applicable to promises generally, making no distinction between sealed and unsealed promises, with express statutory provision that in specified cases a promise, in writing, shall not be unenforceable because of the absence of consideration. This method of dealing with the problem is the one already employed by the Legislature in the cases of releases and modification agreements.

The Commission is now prepared to recommend that the requirement of consideration be dispensed with in the case of promises, in writing, expressly based upon a past consideration; in the case of assignments, in writing, of a chose in action; and in the case of an offer, in writing, which expressly states that it shall be irrevocable for a specified time. As experience demonstrates the desirability of further additions to the list of exceptions, they may be made without the necessity of revising the entire law of consideration. In this way the dangers of a sudden and revolutionary change in the law of contracts are avoided, but specific and well recognized defects are removed. Also, it makes feasible the complete abolition of the magical effects of the seal, by providing a better way for accomplishing those desirable ends for which it is now used. As an authenticating device, the seal of a public official or of a corporation performs a useful function and should be preserved. But the use of the seal to determine the character of rights and obligations under a written contract or other written instruments is archaic, is frequently productive of unexpected and unjust results, and should be ended.

Apart from the effect of the seal as an authenticating device, and its effect upon the ability of the parties to modify the instrument, and its possible, but by no means certain, effect upon the requirement of consideration, the only other effect of the seal upon an instrument is to give to the parties thereto the benefit of a 20-year statute of limitations upon a cause of action arising under the instrument. There appears no sound basis for this distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments, especially since the Legislature has already reduced the limitation on actions upon real property mortgages and bonds secured thereby, although sealed, from 20 to 6 years, the period applicable to unsealed contracts (Civil Practice Act, § 47-a). If the effects of the seal in other respects are to be abolished, certainly the 20-year statute of limitations should not be applicable to sealed instruments after such changes in the law are made.

Submitted herewith is a study made under the direction of the Commission.

The Commission therefore recommends:

I.* *

The repeal of present section 342 of the Civil Practice Act; the enactment of a new section 342 of the Civil Practice Act; the amendment of section 14 of the General Corporation Law; the enactment of new section 282 of the Real Property Law and new section 33-c of the Personal Property Law; and the amendment of sections 11, 47, 47-a and 48 of the Civil Practice Act, as follows:

§ 342. Seal on written instrument. Except as otherwise expressly provided by statute, the presence or absence of a seal upon a written instrument hereafter executed shall be without legal effect.

§ 14. Grant of general powers. Every corporation as such has power, though not specified in the law under which it is incorporated: . . .

2. To have a common seal and to alter the same at pleasure. The presence of the seal of a corporation on a written instrument purporting to be executed by authority of the corporation shall constitute a rebuttable presumption that the instrument was so executed. . . .

Real Property Law, § 282, and Personal Property Law, § 33-c:

An executory agreement hereafter made shall be ineffective to change or modify, or to discharge in whole or in part, a written agreement or other written instrument hereafter executed which contains a provision to the effect that it cannot be changed orally, unless such executory agreement is in writing and signed by the party against whom enforcement of the change, modification or discharge is sought.

§ 47. Actions on sealed instruments to be commenced within [twenty] six years. 1. Except as otherwise provided by section forty-seven-a, an action upon a sealed instrument must be commenced within [twenty] six years after the cause of action has accrued.

[Where the action is brought for breach of a covenant of seizin or against incumbrances, the cause of action, for the purposes of this action only, is deemed to have accrued upon an eviction, and not before.]

time heretofore limited for the commencement of an action thereon a period longer than six years, such period shall be shortened to six years from September first, nineteen hundred forty-one, and except further that if, on September first, nineteen hundred forty-one, there remains of the time heretofore limited for the commencement of an action thereon a period shorter than six years, such period shall not be enlarged.

§ 47-a. Actions on bonds and/or mortgages secured by real property to be commenced within six years. 1. An action upon a bond, the payment of which is secured by a mortgage upon real property, or upon a bond and mortgage so secured, or upon a mortgage of real property, or any interest therein, must be commenced within six years after the cause of action has accrued. [Where the action is brought for breach of a covenant of seizin or against incumbrances, the cause of action, for the purposes of this section only, is deemed to have accrued upon an eviction, and not before.]

2. This section shall apply to all causes of action enumerated in subdivision one, whether heretofore or hereafter accruing except that in the case of such a cause of action heretofore accrued, if, at the time this section takes effect, there remains of the time heretofore limited for the commencement of an action thereon a period longer than six years, such period shall be shortened to six years from the effective date of this section and except further that if, at the time this section takes effect, there remains of the time heretofore limited for the commencement of an action thereon a period shorter than six years, such period shall not be enlarged by the enactment of this section.

§ 48. Actions to be commenced within six years. The following actions must be commenced within six years after the cause of action has accrued:

1. An action upon a contract obligation or liability express or implied, except a judgment [or sealed instrument] and except as provided by section forty-seven and section forty-seven-a.

2. An action to recover upon a liability created by statute, except a penalty or forfeiture.

3. An action to recover damages for a personal injury, except in a case where a different period is expressly prescribed in this article.

4. An action to recover a chattel.

5. An action to procure a judgment on the ground of fraud. The cause of action in such a case is not deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the plaintiff, or the person under whom he claims, of the facts constituting the fraud.

6. An action to establish a will. Where the will has been lost, concealed or destroyed, the cause of action is not deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the plaintiff or the person under whom he claims of the facts upon which its validity depends.

7. An action upon a judgment rendered in a court not of record, except where such judgment shall have been docketed in a county clerk's office of this state upon a transcript filed therein pursuant to law. The cause of action in such a case is deemed to have accrued when final judgment was rendered.

§ 11. Mode of computing periods of limitation. The periods of limitation prescribed by this article, except as otherwise specially prescribed therein, must be computed from the time of the accruing of the right to relief by action, special proceeding, defense or otherwise, as the case requires, to the time when the claim to the relief is actually interposed by the party as a plaintiff or a defendant in the particular action or special proceeding.

Where the action is brought for breach of a covenant of seizin or against incumbrances, the cause of action, for the purposes of this section only, is deemed to have accrued upon an eviction, and not before.

II.

The enactment of the following new subdivision 2 of section 279 of the Real Property Law, and new subdivision 3 of section 33 of the Personal Property Law:

A promise hereafter made in writing and signed by the promisor shall not be denied effect as a valid contractual obligation on the ground that consideration for the promise is past or executed, if the consideration is expressed in the writing and is proved to have been given or performed and would be a valid consideration but for the time when it was given or performed.

THE UNIFORM WRITTEN OBLIGATIONS ACT

An Act

To validate certain written transactions without consideration, and to make uniform the law relating thereto.

Section I. Be it enacted, &c., That a written release or promise, hereafter made and signed by the person releasing or promising, shall not be invalid or unenforceable for lack of consideration, if the writing also contains an additional express statement, in any form of language, that the signer intends to be legally bound.

NOTE

The Uniform Written Obligations Act was approved by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in 1925. See the complete Act in the Commission's Handbook for that year, p. 214.

In Reeve, "The Uniform Written Obligations Act", 76 U.Pa.L.Rev. 580 (1928), the author said: . . . "The Uniform Act has certain advantages over the common law formal contract, hence having adopted this act, a state could abolish sealed instruments should it so desire, and have a more realistic and better type of formal obligation. The obvious objection to doing this is that deeds have been the subject of judicial decision for centuries and there is always serious inconvenience in throwing overboard a definite body of law in favor of any statute, however clear it may be. There are bound to be doubts and difficulties until the statute has received considerable judicial construction."

In 1943 by action of the Commission this act ceased to be a recommended "uniform act" and was relegated to a noncommittal status of "model act": 1943 Proceedings at p. 153, "Although approved almost 20 years ago, this Act has been adopted in only two states, viz. Pa. in 1927 and Utah in 1929. It met strenuous opposition in the Conference at the time of its adoption . . . and it has found little favor in state legislative bodies". The 1946 Proceedings show the act passed only by the same two states.

RECOMMENDATION OF THE LAW REVISION COMMISSION TO THE LEGISLATURE RELATING TO DISCHARGE OF SURETY OR GUARANTOR

New York Leg.Doc.1938 No. 65(C), 5-6. 1938 Report Recommendations and Studies of the Law Revision Commission

Under the law of New York the liability of a surety, including a guarantor, is as a general rule discharged by any conduct of the obligee that alters the principal obligation in any respect, even though such conduct may not prejudice the surety. For example, unless the surety consents, an extension, by even a day, of the time for the principal obligor's performance releases the surety from all liability. The fact that the principal was insolvent at the time of such extension, or that refusal to extend the time would have forced the principal into bankruptcy, will not prevent the application of this rule. In the case of Katz v. Leblang (243 App.Div. 421, 277 N.Y.S. 850 (1935)), a guarantor was held discharged by a change necessarily beneficial to him,—a reduction in rent payable by the principal obligor.

The rule permitting such a result represents a survival of the special favor traditionally shown the surety by the law. This favor may have served public policy in an earlier day, when all sureties were private persons, frequently acting without compensation. A different construction of the surety's liability might then have discouraged the assumption of a suretyship obligation. Today this reason has largely disappeared. In a number of states it has been held that a corporate surety is not discharged by an extension of time to the principal, except to the extent to which the surety is prejudiced.

The New York law is confused and unsatisfactory. Judge Cardozo in his article, A Ministry of Justice, cites it as an obvious example of an outworn rule to be corrected. (35 Harv.L.Rev. 113, 117.) In certain cases, especially those involving building contracts, the New York courts have made inroads upon the historic doctrine. In general, however, the doctrine stands.

The Commission believes that, except in the special classes of cases covered by the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law and the Uniform Partnership Act, a surety should be discharged by a change in the principal obligation only when the change is prejudicial to him, and only to the extent of the prejudice.

In order to prevent evasion of the statute, inconsistent contractual stipulations should be invalidated.

In 1937 the Commission submitted to the Legislature a recommendation, study and accompanying bill upon the subject (Leg.Doc. (1937) No. 65(Q)). That bill was not enacted. In the meantime the Commission has received several suggestions from the New York bar. In the light of these suggestions, the Commission has made certain changes.

A new section has been added, placing the burden of proof upon the obligee on the question of prejudice, including the extent thereof.

The revised bill specifically names "guarantor" as well as "surety."

The Commission recommends the addition of the following new Article 8-C to the Debtor and Creditor Law:

ARTICLE 8-C *

LIABILITY OF SURETY OR GUARANTOR; CHANGE IN PRINCIPAL OBLIGATION

Section 246. Liability of surety or guarantor; change in principal obligation.

§ 246. Liability of surety or guarantor; change in principal obligation. 1. A surety or guarantor, upon an obligation of suretyship or guaranty hereafter entered into, shall not be discharged by reason of the fact that the obligee agrees to change or changes the principal obligation, except to the extent to which the surety or guarantor is thereby prejudiced.

2. The burden of proof on the question of prejudice including the extent thereof shall be upon the obligee.

3. Any stipulation, in a contract of suretyship or guaranty hereafter made, for the discharge of the surety or guarantor in contravention of this section shall be void.

4. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed as affecting any of the provisions of the partnership law or of the negotiable instruments law.

BECKER v. FABER

Court of Appeals of New York, 1939.

280 N.Y. 146, 19 N.E.2d 997, 121 A.L.R. 1010.

LEHMAN, JUDGE. The plaintiff has brought this action to foreclose a mortgage upon real property in Nassau county. Payment of the principal and interest of the bond, secured by the mortgage, was guaranteed in October, 1923, by John A. Kollé. Asking a deficiency judgment against the executors of the last will and testament of John A. Kollé, deceased, the plaintiff made them parties to the foreclosure action. The complaint against them has been dismissed on the ground that the mortgagor and mortgagee modified the terms of the mortgage agreement without the knowledge or consent of the guarantor, and by force of such modification the guarantor was released.

The bond and mortgage were executed on or about June 1, 1923. The mortgagor bound himself to pay the sum of $10,000 on or before June 1, 1926, with interest thereon to be computed from the 1st day of June, 1923, at the rate of six per cent per annum and to be paid on the first day of December next ensuing the date thereof, and semi-annually thereafter. The bond was not paid at maturity. No agreement to extend the time of payment was made. Interest was paid, as stipulated in the bond, every six months until December, 1932. In January, 1933, the mortgagee agreed that the mortgagor would be permitted to meet the installment of interest which had become due on December 1, 1932, by monthly payments of $50 each and that similar monthly payments might be made upon subsequent installments after they became due semi-annually. In 1935 the mortgagee informed the mortgagor that when past due interest was paid up to June 1, 1934, she "is willing to charge you and accept 4%, but only on condition that you clean up the back taxes, and that interest rate to be effective for only one year, namely, June, 1935." Though the mortgagor did not comply with the stipulated condition, the mortgagee accepted, for more than two years, monthly checks for interest at the rate of four per cent. It is said that through the leniency thus shown to the mortgagor, the mortgagee has released the surety.

A contractual obligation may not be altered without the consent of the person who has assumed the obligation. The obligation of a surety or guarantor of due performance of a contract cannot be extended, without the surety's consent, to cover performance of a different contract. Alteration of the contractual obligation of the principal releases the surety, for the principal is no longer bound to perform the obligation guaranteed by the surety and the surety cannot be held responsible for the failure of the principal to perform any other obligation. The rule is based upon fundamental principles of contract which have not been seriously challenged in any jurisdiction, though there is difference of opinion in regard to the proper application of the rule. In this State the rule has been applied stringently. This court has said that the "defendant's [surety's] obligation is strictissimi juris, and he is discharged by any alteration of the contract to which his guaranty applied, whether material or not, and the courts will not inquire whether it is or is not to his injury." Page v. Krekey, 137 N.Y. 307, 314, 33 N.E. 311, 313, 21 L.R.A. 409, 33 Am.St.Rep. 731; Paine v. Jones, 76 N.Y. 274, 278; Antisdel v. Williamson, 165 N.Y. 372, 59 N.E. 207. The rule when strictly applied at times produces results which do not accord with our sense of what is fair or desirable and which are, perhaps, not consistent with the realities of business experience. When so applied, the rule has been subjected to searching and severe criticism. We have been urged to confine its application to cases where alterations in the obligation of the surety may increase the burden of the surety. Where the court can say with reasonable certainty that a surety gains benefit through an alteration, we are told it is unsound to hold that the surety is discharged. Before we consider whether we should abandon old precedents, reconsider an old-established rule or even redefine the field of its proper application, we should first determine whether a result which is challenged as unfair and unreasonable may not be due to an indiscriminating extension of established principles or old precedents rather than to infirmity in the principles or precedents.

By "alteration" in the obligation of the principal, the principal is discharged from performance of the obligation in its original form and, in effect, a new obligation is substituted for the old. In those cases where we have held that alteration of any kind in the obligation of the principal discharges the surety, there has been a change in the nature of the obligation which might be required of the principal, performance of the old obligation might be more onerous but relief from the burden of the old was accompanied by the creation of rights and duties different from those which arose out of the original agreement. We have in such cases refused to balance the advantage of relief from the old burden against possible disadvantage imposed by the new. We have held that the surety is discharged by any modification of the contract of the principal which requires of him performance in any respect different from the performance guaranteed by the surety. We have not held that an act of leniency towards the principal by the assured through remission of a part of an obligation or waiver of full performance constitutes an alteration of the obligation of the principal which will discharge the surety completely. Reduction in the rate of interest is a remission of part of the obligation. Remission or waiver of part of the performance which might be exacted by the assured from the principal does not release the principal from performance of the part of the original obligation which remains unchanged and in full force; and if the principal fails in such performance the surety may be held for the default in accordance with the surety's agreement. Neither principal nor surety is held in such case for a new or altered obligation; both are held to performance of an obligation assumed in the original agreement.

Nothing said or decided by this court conflicts with the general rule that "A surety is none the less discharged by a change in the terms of the principal's contract for the performance of which the surety has bound himself when the change might not be disadvantageous to him. But an agreement merely to remit part of the performance due from the principal without changing its character as by lessening the amount of rent to be paid under a guaranteed lease, or by providing for a lower rate of interest on a debt than the contract provides for or by waiving a portion of the performance of a contract will not discharge the surety." (Williston on Contracts [Rev. ed.], § 1240.) It follows that remission of a part of the interest even if such remission had been made by valid contract would not discharge the surety. Cambridge Sav. Bank v. Hyde, 131 Mass. 77, 41 Am.Rep. 193.

The effect of the agreement to accept, in monthly installments, interest which under the terms of the bond was payable every six months, presents a similar question though in different form. It is said that such agreement followed by acceptance of monthly check extended the time for the payment of the principal sum. The doctrine that extension of time for payment of the principal debt even for a few days discharges the surety, has been established by a long line of decisions. National Park Bank v. Koehler, 204 N.Y. 174, 97 N.E. 468; 4 Williston on Contracts, § 1222. Leniency shown to a debtor in default, delay permitted by the creditor without change in the time when payment of the debt might be *demand*ed, does not, however, constitute an extension of the time for payment. That requires a binding contract which precludes the creditor from enforcing payment according to the terms of the original contract and confers upon the debtor the right to withhold payment after the original debt has become due. In this case it is said that such a binding agreement arises from the receipt of checks for $50 intended as monthly payments of interest on the principal debt.

This court in New York Life Ins. Co. v. Casey, 178 N.Y. 381, 70 N.E. 916, 918, cited with approval the applicable rule as stated in Brandt on Suretyship: "The general rule is that the reception of interest in advance upon a note is prima facie evidence of a binding contract to forbear and delay the time of payment, and no suit can be maintained against the maker during the period for which the interest has been paid unless the right to sue is reserved by the agreement of the parties. The payment of interest in advance is not of itself a contract to delay, but is evidence of such contract, and while this evidence may be rebutted, yet in the absence of any rebutting evidence it becomes conclusive," Italics are new. Cf. Kings County Trust Co. v. Giovinco, 266 N.Y. 137, 194 N.E. 60. In this case there has been no "period for which the interest has been paid" in advance. In January, 1933, the mortgagee agreed to accept in monthly installments interest which had become due and payable earlier. The principal of the mortgage debt was long since due. The mortgagee might have demanded at any time, payment both of principal and past due interest. There was no contract, express or implied, which would have given the principal debtor the right to refuse payment of principal and past due interest and there never was an instant of time when some interest was not past due. Even a binding agreement to accept payment of past due interest in monthly installments—and we do not intimate that here the mortgagee's agreement constituted more than a proffered favor without binding effect—would not have discharged the surety. Coe v. Cassidy, 72 N.Y. 133.

In this case the surety claims that unqualified benefit bestowed upon the principal debtor and leniency and consideration shown to the principal debtor discharges the surety. That is not the law of this State. The surety guaranteed the performance of the obligation of the principal debtor. The creditor's agreement to forego part of his rights does not discharge the surety from responsibility for failure of performance by the principal debtor of that part of the original obligation which still remains and which remains untouched and unaffected by the creditor's remission of the remainder of the obligation. The surety is held to no obligation which he did not assume and if the surety meets that obligation he will be subrogated to the creditor's cause of action against the principal debtor, in accordance with the terms of the original contract.

The judgments should be reversed and judgment granted for the plaintiff, with costs in all courts.

39 Colum.L.Rev. 1254 (1939) comments on the principal case:

"New York has neither discarded the strict rule, nor adopted the more liberal Massachusetts approach. Rather, in declaring what amounts to a further limitation on the applicability of the strict rule, it has added to an already complicated situation another variable factor, namely, the necessity of deciding whether that which the surety seeks to establish as an "alteration" is actually such an alteration as to bring into operation the strict rule."

The commentator then suggested legislation which would enact the Massachusetts rule, which is that an alteration which is in its nature beneficial to the surety, or which, self-evidently, cannot prejudice him, does not discharge the surety.

SECTION 5. ORIGINS AND DEVELOPMENT OF LEGISLATIVE POLICY

A. Introductory

ABBOT LOW MOFFAT, THE LEGISLATIVE PROCESS

24 Cornell L.Q. 223, 228-233 (1939).*

What seems to be the most common misconception as to the legislative process is its basic nature. Despite the procedure which at first glance may seem to be unrelated to other democratic processes, it is, in its essence, a judicial process, and this is clearly recognized in Massachusetts, where the legislature is known as the General Court. . . . Very little legislation ever originates within a legislature itself. The legislature is the tribunal to which are brought proposed changes in the rules governing our lives. That tribunal, weighing the arguments for and against, renders judgment by the adoption or rejection of the proposed amendment to the laws. . . .

While a court in granting relief or awarding judgment is bound by the laws applicable to the case, even though personal justice may not always be served thereby, the legislature in its decisions is ultimately bound by the will of the majority of the people whom it represents. I use the word "ultimately" because there are several factors which come into play and sometimes cause a postponement of such a decision.

Individual influence can play an important part in the disposition of legislation. Sponsorship of a measure by an unpopular individual will seriously militate against its adoption. The support or opposition of an individual who is a dominant character or who has become recognized as an expert in a particular subject or who by seniority has become a committee chairman or achieved the ranks of the "older [in point of service] members" is not infrequently decisive. But the two chief factors are politics and caution.

Partisan politics play almost no part in the vast majority of legislation adopted or rejected. The extent of its absence, indeed, is always surprising to those who approach a legislature fed by lurid tales of partisan scheming. On the other hand, in important matters politics is a vital factor because it is the effort to ascertain what people want, as determined by votes which are the expression of democracy. When an organized minority, pressure group or other aggressive combination of citizens, who express their aggressiveness by votes, become interested for or against a proposal, they become an important element of the public whose views must be considered. Very frequently, the tribunal in giving its democratic judgment will bow to such an organized group, even though it may obviously be a minority, because their votes can be so directed as to outweigh and, indeed, outnumber the apathetic votes on the other side. This is the basic role which politics plays and it can be a factor in thwarting temporarily legislative decision in accordance with popular will.

The second important factor is the almost universal attitude that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff. A legislature is very disinclined to make an important change of law where there is serious opposition to such change even though a majority, were a census to be taken, favor the proponents. A legislature is inclined to be mildly conservative about changing the rules under which people are living. It must be satisfied not only that the change is desirable but that the great majority of people want it. A 51-49 division of opinion among the public would probably not result in the enactment of the legislation sought by the 51 per cent.

This attitude when intelligently applied is by no means harmful. Those desiring a major change must convince the great bulk of their fellow citizens. As a result, when the change is adopted, the people are behind it, those opposed have had time to anticipate the result, and what a few years before may have been considered a dangerous or radical innovation becomes quietly effective with little or no social or economic disturbance. Far different would have been the situation had the 51 per cent been able to force enactment of a proposal violently disliked by 49 per cent of the people. Then again, this caution serves to winnow the passing emotional fancy from the deep rooted substantive reform. Public views are seldom static. If the 51 per cent cannot succeed in persuading the bulk of their fellow citizens that their particular reform is desirable, the proposal will soon be disclosed as a temporary emotional surge and its own adherents will drop away.

The very process of education has beneficial results. When first some new change is offered, a kernel of sound and intelligent reform may well be completely enclosed in a shell of impractical proposed administration. The advocates fight for the kernel, the opposition is terrified by the shell. Gradually, the arguments on each side make some impression on the other and, because of merit or expediency, or both, changes are made to make the program more effective and workable. The waiting period forced by the conservative policy of most legislatures results in knocking off the rough edges of many such proposals and, incidentally, in greatly improved draftsmanship.

But against these advantages, there exists one very serious danger. The normal delay of a legislative body may and, indeed, often does develop into a lag that makes its attitude completely reactionary and a force that militates against sound democratic government, since it is out of tune with the settled opinion of the people.

It has long been a popular pastime in this country to make fun of legislative bodies and legislators; yet a legislature reflects fairly accurately the public which, as a body, it represents. There are always enough buffoons, individuals of limited intellect, and gentlemen with sticky fingers, to be a source of comedy or scorn. The many able individuals in legislative bodies, who quietly go about their tasks and perform the duties assigned to them, escape the public notice. When a legislative body or a member does something of which the press does not approve, cartoons aplenty festoon newspaper pages. On the other hand, when their actions are reasonable and sound such is taken for granted and passed over in silence. As a result, idiosyncrasies and occasional errors or stupidities receive the great bulk of publicity by which public opinion is molded.

This aspect of diminishing legislative prestige has been accompanied by two others. Almost no attempt is made by the public to understand the actual problems before a legislature. We are a people who love labels. Only infrequently does the public endeavor to determine whether a label is properly affixed. In writing of pending legislation, the press generally finds it impossible to discuss the details of a proposal and, accordingly, over-simplifies its comments. It is apt to advocate a proposal simply because it approves the kernel or condemn a proposal because of the shell. Once a label is affixed in the public mind, it is almost impossible to secure rational consideration and perhaps needed modifications. A member may sincerely believe in a certain social reform but feel that the bill before him is so badly drafted or its administrative provisions so unworkable that the result sought would not be accomplished. Unable to secure intelligent amendment, he votes against the bill. Promptly he is damned by those who care only for the publicized objective, who are totally unfamiliar with the details, and who, indeed, care nothing about the details of the bill itself.

A further aspect of declining esteem, and one that is of especial importance, is the prestige and power of the executive which, for several decades, has been progressively increasing at the expense of the legislature. A long time has passed since the struggle between royal governors and the representatives of the people who fought for the liberties of the people. The American people like personalities. They can render hero worship to an executive as a person, which is something they can never do to a legislative body made up of numerous individuals. Many executives have taken advantage of this simple psychological fact. Baiting the legislature is an accepted political formula for an executive, which, unless he is almost wholly in the wrong, is more often than not only too successful. When an executive talks, the radio and the press carry his version of a controversy to every citizen. But the legislature with its large membership cannot so speak, and it is at a complete disadvantage in broadcasting its point of view, whether on the air or in print. Such a controversy, furthermore, often becomes in the public mind a quarrel between the courageous one and the contemptuous many.

In recent years, for one cause or another, there has been a tendency on the part of executives to try to break the innate caution of legislative bodies and to force changes at a faster rate than the legislature feels desirable. Frequently this leadership has been very necessary. A legislative body which lags behind settled public opinion not only is a threat to democracy, but of itself is an incentive to opposite extremes. On the other hand, when an executive forces the legislature to accept his judgment in all matters and to enact changes before they are supported by settled public opinion, there is an equal threat to democracy—one which is in line with tendencies visible today in so many parts of the world.

Representative democracy requires a balance between a legislature which lags behind contemporary thought and an ill-considered bending to every passing breeze. It also requires a balance between the executive branch and the legislative branch of government. The breakdown of the one is, indeed, frequently the cause of the collapse of the other.

There is a definite obligation on every citizen to preserve the legislative bulwark of representative democracy, striving militantly to maintain the essential balance. There should be tolerance for the foibles and faults of legislative bodies—too often but the mirror of our collective selves. There should be understanding and sympathy with the work and the actual problems before legislative bodies—too often condemned or praised on labels or emotional appeals. But above all, there must be an end to that fatal attitude of letting others run the government; there must be a resurgence of active interest in all government, and there must be widespread participation, to some extent at least, in the politics which make it operate.

ERNST FREUND, STANDARDS OF AMERICAN LEGISLATION

Chicago: 1917. University of Chicago Press. 215-218.

By contrast with the common law, every proposition of which claims to be a dictate of reason and logic, statute law is conventional in the sense that in many cases it merely represents the legislator's free choice between a number of different possible and perhaps equally reasonable provisions. The natural desire to avoid the charge of arbitrariness in legislation produces a strong tendency to follow precedents, and, in consequence, a certain uniformity of provision with regard to relatively indifferent matters which has nothing to do with principle, and which is yet likely to impose itself upon legislation with more than the force of principle. In every jurisdiction it is possible to cite instances of this kind in which the mere force of habit supports practices which have nothing else to recommend them; witness the usual clause at the end of a New York statute: "this act shall take effect immediately," or the requirement which is common in Illinois that the governor approve vouchers for expenses which are charges against appropriations. Such practices offer little general interest.

So long as legislation claims to produce law it must also strive to realize in its product that conformity to principle from which law derives its main sanction and authority. The difference between common law and statute law in this respect, however, is that while the data of the common law are fixed and beyond conscious and deliberate transmutation, those of legislation vary with varying purposes and conditions. While principle in common law simply stands for logic, reason, and established policy, its meaning in legislation is far more complex. We can hardly say more to begin with than that it means a settled point of view, and any closer analysis requires careful differentiation.

At the opposite ends of the various classes of considerations that move the legislator we should place constitutional requirement and policy. The constitutional rule must be obeyed no matter what opinion may be entertained of its wisdom, and is thus withdrawn from argument except for the purpose of interpretation. It may be absolutely conventional, as, e. g., in the requirement and wording of an enacting clause, or convention and principle may be mixed, as in specifying brief terms of office, or it may state a principle pure and simple, as in the rule against ex post facto laws or against double jeopardy. The mandatory character of the rule is affected by these differences only in the varying latitude of constitutional construction.

Policy, on the other hand, represents the freedom of legislative discretion. No matter what array of facts and arguments we may bring to bear upon certain problems, we must recognize that in the present state of human thought and knowledge their determination is controlled by considerations which lie beyond the forum of compelling reason, and depends upon fundamental differences in habits and ideals. Strict or liberal divorce laws, high license or prohibition, free trade or protection, free or regulated business, the limits of combination and of competition, form or informality in legal acts—these constitute issues with regard to which opinions of men will continue to differ, and which for the present must therefore be left to the domain of policy.

Contrast with these the legislative attitude toward polygamy, toward monopoly, toward gambling, or toward vice, and we shall find these latter policies as firmly established as any common-law principle. The common law embodies, in addition to reason and logic, also a great deal of policy, as, e. g., the pronounced favor to the accused in criminal procedure. That policy has in America been transformed into a constitutional rule, as has been the more modern policy of freedom of thought and of religion; there are even instances in which highly controversial policies have been enacted into constitutional provisions in order to withdraw them from legislative change; witness the prohibition clauses in the constitutions of Kansas and Oklahoma.

Where this is done, it is not inaccurate to say that policy has been changed into principle; we then simply attribute to principle the meaning of settled policy. In this sense any policy adopted by the legislature becomes the principle of the statute enacted to effectuate that policy—principle to the extent that it controls or should control the details of provisions and their application and interpretation. Considering the statute without reference to these details, we should of course realize that we deal with legislative policies and not with principles of legislation in the more specific sense. The legislative determination of policies is generally, and in a sense justly, regarded as a matter of free discretion; in any event the considerations guiding that discretion are ordinarily not counted as falling within the province of jurisprudence.

Principle as applied to legislation, in the jurisprudential sense of the term, thus does not form a sharp contrast to either constitutional requirement or policy, for it may be found in both; but it rises above both as being an ideal attribute demanded by the claim of statute law to be respected as a rational ordering of human affairs; it may be a proposition of logic, of justice, or of compelling expediency; in any event it is something that in the long run will tend to enforce itself by reason of its inherent fitness, or, if ignored, will produce irritation, disturbance, and failure of policy. It cannot, in other words, be violated with impunity, which does not mean that it cannot be or never is violated in fact. Perhaps the best criterion of principle is that reasonable persons can be brought to agree upon the correctness of a proposition, though when they are called upon to apply it their inclinations or prejudices may be stronger than their reason.

The question is whether our legal science has developed an adequate system of principles of legislation in this sense.

B. Legislative Precedent

"Laws, like inherited disease, descend:
They slyly wind their way from age to age,
And glide almost unseen from place to place."—
Goethe, Faust.

*(i) ILLUSTRATION FROM EARLY AMERICAN LAW*STEFAN A. RIESENFELD, THE DEVELOPMENT OF AMERICAN POOR LAWS IN GENERAL.*

Section 5. The Unsettled Person in Need of Assistance.

B. American law during the colonial period.

If we look at the American law as it developed during the colonial days we find a host of details which characterize it clearly as an offshoot of the English system. Yet it is necessary to realize that the situation here was vastly different from that on the other side of the Atlantic. Labor was scarce and there was no shortage of land. The colonies had no agricultural proletariat. Destitution because of lack of employment was unknown, although comparatively early some towns were saturated with certain skills. Need for relief was the result of age, infancy, sickness, physical infirmities or widowhood. An able-bodied male without livelihood was necessarily a vagrant or a rogue. The early settlers were, however, from the beginning quite concerned about strangers who might become either a financial burden or otherwise obnoxious. Thus the early statutes combine frequently the suppression of vagrancy with the regulation of relief.

Even in the earliest colonial period the maintenance of the poor was recognized as a matter of local concern. The court records of the 17th century as published by the various historical societies and state governments are studded with orders concerning relief or removal. Gradually the colonies passed their own statutes on the subject which show many interesting features. In the first place their very wording shows that even the earliest draftsmen had either the pertinent English statutes before their eyes or an abridgement thereof such as was contained in the various manuals for Justices of the Peace by Lambard, Dalton or Nelson.¹ Secondly, legislation of some of the colonies influenced decidedly that of their neighbor provinces and was either directly copied by them or adopted in a modified version.² Thirdly, as the English law itself developed qualifications and refinements the colonial statutes and practice followed the example.

* This extract from the manuscript for a new book on "Modern Social Legislation" is used here with the permission of Professor Riesenfeld. Several of the footnotes have been omitted. Ed.

The pioneer in poor legislation among the New England provinces was the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Her acts were copied to a large extent by Connecticut and New Hampshire. Rhode Island on the other hand followed the English law fairly closely but stood otherwise by itself. Pennsylvania was another colony which not only borrowed directly from England but influenced also the sister provinces of New Jersey, Delaware and later to a certain degree New York. Maryland again seems to have merely adopted the general trend of the surrounding colonies. South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia finally form another group, the legislation of which shows either common features or direct copying among one another. . . .

C. The period from the acquisition of statehood to the present day.

The general features of the legislation regarding the relief and treatment of settled and unsettled poor did not undergo any radical changes during the subsequent period. The pattern was set in the colonial days. The force of tradition and the weight of legislative precedent prevented any far-reaching deviations from the accepted scheme.

1. The weight of the legislative precedent. It is perhaps worthwhile to illustrate this phenomenon with further examples. The separation from England necessarily diminished or at least delayed the influence of her statutory developments on American legislation. The lead now goes to the Atlantic seaboard states, particularly Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New York. Congress itself fostered the practice of borrowing law by requiring in the celebrated Ordinance for the Territory Northwest of the River Ohio that the territorial statutes should be adopted from the original states, although the mandate was tempered with a "necessary and best suited to the circumstances" clause.³ As a result the Poor Law of Pennsylvania of 1771 was adopted in 1795⁴ and became subsequently with an amendment of 1799⁵ the law of the Territory of Indiana⁶ and Illinois.⁷ The Michigan Territory adopted first, in a considerably modified form, a New Jersey provision,⁸ switched in 1820 to a portion of the Ohio statute of 1816⁹ and copied later word for word with a few omissions the New York statute of 1813.¹⁰ Rhode Island incorporated in 1798¹¹ into her poor law of 1765 large portions of the Massachusetts statutes of 1794.¹² The state of Illinois retained at first the territorial statute with slight modifications.¹³ In 1827 it was replaced by a much simpler and apparently original act.¹⁴ But this statute in turn with its amendments¹⁵ was copied by the Territories of Iowa and Wisconsin,¹⁶ which law was again adopted by the Revision of 1851 of the Territory of Minnesota.¹⁷ The state of Michigan in the Revision of 1838 copied verbatim the poor law of New York of 1827 with its amendments prior to that date.¹⁸ The Territory of Iowa adopted in 1843 the poor law of the State of Ohio of 1831.¹⁹ Some states drafted their law by engrafting upon their older statutes provisions which were taken from a number of states. Thus Vermont revised its poor law of 1787²⁰ by borrowing heavily from New York, Virginia, and Massachusetts, as a comparison of the Vermont statute of 1797²¹ which the laws of these states show. Similarly Wisconsin used the Massachusetts settlement law of 1794 and the New York poor law of 1827 for the drafting of its first poor law after acquiring statehood.²² These examples could easily be multiplied.

(ii) ILLUSTRATION FROM 20TH CENTURY AMERICAN LAW

HESS v. PAWLOSKI

Supreme Court of the United States, 1927.
274 U.S. 352, 47 S.Ct. 632, 71 L.Ed. 1091.

MR. JUSTICE BUTLER delivered the opinion of the Court.

This action was brought by defendant in error to recover damages for personal injuries. The declaration alleged that plaintiff in error negligently and wantonly drove a motor vehicle on a public highway in Massachusetts, and that by reason thereof the vehicle struck and injured defendant in error. Plaintiff in error is a resident of Pennsylvania. No personal service was made on him, and no property belonging to him was attached. The service of process was made in compliance with chapter 90, General Laws of Massachusetts, as amended by Stat.1923, c. 431, § 2, the material parts of which follow:

"The acceptance by a nonresident of the rights and privileges conferred by section three or four, as evidenced by his operating a motor vehicle thereunder, or the operation by a nonresident of a motor vehicle on a public way in the commonwealth other than under said sections, shall be deemed equivalent to an appointment by such nonresident of the registrar or his successor in office, to be his true and lawful attorney upon whom may be served all lawful processes in any action or proceeding against him, growing out of any accident or collision in which said nonresident may be involved while operating a motor vehicle on such a way, and said acceptance or operation shall be a signification of his agreement that any such process against him which is so served shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served on him personally. Service of such process shall be made by leaving a copy of the process with a fee of two dollars in the hands of the registrar, or in his office, and such service shall be sufficient service upon the said nonresident: Provided, that notice of such service and a copy of the process are forthwith sent by registered mail by the plaintiff to the defendant, and the defendant's return receipt and the plaintiff's affidavit of compliance herewith are appended to the writ and entered with the declaration. The court in which the action is pending may order such continuances as may be necessary to afford the defendant reasonable opportunity to defend the action."

Plaintiff in error appeared specially for the purpose of contesting jurisdiction, and filed an answer in abatement and moved to dismiss on the ground that the service of process, if sustained, would deprive him of his property without due process of law, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court overruled the answer in abatement and denied the motion. The Supreme Judicial Court held the statute to be a valid exercise of the police power, and affirmed the order. Pawloski v. Hess, 250 Mass. 22, 144 N.E. 760, 35 A.L.R. 945. At the trial the contention was renewed and again denied. Plaintiff in error excepted. The jury returned a verdict for defendant in error. The exceptions were overruled by the Supreme Judicial Court. Pawloski v. Hess, 253 Mass. 478, 149 N.E. 122. Thereupon the superior court entered judgment. The writ of error was allowed by the Chief Justice of that court.

The question is whether the Massachusetts enactment contravenes the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The process of a court of one state cannot run into another and summon a party there domiciled to respond to proceedings against him. Notice sent outside the state to a nonresident is unavailing to give jurisdiction in an action against him personally for money recovery. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714, 24 L.Ed. 565. There must be actual service within the state of notice upon him or upon some one authorized to accept service for him. Goldey v. Morning News, 156 U.S. 518, 15 S.Ct. 559, 39 L.Ed. 517. A personal judgment rendered against a nonresident, who has neither been served with process nor appeared in the suit, is without validity. McDonald v. Mabce, 243 U.S. 90, 37 S.Ct. 343, 61 L.Ed. 608, L.R.A.1917F, 453. The mere transaction of business in a state by nonresident natural persons does not imply consent to be bound by the process of its courts. Flexner v. Farson, 248 U.S. 289, 39 S.Ct. 97, 63 L.Ed. 250. The power of a state to exclude foreign corporations, although not absolute, but qualified, is the ground on which such an implication is supported as to them. Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Co. v. Gold Issue Mining Co., 243 U.S. 93, 96, 37 S.Ct. 344, 61 L.Ed. 610. But a state may not withhold from nonresident individuals the right of doing business therein. The privileges and immunities clause of the Constitution (section 2, art. 4), safeguards to the citizens of one state the right "to pass through, or to reside in any other state for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise." And it prohibits state legislation discriminating against citizens of other states. Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash.C.C. 371, 381. Fed.Cas.No.3.230; Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 430, 20 L.Ed. 449; Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 180, 19 L.Ed. 357.

Motor vehicles are dangerous machines, and, even when skillfully and carefully operated, their use is attended by serious dangers to persons and property. In the public interest the state may make and enforce regulations reasonably calculated to promote care on the part of all, residents and nonresidents alike, who use its highways. The measure in question operates to require a nonresident to answer for his conduct in the state where arise causes of action alleged against him, as well as to provide for a claimant a convenient method by which he may sue to enforce his rights. Under the statute the implied consent is limited to proceedings growing out of accidents or collisions on a highway in which the nonresident may be involved. It is required that he shall actually receive and receipt for notice of the service and a copy of the process. And it contemplates such continuances as may be found necessary to give reasonable time and opportunity for defense. It makes no hostile discrimination against nonresidents, but tends to put them on the same footing as residents. Literal and precise equality in respect of this matter is not attainable; it is not required. Canadian Northern Ry. Co. v. Eggen, 252 U.S. 553, 561, 562, 40 S.Ct. 402, 64 L.Ed. 713. The state's power to regulate the use of its highways extends to their use by nonresidents as well as by residents. Hendrick v. Maryland, 235 U.S. 610, 622, 35 S.Ct. 140, 59 L. Ed. 385. And, in advance of the operation of a motor vehicle on its highway by a nonresident, the state may require him to appoint one of its officials as his agent on whom process may be served in proceedings growing out of such use. Kane v. New Jersey, 242 U.S. 160, 167, 37 S.Ct. 30, 61 L.Ed. 222. That case recognizes power of the state to exclude a nonresident until the formal appointment is made. And, having the power so to exclude, the state may declare that the use of the highway by the nonresident is the equivalent of the appointment of the registrar as agent on whom process may be served. Cf. Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Co. v. Gold Issue Mining Co., supra, 96 (37 S.Ct. 344); Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. 404, 407, 408, 15 L.Ed. 451. The difference between the formal and implied appointment is not substantial, so far as concerns the application of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

NOTE

In Knoop v. Anderson, 71 F.Supp. 832 (D.C.Iowa 1947), Graven, D. J., said: "The earliest Non-Resident Motorist Service Act was enacted by New Jersey in 1908, P.L.1908, p. 613. That Act provided that non-residents could not drive an automobile upon the public highways of New Jersey without first executing a written instrument designating the Secretary of State as attorney for the service of process in actions growing out of the operation of the automobile in that state. The constitutionality of that statute was upheld in the case of Kane v. New Jersey (1916) 242 U.S. 160, 37 S.Ct. 30, 61 L.Ed. 222. . . . All of the 48 states and the District of Columbia now have Acts which provide that the operation of a motor vehicle upon their highways by a non-resident shall be deemed to constitute a designated public officer in the state the agent or attorney of the non-resident for the service of process in actions growing out of the operation of motor vehicles in the state."

(Judge Graven cites all 49 statutes in alphabetical order of states.)

MAURICE S. CULP, PROCESS IN ACTIONS AGAINST NON-RESIDENTS DOING BUSINESS WITHIN A STATE

32 Mich.L.Rev. 909-912 (1934).

Many state legislatures have undertaken to subject non-resident persons or unincorporated groups, or both, to the power of their local courts in relation to business transacted within their limits. No less than forty States have at one time or another enacted statutes providing for substituted service of process in actions arising out of such transactions. Most of these statutes apply to non-residents generally;

but in eighteen States statutes, now or formerly in force, have provided in express terms for substituted service on non-resident partnerships or unincorporated associations. Both types alike provide that service may be made upon an actual agent of the nonresident or upon a statutory agent who may or may not have the duty of giving notice of such service to his principal.

The statutes also fall into two classes in another respect: those which apply to all kinds of business done by non-residents and those applying to particular types of business such as business transacted by non-resident seed dealers, contractors, motor carriers, public utility and real estate brokers. The Iowa statute is an example of the first type:¹³

"When a corporation, company, or individual has, for the transaction of any business, an office or agency in any county other than that in which the principal resides, service may be made on an agent or clerk employed in such office or agency, in all actions growing out of or connected with the business of that office or agency."

The Michigan statute is representative of the type designed to authorize substituted process in actions growing out of specific business transactions:¹⁴

"Every issuer or applicant for the filing of securities who is a non-resident of the state of Michigan, shall . . . file with the commission his irrevocable consent that suits and actions arising out of or founded upon misrepresentation or fraud in connection with the sale of such securities in this state may be commenced against him by the proper court of any county in the state in which the plaintiff may reside, by the service of any process or pleadings authorized by the laws of this state, on the chairman of the commission, said consent stipulating and agreeing that such service of such process or pleadings on such chairman shall be taken and held in all courts to be as valid and binding as if due service had been made upon the applicant himself. . . . All process or pleadings required in this act to be served upon said chairman shall be served in duplicate copies, one (1) of which shall be retained in the office of the commission and the other forwarded by registered mail forthwith to the head office of the person against whom said process or pleadings are directed."

In general all these types of legislation raise essentially the same question: the type applicable to all non-residents, to non-resident partnerships and associations, and to non-residents engaged in the transactions of special business. They raise the same questions of constitutional power and procedural form. . . .

The number of statutes is indicative of the need felt for this kind of legislation. And from the scope of some of these statutes, applying to one or more specific businesses, it is apparent that the use of substituted service on such non-residents has developed as the evils resulting from particular situations have demanded attention. The common object of all such legislation is to protect residents against the financial hardship and inconvenience of seeking out the defendant in the State of his residence. Under such a statute the State compels the non-resident in return for the privilege of doing business within, and the protection afforded by, the local community to submit to the process of the local courts as to causes of action arising out of that business.

LAWS OF PENNSYLVANIA, 1937

No. 558, 12 P.S. § 331.

AN ACT

Providing for the service of process in civil actions on nonresident owners, tenants, or users, of real estate located within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and the footways and curbs adjacent thereto, or any such resident of this Commonwealth who shall subsequently become a nonresident, and making the ownership, possession, occupancy, control, maintenance, and use of such real estate, footways, and curbs, the equivalent of the appointment of the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania as the agent of said nonresident, upon whom civil service may be served; and providing for further notice to the defendants in any such action.

Section 1. Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passage of this act, any nonresident of this Commonwealth being the owner, tenant, or user, of real estate located within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and the footways and curbs adjacent thereto, or any such resident of this Commonwealth who shall subsequently become a nonresident, shall, by the ownership, possession, occupancy, control, maintenance, and use, of such real estate, footways, and curbs, make and constitute the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania his, her, its, or their agent for the service of process in any civil action or proceedings instituted in the courts of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania against such owner, tenant, or user of such real estate, footways and curbs, arising out of or by reason of any accident or injury occurring within the Commonwealth in which such real estate, footways, and curbs are involved.

VEHICLE AND TRAFFIC LAW

N.Y.Consol.Laws, c. 71 (enacted in 1931).

“§ 52-a. Service of summons on residents, who remove from the state prior to commencement of action against them. The operation by a resident of a motor cycle or a motor vehicle on a public highway in this state, or the operation on a public highway in this state of a motor vehicle or motor cycle owned by such resident, if operated by his consent or permission, either express or implied, shall, in all cases where such resident shall have removed from this state, prior to the service of legal process upon him in actions hereafter described, and shall have been absent therefrom for thirty days continuously, be deemed equivalent to an appointment by such resident of the secretary of state to be his true and lawful attorney upon whom may be served the summons in any action against him, growing out of any accident or collision in which such resident may be involved while operating a motor vehicle on such a public highway, or in which such motor vehicle or motor cycle may be involved while being operated on such a highway with the consent, express or implied, of such resident owner; and such operation shall be deemed a signification of his agreement that such summons against him which is so served shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served on him personally within the state. Service of such summons shall be made in the same manner, and with the same force and effect, as specified and set forth for the service of a summons upon a nonresident in section fifty-two of this chapter. The court in which the action is pending may order such extensions as may be necessary to afford the defendant reasonable opportunity to defend the action."

MARANO v. FINN

Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Term 1935.
155 Misc. 793, 281 N.Y.S. 440.

Appeal from Municipal Court, Borough of Manhattan, Eighth District.

PER CURIAM. The sole question involved herein is whether section 52-a of the Vehicle and Traffic Law applies to this defendant who is a resident of New York City but absent therefrom for more than 30 days attending college in another state. The section permits service of a summons on residents who remove from the state prior to the commencement of an action against them, and who shall have been absent therefrom for more than 30 days continuously, by delivery of the summons to the secretary of state and by mailing or delivery to defendant outside the state. The language used in both the title and the text of the section indicates it was intended to apply to those who were residents of the state at the time the cause of action accrued, who have since changed their residence to another state. The use of the word "remove" indicates an intention to require more than a temporary absence. In Kurland v. Chernobil, 260 N.Y. 254, 257, 183 N.E. 380, 381, the Court of Appeals said: "Section 52-a must, therefore, be held to operate only prospectively and to relate exclusively to those who as residents use the highways of this State subsequent to the passage of the act and who later become nonresidents."

Temporary absence at college would not seem to effect a change of residence within the meaning of the sections, though such absence persisted for more than 30 days during the usual school term.

Order affirmed, with $10 costs. All concur.

MINNESOTA LAWS, 1947

Chapter 46—S. F. No. 105

An Act authorizing service of process upon the Commissioner of Aeronautics of the State of Minnesota in behalf of any non-resident owner or operator of an aircraft, or upon a resident owner or operator of an aircraft, who has remained without the state where aircraft is used or operated within the State of Minnesota, which use or operation results in damage or loss to person or property.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Section 1. The use and operation of an aircraft by a non-resident or his agent in the State of Minnesota or by a resident owner or his agent who has remained without the state continuously for thirty days prior to the commencement of an action against him, shall be deemed an appointment by such non-resident or absentee of the Commissioner of Aeronautics, to be his true and lawful attorney upon whom may be served all legal processes in any action or proceeding against him growing out of such use or operation of an aircraft in the State of Minnesota, resulting in damages or loss to person or property, and said use or operation shall be a signification of his agreement that any such process in any action against him which is so served shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served upon him personally. Service of such process shall be made by serving a copy thereof upon the Commissioner or by filing a copy in his office, together with the payment of a fee of $2.00, and such service shall be sufficient service upon said non-resident or absentee, provided that notice of such service and a copy of the process are within ten days thereafter sent by mail by the plaintiff to the defendant at his last known address, and that the plaintiff's affidavit of compliance with the provisions of this act are attached to the summons.

The court in which the action is pending may order such continuance as may be necessary to afford the defendant reasonable opportunity to defend any such action not exceeding ninety days from the day of the filing of the action in such court. The fee of $2.00 paid by the plaintiff to the Commissioner at the time of service of such proceeding shall be taxed in his costs if he prevails in the suit. The said Commissioner shall keep a record of all such processes so served which shall show the day and hour of such service.

App. 2-28-47.

NOTES

1. In its report to the Minnesota State Bar Association the Committee on Aeronautical Law, (1947 Comm.Rep., Minn.St.Bar Assn. p. 3), states: "Your committee recommended . . . the enactment of a statute providing for service of process upon a non-resident plane owner having an accident or incurring liability within the state. This bill was introduced and passed at the 1947 session. . . . The state Commissioner of Aeronautics has been made the agent for service of process. The law also places resident owners of aircraft who remain out of the state for 30 days or more after the incurring of liability, in the same situation as non-resident owners so far as service of process upon them is concerned. This last feature is a new one, and is not found in the statute on the comparable subject in the automobile law. There may be some question as to its constitutionality."

In Culp, "Recent Developments in Actions Against Nonresident Motorists", 37 Mich.L.Rev. 58 (1938), the author states at p. 69: "Obviously, if a person who is a nonresident and therefore only temporarily and transitorily subject to the jurisdiction of a state may constitutionally be served with process in actions growing out of accidents happening within the state, one who has been subject to the jurisdiction by virtue of his residence within the state cannot object to the constitutionality of such legislation. In other words, the police power may with just as much reason assert jurisdiction over the resident who removes after the accident."

The jurisdictional problems raised by these statutes are treated and the relevant literature is cited in Cheatham, Dowling, Goodrich and Griswold, "Cases and Materials on Conflict of Laws", 2nd Ed. 1941. (The Foundation Press.)

2. That adherence to legislative precedent is not necessarily conducive to uniformity of the rules of law applied by the courts is well illustrated by the study of the New York Law Revision Commission of "Statutes in Other States Changing the Common Law as to Seals," (1936) N.Y.Leg.Doc.No.65 (D) 366-373. It concludes: "The diversity of interpretation of statutes which are almost identical in language may be attributed to three factors: first, the loose wording and ambiguous terms used in these statutes; second, the varying views which the courts of separate states had with respect to the common law doctrines of seals; third, the different views of the courts as to how great a departure from common law doctrines as to seals was socially desirable once they were freed by these statutes from the shackles of the common law doctrines."

C. Some Factors and Agencies That Influence Legislative Judgments

(i) SOURCES OF BILLS AND SOME CONSEQUENCES

PHILIP STERLING, SOME PRACTICAL ASPECTS OF LEGISLATION

38 Rep.Pa.Bar Ass'n 381, 399-401 (1932).

How Does a Legislative Idea Originate?

From what source or sources do the many legislative ideas originate? By whom are they created? The least number are conceived out of the independent thought and judgment of the legislator. The experienced member of a legislative body having a comprehensive understanding of the Statute law of the State, well informed on the intricate structure of the State Government, able to analyze the social, political and economic problems of its citizens, often will introduce legislation borne out of his own creative spirit—but the number of such bills, when compared to the whole number introduced during a legislative session is inconsequential. On the other hand the inexperienced legislator will generally introduce a bill when he has been wronged in his own person, when his pride has been hurt, or his dignity assailed or his rights invaded or when at least the injury, if not visited upon him personally, has befallen one who has his attention or his counsel or is near and dear to him. To the inexperienced legislator the demand of a constituent that "there ought to be a law" brings quick response. But again the quantity of such legislation introduced bears small ratio to the total of all bills presented.

The great bulk of the legislation of our own Legislature has its origin in the departments and bureaus of the State Government under the Executive Branch thereof, notably the Department of Revenue, Department of Highways, Department of Justice, Department of Education and Department of Property and Supplies. Borough, Township, City and County organization bring to every session of the Legislature for introduction by a favorite son great masses of bills, or the ideas from which they take form. Not infrequently a lawyer in his practice, either in the trial of a cause or other undertaking is unable to bring to his client the desired results because of the provisions of an existing law or because, on the particular point involved, there is no statutory law. Speedily, he seeks a friend in the Legislature through whom a bill is presented to prevent a repetition of his unfortunate experience.

Organized labor, civic, social, welfare, industrial and agricultural groups, trade, professional and fraternal organizations, all have their friends in the Legislature through whom, without censor or even hesitation, legislative ideas may be brought for consideration to the lawmaking body of the Commonwealth. Not every such measure is introduced by a member with the thought of final passage. For the most part, the member feels his obligation performed with the introduction of the bill. Its fate thereafter rests with the committee to which it is referred for study. More often than otherwise such a bill does not gain the dignity of a place on the calendar.

GEORGE E. ALTER, LEGISLATION, ITS VOLUME, ITS TENDENCIES AND THE CAUSES AND PROCESSES THROUGH WHICH IT IS BEING BROUGHT INTO BEING

31 Rep Pa Bar Ass'n 5, 11-13 (1925).

While it is quite clear that more laws are needed now than in the earlier years, I think it is equally clear . . . that the quantity produced at every session is far beyond the public need. They come too easily. Considerable experience, both in the Legislative and Executive service, has impressed me with the fact that changes are made for causes which are too slight.

Surely, one of the characteristics of law should be stability. It seems scarcely appropriate to apply the term "law" to that which was one thing yesterday, is another today and still another tomorrow. It is hard to realize that what was proper yesterday can be very wrong today and all right again tomorrow.

While in matters relating to the executive departments and bureaus experience often shows the wisdom of modifications in the law from time to time, it is also true that incumbents frequently are too eager to develop ideas which they want to have enacted into laws. A real up-to-date administrator must have "policies." Often they are useful. Very often they are of trifling value. Sometimes they are hurtful. Nearly always they serve to perplex people who, with the aid of experts, are trying to keep track of the laws relating to their own affairs. Often it might be better to make the administrative policies conform to the law than to make the law conform to the policies.

It is human for the office holder to seek to magnify his office, to broaden its jurisdiction and increase its powers. Enactments often indicate the discovery of some remaining fragment of local authority, which must be absorbed, or at least regulated, by some department or bureau of the State. The same tendency is to be seen at Washington, where it has been responsible for much mischief.

Of legislation of a more general character, quite a little originates in law offices. Members of the Legislature often receive it from their lawyer constituents in the form of bills ready, or supposed to be ready, for introduction. Occasionally these bills represent a really valuable thought that has occurred to some lawyer in the course of his experience. Often they represent a concrete problem wherein the existing law, as applied to a particular case, is unsatisfactory, and a change would be helpful to some client. I noticed a bill in the last session which was a most palpable effort to escape the consequences of an important and recent adjudication with which I was familiar. It failed to pass.

The reformer of various types and with various hobbies is usually to be relied upon for his quota of material. It is surprising what an amount of time and effort people will expend to enforce their ideas. They seek pledges from timid candidates, as do also groups who desire legislation for the protection of some business or the annoyance of business rivals, and thus much support is frequently secured for very remarkable measures.

Those who have had much contact with the law-making bodies realize the extent to which the passage of bills is due to what may be termed comradeship. Of course this does not apply to measures of great public interest, but to the common run of bills. The inclination generally is to vote in the affirmative, unless some substantial reason is shown for a negative vote. The burden frequently seems to be on those who object to a change, not on those who propose it. If a bill is introduced by a member who stands well with his colleagues and generally votes for their measures, its lack of merit must be rather clear or it is very likely to pass. A member who is hard to convince of the merits of the bills sponsored by his colleagues is not likely to leave much of a monument of legislation of his own. . . .

I am not finding fault with the members of the General Assembly or their methods of procedure. In these things that I may seem to criticize, I have taken part. I am only stating certain phenomena that help to account for what is generally conceded to be more than an abundance of legislation. The aim of almost all members is to do right, and very few would vote for a measure they thought was really wrong. But the habits and traditions that have grown with the years have created a condition where it is too easy to tinker with the laws.

What has been said has no special application to any particular session. Only general tendencies and causes always in operation have been in mind.

2. In Dickinson, "Legislation and the Effectiveness of Law", 37 Rep.Pa.Bar Ass'n 337, 356-358 (1931), the author said:

" . . . I wish to suggest a reason which I think will properly support the charge that our Legislatures are guilty of overproduction. This reason, which seems to me directly responsible for much of our production of statutory enactments, is nothing less than another of those widespread and oversimplified commonplaces of public opinion which are accepted as statements of fundamental truth and acted upon as such. I refer to the conviction held by many of us as a matter of course that all rules and regulations of conduct to be enforced by public authority must emanate directly from no less high a source than the supreme law-making body, the Legislature itself. This idea is a corollary of the so-called "theory of separation of powers" which is supposed to be fundamental in our American form of government. If it is true, as the theory of separation of powers seems to require, that 'legislative power can only be expressed by the Legislature,' it follows necessarily that every rule and regulation enforced by the State must be the direct and immediate product of the Legislature itself and may not emanate from any other source. The result is that if it seems desirable to prescribe a rule of conduct, no matter how relatively insignificant or confined in operation to matters of technical or minor detail, such a rule must none the less pass through the legislative mill, come forth in the full dignity of a statute and swell the total number of pages of the statute book. The result is that the statute book teems with minute and detailed enactments "

The author concludes by recommending delegation of rule making power to administrative authorities on such matters, thus insuring "that the regulations will emanate from the kind of body best fitted to formulate them and will be subject to revision by a more rapid and easy process than statutory amendment".

G. W. KEETON, PROBLEM OF LAW REFORM AFTER THE WAR

58 L.Q.R. 246, 249-251 (1942).

The material with which the lawyer deals to-day may be divided into two fairly distinct parts. On the one hand, there is that large and growing body of legal rules which expresses in legal form political, economic and social reforms. This is for the most part embodied in statutes and statutory rules and orders, and it includes such material as the Housing and Public Health Acts, the trade union legislation, the legislation relating to marketing and other boards, as well as the legislation relating to workmen's compensation, national health insurance and similar matters. Legislation of this kind is the concern of the community as a whole, and the lawyer's task here is simply to assist in the task of drafting statutes embodying changes which may be regarded as desirable, and to apply the legislation when passed. To suggest what changes may in themselves be desirable is to pass from the sphere of the lawyer to that of the economist, the social reformer and the politician. On the other hand, there is a great body of law which is sometimes called "lawyer's law", comprising legislation and caselaw, which has developed for centuries, almost exclusively in the hands of lawyers, and which is too technical for laymen in general to tackle. It is here that the lawyer alone can perform a useful task in simplifying the law, more especially as reforms here do not commonly involve controversial political, economic or social questions. It is in this sphere, too, that reforms are achieved normally on the initiative of lawyers, and when agreed upon they occupy very little Parliamentary time in their passage. All the important work upon the property legislation of 1925 had been performed by lawyers before these measures were brought to Parliament, and the successive law reform Acts which have been passed since 1934 have become law practically without any Parliamentary debate at all. In earlier times reform in law of this type was usually suggested to the Government of the day by the Lord Chancellor, after informal consultation with both branches of the legal profession. In recent years proposals for reform have emanated from successive reports of the Lord Chancellor's Law Revision Committee—an extremely valuable and important innovation. . . . It is suggested, . . . that more extended use ought to be made of the Law Revision Committee as an instrument of law reform,

This alone is not enough, however. . . . It is suggested that this spirit of inquiry ought to find expression in the lawyer's professional organizations. . . . In this way close contact with the profession would be assured, and law revision would lose its present piecemeal character.

MAYNARD E. PIRSIG, PROPOSED YOUTH CORRECTION ACT

Report of Committee on Youth Correction Act of the Minnesota State Bar Association *
28 Minn.L.Rev. 300 (1944).

INTRODUCTION

This state has always recognized that violations of law committed by children of tender years ought not to be treated as criminal offenses and ought not to be punished by the usual methods prescribed by the criminal law. During the early years of the state, males under the age of 16 and females under the age of 15 were required to be sent, on conviction of a crime, to the then existing state reform school where they were to be treated not as criminals but as children needing training and correction. Much progress has since been made. The age of those affected has been increased to under 18 years. We have today, among other facilities, the state training school for boys and the home school for girls and a liberal and humane juvenile court act.

What is not generally appreciated is that this state did not stop with these measures. For more than fifty years there has been a clearly defined policy that older youths as well should be distinguished from the adult criminals for the purposes of the criminal law and that separate treatment should be given them. The first step in this direction came with the establishment of the reformatory at St. Cloud, Minn., in 1887. The act creating it permitted the trial court to send to the reformatory any person not less than 16 or over 30 years of age who had not theretofore been convicted of a crime. It was the clear object of the act to confer the power and responsibility for the proper treatment of the youth on those in charge of the reformatory and the object of the treatment was to be the correction and reform of the youth given to their charge. . . .

To enable these objectives to be achieved, the act required the sentence to be an indeterminate one not exceeding the maximum term provided by law for the crime of which the youth was convicted. The board of managers of the reformatory were to decide when the youth should be discharged and they were given the power to place him on parole under proper rules and regulations.

This act was a notable step. But it was not the only one. In 1899, statutory recognition of probation was introduced. It was on a limited scale. It applied only to counties having a population over 50,000. The significance of it is, however, that probation was provided especially for youths, namely those under 18 years of age. The age was increased to 21 in 1903. Here again was recognition of the need for special consideration and treatment of the problems of the youth offender.

Since these original steps were taken, probation and parole have come to be recognized as important tools in the sound administration of the criminal law generally. A probation act applicable to all criminals irrespective of age has been in force since 1905. Special acts applicable to the larger counties have been enacted in more recent times. Parole has been extended to most crimes irrespective of the age of the criminal involved. Moreover, the courts of the state have disregarded the restrictions on those to be sent to the reformatory for men and have sent criminals there of all ages and irrespective of whether they had prior convictions or not. This received limited legislature sanction in part in 1939 by the removal of the older age limit.

The effect of these later developments has been that procedures and facilities originally intended to apply to youth offenders only have been extended to all criminals. In that process, since youth and adult criminals are now treated by the same personnel and facilities, the policy of the state, that it should give special attention to its youth who are convicted of crime and take advantage of the greater possibilities of correction and rehabilitation, has been largely lost sight of. None would deny that that policy is as sound today as it was fifty years ago. Yet, in the administration of criminal justice in this state today, it is not as clearly perceived as it was when the statutes of 1887 and 1899 were enacted. The report of the committee, which appears below, indicates that this state needs to reconsider its program for youth offenders, particularly for those 18 years of age or older. . . .

The committee was originally created two years ago to consider the Youth Correction Authority Act as drafted by the American Law Institute. That act applies only to those under 21. The committee began its work and conducted much of its research on the assumption that whatever it recommended would similarly be restricted. But as preliminary drafts of the committee's proposed act were given circulation criticisms came in that the scope of the act was too narrowly restricted and that the problem of the youth offender does not stop at the age of 21. As indicated above the act creating the reformatory for men fixed the age at 30. In addition, it was pointed out that one of the major values of the act would be in providing needed facilities for dealing with young discharged servicemen convicted of criminal offenses and that for this purpose an older age should be fixed. The weight of these considerations led to fixing the maximum age at under 25. . . .

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE

This committee was created by the State Bar Association pursuant to the resolution at the last annual meeting of the Association for the purpose of examining the provisions of the model Youth Correction Authority Act proposed by the American Law Institute. The model act, in brief, sets up an agency and empowers it to take control of youths under the age of 21 who have been convicted of designated crimes after a trial by the normal criminal procedure. The model act does not affect those subject to the jurisdiction of the juvenile court. In this State, it would cover those over the age of 17 and under the age of 21. It covers the late adolescent period as distinguished from the earlier adolescent age. At its last meeting, the State Bar Association endorsed the principles of the model act, namely that in the treatment of youth offenders, emphasis should be upon rehabilitation and reform rather than upon punishment as such. The task assigned to the committee was to determine whether the model act as recommended should be proposed for this state or whether some modification thereof should be undertaken. For reasons which follow, the committee has concluded that a modification of the act adapted to existing conditions in this state is to be preferred. The model act contemplates variety and flexibility in the use of medical, psychiatric, psychological, and educational treatment and the use of social case work in the attempt to rehabilitate and reform youths convicted of crime and within the age stated. Such a program may well have its advantage and would unquestionably make use of the latest scientific knowledge and theories about the causes of and remedies for criminal conduct. California, in 1941, enacted most of the provisions of the Youth Correction Authority Act. The success of the program in that state is indicated by its further development and extension through legislation in 1943 and by communications to this committee from those in intimate contact with the development in that state. This committee, however, believes that for the present, it would be wiser for this state to proceed with an extension and improvement in the facilities with which the state is now familiar, to retain the advantages which experience has shown to be inherent therein, and to undertake to bring about the more effective use of available facilities for the treatment of youth offenders by a better unification and coordination of them. The Act drafted by the Committee and submitted herewith proceeds upon this basis.

THE YOUTH OFFENDER PROBLEM

Even before the present war directly affected this country, crimes committed by our youth presented a major and national problem. . . . and the experience following the last war give every indication that we will be facing an aggravated problem of youth delinquency following the conclusion of the present war. It is vitally important that the state be prepared to meet this situation by taking adequate preliminary steps to meet it.

Youth of the adolescent age present problems not to be found in the adult population. They have great sources of energy and strong emotional reactions. Outlets for their energies have not been fixed and hardened. The irresponsibility and irrepressibility of childhood has not yet disappeared. Unless directed and controlled, their energies and emotional activities may find their outlets in crime instead of in the normal socially approved conduct. At the same time, youths of this age are confronted with some of the major decisions of their lives. Their school work has normally just ended. They must readjust from the routine of school work to the pursuit of some gainful employment. Many find themselves rudely shaken in their ambitions and their hopes not realized. Combine this with harmful home and community environment and resort to crime as the easy way out is too often the likely result.

The records of a few cases taken from the reformatory at St. Cloud will illustrate the background of some of our criminal youth.

[The three illustrative cases are omitted. Ed.]

These relatively few examples point to what the committee is assured by those in charge of the reformatory exists in the large majority of cases. Sixty to seventy per cent of the inmates have less than normal intelligence. Large numbers of them come from communities and families from which one could hardly expect a mentally healthy youth to develop. Broken homes, conflict, antagonism, and strife within the family, drunkenness and dissolute conduct by one or the other or both of the parents, general neglect of the youth in his childhood, poverty, lack of employment, these are the typical backgrounds of those that make up the bulk of the inmates within the age group here discussed. Criminality and general disrespect for law and order are almost the inevitable results of such conditions. The combination of inadequate mental equipment and hopeless and degrading community conditions are in a large degree responsible for our criminal youths who themselves are hardly aware of the fountain source of their criminal conduct.

[Tables showing types of offenses committed by youths under 21 in Minnesota are omitted. Ed.]

From these figures, it is evident that the great proportion of crime committed by youth involves the acquisition of property. When one considers that these youths come from homes of limited means and low moral standards, it may be gathered that their crimes represent their misguided solution of personal problems which they felt unable or unwilling to meet by legitimate methods.

The foregoing information corresponds to a very high degree with the facts found in an extensive research made of the inmates of the Massachusetts Reformatory by Sheldon and Eleanor T. Glueck and recorded in their publication entitled 500 Criminal Careers. A careful and exhaustive study was made by them of each of approximately 500 inmates. Their history and background were carefully examined as was their conduct after their discharge from the reformatory or from parole. Probably no more complete study of the conduct of criminals after their release has ever been made. It revealed that the large majority of the inmates came from families with criminal histories, dependent economically, uneducated, and with poor work habits. Abnormal home conditions and broken homes were common. About 70 per cent had less than normal intelligence; 21 per cent were feeble minded. This study revealed that almost 80 per cent of those studied committed further known crimes within five years after their discharge.

The committee does not suggest that similar conclusions should be drawn with respect to those who have been discharged from the institutions in this state, but the resemblance between the group studied by the Gluecks and that found in our institutions is striking and compels the conclusion that better means should be provided than now exist for examining the results of our present methods of handling our convicted youths.

PRESENT TREATMENT OF YOUTH OFFENDERS

At the present time, the provisions of our laws for treatment of youths over 17 are the same as those for adults generally. So far as our penal laws are concerned, a criminal over the age of 17 is deemed to be an adult. No doubt our courts, probation and parole officers, and penal institutions recognize, in the course of their work, the greater possibilities existing for the rehabilitation of youth offenders. Our statutes also contain some provisions especially applicable to youths under 21 years of age. Thus confinement in our jails separate and apart from adult inmates is required. Pardons extraordinary were made available in 1941 to those under 21. At an early date, probation facilities were extended to youths to a degree not available to adult criminals. In general, however, the facilities available for the treatment of our youth, and the treatment in fact given, are no different than those existing for other criminals.

The agencies now dealing with youth convicted of felonies are as follows:

The District Courts. . . .

Probation officers and departments. . . .

Penal institutions. There are three major penal institutions to which those over 17 years of age and convicted of a felony may be sent.

These are the State prison at Stillwater, the reformatory for men at St. Cloud, and the reformatory for women at Shakopee. The reformatory for men is the principal institution to which male offenders under 21 are committed. . . .

(But) there are to be found, . . . in the reformatory today, not only youthful first offenders, but hardened adult criminals as well. . . .

Our inspection of the reformatory indicates that the spirit and program of the institution is animated by a very real desire to improve the lot and outlook of those confined there. Its activities in the field of education in particular are praiseworthy. However, no special and separate program has been developed for the youth offenders who are confined there.

The state prison and its program exist essentially for adult criminals. . . .

State Board of Parole. This board was established as an independent agency in 1911. . . .

All criminals over the age of 17 confined in our penal institutions, with minor exceptions, . . . come under the jurisdiction and control of the parole board which determines whether and when an inmate shall be released from the institution and what conditions shall be imposed during his supervision under parole. . . .

This committee is not in a position, nor is it its function, to pass judgment upon the quality of the work done by the parole board. It may accept the claim of the board made in its last biennial report that it stands among the six best in the country. Descriptions of its procedures reveal a careful examination of each case prior to the granting or denial of parole or discharge and that it carries out its functions in as complete a manner and extent as limited funds and personnel permit. The method employed is essentially to prescribe modes of conduct for persons under its supervision which are designed to remove them from temptation to further criminal conduct. The threat of immediate incarceration in a penal institution serves as a powerful incentive to compliance with the prescribed conduct.

The literature available to the committee however, discloses no special program of supervision or special consideration of the problems of the youths that come before it. They are subject to the same rules and regulations and type of treatment and supervision as those prescribed for adults.

WEAKNESSES IN PRESENT SYSTEM

The Youth Correction Authority Act approaches the problem of youth delinquency from the standpoint of re-education and shifting of the youth's point of view away from that which led to the crime. The program it contemplates seeks to develop an acceptance of the standards and ideals of a good citizen of the community. Correction rather than merely suppression of criminal habits and attitudes is what it aims to achieve. These aims have the endorsement of the State Bar Association at its last meeting.

The Youth Correction Authority Act also proceeds on the belief that these aims cannot be achieved without a specialized personnel which understands the problems of youth, knows how to win its cooperation and respect and has the facilities with which to carry out the necessary corrective treatment on a single consistent coordinated plan. With this the committee agrees. It further submits that, from its examination of the situation in this state, as to youths over 17 years of age, there is among existing agencies but limited recognition of the special problems of youth delinquency, and that the needed specialized personnel with a special program for corrective treatment has not been developed.

Our examination of the situation in this State discloses several major weaknesses in the treatment of our youth offenders over the age of 17. These weaknesses may be listed as follows:

(1) The fact has already been commented upon that throughout our methods of dealing with youths only limited consideration appears to be given to the fact that they represent not only peculiar problems but also greater possibilities for rehabilitation. This is true both in and out of our penal institutions. Only in our juvenile court system is special recognition given to the problems of juvenile delinquency. Only those under 18 come under its purview. This committee does not believe that our youths cease being youths at the age of 18, and believes that we should extend our recognition of their special problems into later years, as provided by the proposed Act.

(2) The records at the reformatory for men disclose a wide disparity of sentences among those committed for identical crimes. Lengths of sentences imposed in many instances have no relation whatever to the crimes committed or to the character or record of the offender. Hardened criminals may receive a light sentence for a given crime in one part of the State while youths from another part receive a severe sentence for a first sentence involving the same crime. . . .

Absolute uniformity in sentences imposed for a given crime is, of course, not the sole objective, but differences in sentences should have some relation to the actualities of the respective cases and should not depend upon the particular views of individual judges or upon the fortuitous circumstance that different judges happen to be imposing the sentences. The recommended act creates a single body to which the function is assigned of prescribing the proper treatment called for by the individual case. This will make possible a consistent policy and a sound decision based on actual observation of results over a period of time.

(3) Outside the major counties, facilities for adequate probation are lacking. . . .

(4) Coordination of effort among the various agencies now dealing with our youth is practically non-existent. . . . The plans and programs of the courts, of probation officers, of institutions and of the parole board are, for the most part, independent of each other and make difficult if not impossible any consistent treatment of the youth delinquent. The system may be adequate enough for adult criminals. It is not adequate for a program of rehabilitation and correction of youth offenders.

(5) Youth offenders and hardened criminals are sent to and inter-mix in the same penal institution. This is particularly true at the reformatory which has, of course, nothing to say as to who shall be sent there. This is certain, almost, to expose the youth offender to the deteriorating influence of the older criminal. However carefully an institution is run, contact and a measure of intermixing between the youth and the hardened criminals is inevitable.

THE PROPOSED ACT

It might be possible to bring about some improvement here and there in existing agencies by particular and limited measures. But we believe a more aggressive program directed to the heart of the problem is needed if substantial improvement is to be made in our methods of dealing with youth offenders. What is called for is a co-ordinated system of treatment directed specifically at youth offenders and the problems they present and made available throughout the state. It is not possible to do this on a local or county-wide basis. The number of cases within a county are too few to permit the employment of the needed personnel, to say nothing of more expensive methods of treatment calling for institutional care. It is necessary therefore to create a state agency charged with the responsibility of carrying out the needed program, but making use of such local facilities as may exist for the purpose.

The act recommended herewith by the committee accordingly creates a division of the parole board to whom all youths convicted of a felony or gross misdemeanor and not put on probation by the courts are committed automatically for treatment. The division of the board after investigation then determines what shall be the treatment to be administered. It may grant probation, or commit to a penal institution. It may ask the cooperation of the penal institution in developing special procedures and methods of dealing with youths committed to the institution. At the appropriate time it may grant what is the equivalent of parole. Whatever is done from the time of conviction to discharge would be part of a single consistent plan directed specifically to the rehabilitation of the youth involved. The Act would also make available additional pre-sentence investigation facilities to the district courts where youths are involved. As previously stated, it would also make available to the juvenile courts probation services throughout the State.

Such an agency could also develop modes of treatment intermediate between parole and probation and which now do not exist. It could for example permit selected youths to engage in gainful employment but to live in dwellings organized more or less on a co-operative dormitory plan under the supervision and control of a resident agent of the agency. Educational features could be incorporated into the plan. This would be but adopting the Borstal system of England, the forestry camps plan of California, the Virginia system of dealing with youth under 18 years, and others of a similar character which have met with outstanding success. One year under such a plan would do more for the correction of a criminal youth than five years of the usual institutional life. . . .

The committee is confident that the program contemplated by this proposed act would save large numbers of our youth that have become involved in crime. It would also make possible for the first time a thorough study of the problem of youth delinquency and the causes and remedies therefor.

Neither this plan nor any other will be successful unless those selected to administer it have the necessary qualifications. In the proposed act, the example of the California act has been followed in creating a panel which recommends lists from which the selection is to be made. This should prevent predominantly political considerations from entering into the selection. A salary also has been designated which it is believed should be provided to secure the type of men or women needed for the Division, although it is recognized that it is above the level now paid for similar state positions. The agency set up is also made a part of the State Parole Board so that their respective programs may be effectively coordinated.

In addition to the members of the Division, it is estimated that from ten to fifteen field workers, agents, etc., and necessary clerical assistance will be needed. A total annual appropriation of about $75,000 will be required to carry out the functions imposed on the Division under the act.

Whether such an expenditure is justified must be tested by what may reasonably be expected to be obtained by it. The committee is confident that the program offered by the act would divert many more of our youth from lives of crime than present facilities do and would convert them into useful citizens of the community. It would also make possible a comprehensive examination into the causes of youth delinquency and a corresponding development of more effective methods in dealing with the problem. Even from the purely financial point of view, the gain resulting from the increase in the number of useful productive citizens and from the reduction of predatory and destructive criminals and of the number of criminal inmates in our penal institutions would far outweigh the cost to the state.

Regarding the technical drafting of the act it will be observed from the notes to the various sections that the Youth Correction Authority Act and the California act, based thereon, have been heavily drawn upon whenever the provisions of these acts were of assistance in developing the plan proposed by the committee. The committee thus had the benefit not only of the work of an experienced organization but also of an act which has been in successful operation.

EXPLANATORY NOTE

The act as ultimately passed by the legislature differed from that proposed by the Committee mainly in creating a separate commission instead of merely a division of the State Board of Parole. The measure was enacted as Minn.Laws 1947, c. 595 (M.S.A.1945, § 260.125), with the short title "Youth Conservation Act".

The purpose of the act and the provisions establishing the Commission appear in M.S.A. 1945 as follows:

"Subd. 1. Purpose. The purpose of this Act is to protect society more effectively by providing a program looking toward the prevention of delinquency and crime by educating the youth of the state against crime and by substituting for retributive punishment methods of training and treatment directed toward the correction and rehabilitation of young persons found delinquent or guilty of crime.

"Subd. 2. Creation of commission. There is hereby created a Youth Conservation Commission to provide and conduct a program looking toward the prevention of juvenile and youth delinquency and to provide and administer preventive and corrective training for persons committed to the Commission.

"Subd. 3. Personnel of commission; quorum; director appointed by governor; compensation. The Commission shall consist of five persons including the director of the division of public institutions, the chairman of the state board of parole, and three others appointed by the Governor, with the consent of the Senate. A majority shall constitute a quorum. The Governor shall designate one of the appointed members as the chairman, who shall be the full time director of the Commission. The director of the division of public institutions and the chairman of the state board of parole shall serve without additional compensation. The Director shall be responsible for the administration and enforcement of this act under the direction of the Commission. All other members shall serve on a per diem basis.

"Subd. 4. Term of office. The term of office of the appointed members of the Commission shall be for four years, except that initially one shall be appointed for a four-year term, one for a three year term, and the third for a two-year term. Members shall be eligible for reappointment.

"Subd. 5. Vacancy. All appointments to a vacancy shall be made by the Governor and shall be for the unexpired term. Each member shall hold until the appointment and qualification of his successor.

"Subd. 6. Qualification of appointees. All persons appointed to the Commission shall, in so far as possible, have legal and administrative ability, educational experience, and experience in the study of juvenile and youthful offenders, and in planning and conducting programs of prevention of juvenile and youth delinquency and crime and one shall be a juvenile court judge who is also a judge of probate. A person particularly well qualified for such appointment may be appointed, even though such person is not, at the time of the appointment, a resident of this State."

Only those provisions of the Committees' draft act which demonstrate its essential features are reproduced here. Several changes of detail were made during the prenatal stages of the act both before and after the bill was introduced in the legislature. Some of the changes were made to gain support of certain professional organizations, some on additional expert advice, and some for tactical reasons having to do with the process of enactment. Some lessons are to be learned by making a detailed comparison of the measure as originally drafted by the Committee with the act as it appears in the statute book, but they are not considered sufficient justification for reproducing M.S.A.1945, § 260.125, in full here.

In addition to the features of the measure as a crime prevention device, observe the use of precedent and the adaptations of the Uniform Youth Correction Act.

Excerpts From Committee's Draft Act.

Sec. 3.—The State Board of Parole is hereby directed to create a division of the Board to be known as the Youth Correction Division, whose function shall be to provide and administer preventive and corrective training for persons committed to the Board, as hereinafter provided, and which is hereinafter called the Division.

The Youth Correction Authority Act creates a separate board. This proposed Act incorporates its administration in the parole board. The 1943 amendment of the California act calls the agency simply "Youth Authority."

Sec. 19—When in any criminal proceeding in a court of this state a person has been convicted of a felony or gross misdemeanor for which the judge has power under Section 20 to commit to the Division, the judge of that court shall determine whether the person was less than twenty-five years of age at the time of the apprehension from which the criminal proceeding resulted. Proceedings in a juvenile court in respect to a juvenile are not criminal proceedings as that phrase is used in this Act.

This incorporates Section 12 of the Youth Correction Authority Act with the age increased to 25 years. It appears as Section 1731 of the California act.

Sec. 20—After a certificate has been filed with the clerk of the district court of any county as provided by Section 18, the district court of such county shall commit to the Division every person convicted of a felony or gross misdemeanor who is found to be less than 25 years of age at the time of his apprehension and who is not sentenced to imprisonment for life, or in a county jail for 90 days or less, or to a fine only. Such commitment shall be for the maximum term provided by law for the crime for which such person was convicted. Execution of sentence may be stayed by the court and the defendant placed on probation.

Such probation shall not be granted until an investigation and recommendation shall have been made by the probation officer of the court, if there be one, otherwise by the Division, concerning the advisability and terms thereof, but the granting or denial and the terms of probation shall be within the discretion of the court. If probation is granted, the court in its discretion may place the defendant under the supervision of the Division. Otherwise such probation may be granted pursuant to law without regard to this Act.

The first part of this section follows substantially Section 1731.5 of the California act. The latter part respecting probation is new but is suggested by the proposed federal act which provides for recommendation of a board before final sentence.

Sec. 21—A person, who is convicted of a felony or gross misdemeanor and who is found to be less than twenty-five years of age at the time of apprehension, may not be imprisoned in any place which has been disapproved for that purpose by the Division.

This is an adaptation of Section 1732.4 of the California act with an important modification. The California act, following the language in Section 13 (1) of the Youth Correction Authority Act, permits imprisonment only in approved places. The above provision prohibits imprisonment in disapproved places. The purpose of the change is a practical one. As the California and model acts are drawn, no jail in the state could be used until approved. This might leave the state without places of imprisonment or as an alternative the approval by the Division of places it feels should not be approved. As drawn, the burden is on the Division to determine that a place is unsatisfactory for confinement of a youth.

Sec. 22—When a judge commits a person to the Division the judge may order him conveyed forthwith to some place of detention approved or established or designated by the Division or may direct that he be left at liberty until otherwise ordered by the Division under such conditions as in the judge's opinion will insure his submission to any orders which the Division may issue.

This adopts Section 18 of the Youth Correction Authority Act and Section 1738 of the California act. The words "or designated" have been added. The thought in mind is to make clear where the defendant is to be sent by the court upon commitment to the Division.

Sec. 24—When a person has been committed to the Division it shall, under rules established by it, forthwith examine and study him and investigate all the pertinent circumstances of his life and the antecedents of the crime because of which he has been committed to it, and thereupon order such treatment as it shall determine to be most conducive to the accomplishment of the purposes of this Act. The court and the prosecuting and police authorities and other public officials shall make available to the Division all pertinent data in their possession in respect to the case.

The first sentence adopts Section 28 (1) of the Youth Correction Authority Act and Section 1761 of the California act. The second sentence follows Section 21 of the Youth Correction Authority Act. The California act, Section 1741, has added considerably further detail and provisions as to the officials to whom it applies and the nature of the information required, and providing for reports on forms furnished by the Division.

Sec. 25—When a person has been committed to the Division it may (a) place him on probation under such supervision and conditions as it believes conducive to law-abiding conduct; (b) order his confinement to such reformatory, state prison, jail, or other place of confinement to which he might have been sentenced by the court in which he was convicted except for this Act. Such reformatories, state prisons, jails or other places of confinement are hereby required to accept such persons in like manner as though they had been committed by such court; (c) order his release on parole from confinement under such supervision and conditions as it believes conducive to law-abiding conduct; (d) order recommitment or renewed parole as often as conditions indicate to be desirable; (e) revoke or modify any order except an order of discharge as often as conditions indicate to be desirable; (f) discharge him from its control when it is satisfied that such discharge is consistent with the protection of the public.

The control of the Division shall cease at the expiration of the maximum term provided by law for the crime for which such person was convicted and he shall thereupon be entitled to a discharge in any event whether on probation, parole or under confinement.

This adopts with substantial changes Section 30 (1) of the Youth Correction Authority Act and Section 1766 of the California act. Subdivision (a) provides for probation, subdivision (b) for commitment to an existing institution, and subdivision (c) for parole. As thus drawn it corresponds more closely with recognized existing practices in this state than the proposed Youth Correction Authority Act. The difference from present practices is primarily in shifting the determination of these matters from the court and the present parole board to the Division. Subdivision (f) provides for discharge. In effect, it is a termination of the sentence determined at the end of corrective treatment rather than at the beginning. In any event its control ends with the expiration of the maximum term which the sentence carries or on the defendant's 25th or 30th birthday. See Section 33. The last sentence of subdivision (b) is taken from Section 25 (5) of the Youth Correction Authority Act, and section 1755 of the California act.

The last sentence of this section has been added since commitment to the Division under this Act as drawn is for an indefinite term not exceeding the maximum fixed by statute for the crime involved.

Sec. 26—As a means of correcting the socially harmful tendencies of a person committed to it, the Division may (a) require participation by him in vocational, physical, educational and corrective training and activities; (b) require such conduct and modes of life as seem best adapted to fit him for return to full liberty without danger to the public welfare.

This adopts Section 31 of the Youth Correction Authority Act and Section 1768 of the California act with subdivision (c) thereof omitted.

Sec. 31—The Division shall make periodic re-examinations of all persons within its control for the purpose of determining whether existing orders and dispositions in individual cases should be modified or continued in force. These examinations may be made as frequently as the Division considers desirable and shall be made with respect to every person at intervals not exceeding two years

This incorporates Section 28 (2) of the Youth Correction Authority Act and Section 1762 of the California act except that the California act requires examinations every year.

Sec. 32—The Division shall keep written records of all examinations and of the conclusions predicated thereon and of all orders concerning the disposition or treatment of every person subject to its control.

This copies Section 28 (3) of the Youth Correction Authority Act and Section 1763 of the California act.

Sec. 33—Unless previously discharged under the provisions of this Act the Division shall discharge the defendant from its control and give him his liberty on his twenty-fifth birthday if he was under the age of 21 years at the time of his apprehension and on his thirtieth birthday if he was over such age unless the Division shall determine that such discharge at that time would be dangerous to the public in which event the Division shall terminate its control in the following manner:

(1) If he be then on probation under the supervision of the probation officer of a district court, the future control and disposition of the case shall be in all respects as though such probation were under the order of said court; (2) if he be then on probation, but not under the supervision of a local probation officer, or if he be on parole, control of him shall be transferred to the state parole board who shall thereupon assume like control over him as though he were on parole following sentence of a court for a maximum term provided by law for the crime for which he was committed; (3) if he be then confined in a penal institution, the control of the Division shall cease and such confinement shall be upon like terms and conditions as though it had been under sentence of court for the maximum term provided by law for the crime for which he was committed.

The function of the Division is to deal with youth. The maximum sentences under which youths will be committed to it will sometimes be for long terms. If they remained for that length of time under the control of the Division, it would mean that in time substantial numbers of adults would be under the control and direction of the Division. This would be outside its purpose. Hence, the above section provides the means by which its control shall terminate at his twenty-fifth or thirtieth birthday, depending on his age at the time of his apprehension, by transferring him to the jurisdiction of the district court or to the parole board or, if he is confined, leaving it to the parole board under existing law for further action.

Sec. 34—In addition to the powers now conferred by 2 Mason Minn. Stat., 1927, sec. 8648, the juvenile court of any county not having a probation officer shall have the power, in its discretion and with the consent of the Division, to place any child, whom it has adjudged delinquent as defined in 2 Mason Minn.Stat., 1927, sec. 8636, in the care or custody of the Division on such terms and conditions as the court may prescribe. The Division shall not have power by virtue thereof to place such child in any penal institution. Such juvenile court may also request, and it shall be the duty of the Division to make, an investigation and recommendation to the court, either before or after the hearing, respecting the proper disposition which should be made of such child.

This will extend the probation facilities of the Division to the juvenile courts and is regarded as one of the important provisions of the Act.

Sec. 35—The care, custody or control of any delinquent child which has been committed to it by a juvenile court shall cease on the 21st birthday of such child.

This corresponds to a similar provision in the existing juvenile court law.

Sec. 36—If a sentence of imprisonment for life is imposed upon a person under twenty-five years of age at the time of his apprehension, and if before he reaches the age of twenty-five, the Board of Pardons commutes the sentence by committing him to the Division, the Division shall assume control over him pursuant to the provision of this Act.

This incorporates Section 14 of the Youth Correction Authority Act.

Sec. 37—Whenever the Division is of the opinion that there are grounds for believing that a person committed to it is insane or a psychopathic personality as defined in Laws of Minn., 1939, chapter 369, sec. 1, the Division may institute, or cause to be instituted, proceedings in the probate court of the county in which such person then resides or is confined to determine he is insane or a psychopathic personality. If the court shall so find, he shall be transferred by the order of the court to the state asylum for the dangerous insane or to a state hospital for the insane in the discretion of the court, there to be kept and maintained as in the case of other persons. If, in the judgment of the superintendent of the asylum or hospital, his sanity is restored before the period of his commitment to the Division has expired, he shall be returned by the director of public institutions to the Division for such further disposition or treatment as is provided by this Act.

Similar provisions now exist with respect to penal institutions. See Minn. Stat., 1941, sec. 253.21.

Sec. 39—Whenever a person, who has been committed to the Division upon conviction of a crime, shall be discharged from its control other than by expiration of the maximum term of commitment as provided by this Act, or under the provisions of Section 33, such discharge shall have the effect, when so ordered by the Division, of restoring such person to all civil rights and shall have the effect of setting aside the conviction and nullifying the same and of purging such person thereof and such person shall never thereafter be required to disclose the conviction at any time or place other than in a criminal proceeding thereafter instituted against him.

This follows the language of Section 638.02, 2 Minn. Stat., 1941, providing for a pardon extraordinary for minors.

NOTES

1. The first publicity designed to marshall public opinion in support of the proposed Youth Correction Act appeared in the Minneapolis Tribune on July 9, 1944, and consisted of a summary of the Committee's report. The newspaper story said that the "core of the plan is to create a division of the parole board to which all youths convicted of a felony or gross misdemeanor and not put on probation by the courts are committed automatically for treatment".

2. Minneapolis Star-Journal—Nov. 30, 1944: "Clash on Youth Authority Seen.—Difficulties expected to confront those urging passage by the state legislature of the proposed youth correction act were cited Wednesday night by panel discussion speakers before the Minnesota Hygiene Society. Belief that passage will be difficult was expressed by Howard Hush, Hennepin County probation officer; Maynard E. Pirsig, University law professor, and John J. Doyle, Ramsey County probation officer. Legislative opposition, all three agreed, will center principally around appropriations, $75,000 the first year, with an expected increase eventually to nearly $500,000 yearly. Doyle suggested further opposition because, he said, the act will take power from the district judges.

Ramsey County District Judge Gustavus Loevinger, principal speaker, outlined advantages and objections of opponents and proponents of the act. Advantages were listed as segregation of juveniles, late adolescents and adults; standardization of correction procedure and better correction facilities. Among objections, he said, are lack of personnel to carry out the act; possible disruption of the present legal system; putting commission under control of the pardon board; likelihood that judges would mete out more fines and less than 90-day sentences to avoid giving the commission custody, and establishing the maximum age limit too high."

3. Star Journal—Mar. 21, 1945: "Dillon Asks Aid for Youthful Law Violators.—Practice of sending youthful law violators to institutions where they come into contact with hardened criminals was sharply criticised by Michael J. Dillon, Hennepin County attorney, at a meeting of the Loring Park Community Council. He praised the proposed Youth Correction Act now before the Legislature."

4. Star Journal—Apr. 18, 1945: "Youth Aid Bill Death Seen in Senate. Failure of any member of the senate finance committee to make a motion to recommend passage of the youth correction act today meant the virtual death of the measure. A product of the Minnesota Bar Association which studied the problem for four years, the bill was passed in the house of representatives and has been pigeon-holed in the finance committee. The finance committee does not plan to meet again, before adjournment at midnight, for passage of bills, but if other matters make a meeting possible, the bill could be revived."

5. Report of Committee on Youth Correction Authority Act, 1945:

TO THE MINNESOTA STATE BAR ASSOCIATION:

Pursuant to the duties assigned to it at the last meeting of the Association, the committee did what it could to present to the public the nature, purpose and provisions of the Youth Correction Act as endorsed by the Association. After giving the proposal full consideration, it was endorsed and sponsored by the Minnesota County Attorneys Association, the Minnesota Junior Chamber of Commerce, the Minneapolis Junior Chamber of Commerce, the Council of the Minnesota State Medical Association and various other organizations. There is every indication that it has wide public support.

The bill was introduced in the House of Representatives at the last legislative session by Representatives George A. French, Walter F. Rogosheske, Carl Wegner, Sigvald B. Oyen and Everett L. Peterson. After a full hearing, the civil administration committee of the House approved the measure for passage. Amendments were made by it which made the members of the proposed division other than the chairman of the Parole Board part time members. They also reduced the maximum age covered from 25 to 21 and made corresponding reduction in the appropriations the bill carried. These changes were made after careful consideration and based on considerations of policy which appeared persuasive to the committee.

A hearing was subsequently had before the appropriations committee of the House which likewise recommended the bill for passage. On the floor of the House, he bill was amended to substitute appointment of the part time members by the governor with confirmation by the Senate for the methods provided for in the original bill. As so amended the bill passed the House with only one dissenting vote.

The authors of the bill in the Senate were Senators A. O. Sletvold, chairman of the Judiciary Committee and Thomas P. Welch. After amendments conforming the bill to that before the House the Judiciary Committee, after hearings, recommended the bill for passage and obtained a position for it on General Orders giving it a preferred status for action by the Senate. The first open opposition to the bill appeared at these hearings. Mr. Carl Swanson, director of the Division of Public Institutions, Warden Utecht of the prison at Stillwater and Mr. C. J. Jackson, of the State Training School for Boys spoke in opposition to the bill to the effect that it was new and untried, that its objectives could be achieved under present arrangements and that the gravity of youth delinquency had been exaggerated.

The bill met its death in the Finance Committee of the Senate. Questions by its acting chairman, Senator H. H. Sullivan of St. Cloud, indicated the view that what the bill proposed could be accomplished under the present set up and that a judge after trial is in a better position to render sentence than a board such as that provided in the bill. The bill remained in the committee until the expiration of the legislative session.

After the wide support accorded the bill, both in and out of the Legislature, your committee believes that the association should continue its efforts to keep informed concerning developments in this and other states, to acquaint the public further with the bill and to prepare for further effort to gain its enactment at the next session of the Legislature.

6. The Minneapolis Star and Journal—Tues., Jan. 7, 1947:

"NEW BACKING, NAME GIVEN YOUTH BILL

"The proposed 'youth correction act' was retitled 'youth conservation act' and given fresh impetus for possible 1947 passage when lawyers, social workers and other proponents met with Gov.-elect Luther W. Youngdahl Monday at Nicollet hotel.

"Purpose of the act, backed by the Minnesota State Bar association and other groups, is 'prevention of delinquency and crime . . . substituting for retributive punishment methods of training and treatment directed toward rehabilitation

"Co-operation between the state division of social welfare and the division of public institutions to form a commission to operate with a third party or 'youth conservation commissioner,' appeared assured. Attending yesterday's meeting were Carl Swanson, public institutions chief, and Jarle Leirfallom, director of social welfare.

"There was no opposition from wardens and superintendents of state reformatories. Superintendent C. J. Jackson said he would favor a three-man youth commission.

"A youth guidance clinic, expunging of juvenile delinquency records after treatment of the delinquent and uniform sentencing are things we need,' said Reuben Brustuen, chairman of the state board of parole.

"The model 'youth correction act' prepared by Prof. Maynard E. Pirsig of University of Minnesota law school, was amended in several details.

"Frank Rarig, Jr., director of Wilder charities, St. Paul, proposed a statewide board to guide administration of youth conservation work.

"Youngdahl himself proposed the change in title from 'youth correction' to 'youth conservation.'

"Theodore Knudson, assistant Hennepin county attorney and vice president of the Hennepin County Bar association, recommended that each juvenile delinquency case be reviewed once a year instead of once in two years, as currently proposed.

"Mrs. Lawrence D. Steefel, 2808 W. River road, pointed out that proper setup of the youth conservation commission might entitle Minnesota to federal grants as high as $3,000,000 for mental-hygiene work."

7. The Minneapolis Star—Sat., Feb. 22, 1947:

"YOUTH PLAN IN STATE RATED ONE OF BEST

"Minnesota, in youth conservation plans, is among four leading states in the nation, John R. Ellingston, Philadelphia, special adviser on criminal justice for youth, American Law institute, told state legislators.

"Only California, which has had a full-fledged youth program since 1941, is ahead of Minnesota, he said at a hearing Friday on the proposed youth conservation measure in the judiciary committee of the house of representatives.

"Wisconsin, after a two-year study by a legislative interim committee, introduced last week a bill similar to the Minnesota measure, he reported, and Illinois is still in the planning stage on a statewide program to apply modern prevention and cure methods to boys and girls apt to get in trouble.

"Ellingston urged broad year-round community school programs, better probation service, case-work training for local police officers, and health and mental checkups preceding disciplinary action whenever youngsters are in trouble.

"Juvenile arrests in California have dropped 'phenomenally' in recent years, despite rapid population growth and crowded housing, he added.

"Delinquency workshops in six California colleges, and state forestry camps for boys, were described by Theodore B. Knudson, newly-appointed Minneapolis municipal judge.

"The judiciary committee chairman, Representative Frederick P. Memmer, St. Paul, said:

"If this goes far enough to really build up fundamental values in our youth, we may do away with the materialistic philosophy under which we live today."

8. The Minneapolis Star—Thurs., Mar. 27, 1947:

"ATTORNEYS BACK YOUTH MEASURE

"Support for Gov. Luther Youngdahl's youth conservation bill, which already carries indorsement of the Minnesota State Bar association, was expressed by members of the legal profession before the house appropriations committee today.

"Sponsored by Representative George French of Minneapolis and others, the measure would establish a youth conservation commission empowered to prescribe corrective treatment for persons under 21 years old who are convicted of crime.

"M. J. Dillon, Hennepin county attorney, termed the bill 'a piece of preventive legislation which would do scientifically what we would have done haphazardly, or have neglected to do, up to the present time.'

"Municipal Judge Theodore Knudson, Minneapolis; John R. Ellingston of New York, representing the American Law institute; Judge Douglas Hunt of Montevideo and Gordon Wright of Minneapolis, representing the state bar association, also spoke for the measure, which already has been approved by the house judiciary committee.

"The measure carries an appropriation of $300,000 for the biennium, but Wright said the bar association believes that $75,000 for the first year and $125,000 for the second will get the project under way."

9. Report of Youth Correction Authority Act Committee, 1947:

TO THE MINNESOTA STATE BAR ASSOCIATION:

Your Committee recommends:

Recommendation

That a Committee on the Youth Conservation Act be created, and that it be charged with the duty of studying the operation and administration of the act, of consulting and advising with the Youth Conservation Commission concerning the same, of cooperating with other agencies and groups interested in the successful functioning of the act, and of reporting its observations, conclusions and recommendations, if any, to this association.

Report

At the legislative session just concluded the Youth Conservation Act was enacted into law. Minnesota is the second state in the Union to adopt this legislation. The act represents the greatest advance in the field of criminal law since the adoption of the Juvenile Court Act, at the turn of the century. The act adopted originated in the bill prepared by this committee. It was approved by this Association, and was presented to the legislature under the sponsorship of the Association.

The Minnesota State Bar Association may take pride in the fact that it stands alone among state bar associations in securing the enactment of this legislation. At the same time, full recognition and appreciation should be given for the indispensable support and assistance which the bill received from many other organizations and individuals. Within the confines of this report, only the organizations operating on a state-wide level, and coming to the attention of this Committee can be mentioned. These include:

- County Attorney's Association
- Minnesota State Medical Association
- League of Minnesota Municipalities
- Minnesota Federation of Women's Clubs
- Minnesota Junior Chamber of Commerce
- Minnesota Federation of Church Women
- Association of Minnesota Colleges and Universities
- Probate Judges Association
- Mental Hygiene Society
- Association of Applied Psychology
- Minnesota Welfare Conference
- Minnesota Probation and Parole Association
- Minnesota Association of University Women

So many individuals aided in securing the enactment of this legislation, that to name any, risks the omission of others equally deserving of mention. A few carried the major burden of supporting the bill step by step, through its course to enactment. Some special acknowledgment of their efforts should be made, for they spelled the difference between failure and success.

The governor's continuous and vital support is of course well known. Hon. Theodore B. Knudson, recently appointed judge of the Municipal Court of Minneapolis, took a leading part in urging this legislation from the time it was first considered. When a committee was formed to coordinate the legislative efforts of the various organizations interested in the bill, he was named its secretary, and as such, fully measured up to the responsibility entrusted to him in organizing and directing an effective presentation of the matter to the legislature.

John R. Ellington, special advisor on this subject to the American Law Institute, was of indispensable assistance to the public and to the legislature in clarifying and explaining the practical operation of the act, and in providing first-hand information of the workings of the similar act in California.

Hon. H. J. Ruegger, president of the Probate Judges Association, with his long experience and recognized knowledge of the problem, carried great weight with members of the legislature in presenting his endorsement of the bill. This was true, also of Hon. Douglas P. Hunt, chairman of the legislative committee of the same association, who actively supported the bill.

Mention should also be made of members of the legislature who carried the burden of securing passage of this bar legislation. The authors in the Senate were Senators Sletvold, who presented the bill on the floor, Welch and Feidt. The authors in the House of Representatives were Messrs. Dunn, Hartle, French, Rogosheske, who presented the bill on the floor, and Root. The efforts and the confidence reposed in each of the authors accounted in considerable part for the success that was achieved. Acknowledgment should also be made of the unrelenting support and drive contributed by Representative Carl Wegner on behalf of the bill in the House.

In this, as well as in the previous session, the sponsorship by the president of this association and the chairman of the legislative committee were of a high order. The tact, prestige and ability exhibited by our president, Senator Galvin, and by Gordon Wright, chairman of the Legislative Committee, deserve the gratitude of the association.

Passage of the act should not be the occasion for this association discontinuing its interest in the subject. There still remains the equally important task of securing an effective administration of the act. Many problems will arise and experience may show the need for some changes in the act not now foreseeable. In these respects, the bar can and should be of material assistance. For the reasons the recommendation at the beginning of this report is made. Having assured the public that this act will work, that it provides a more effective instrument for attacking the problem of juvenile delinquency, and for correcting and rehabilitating delinquent youths, the bar must assume some responsibility for seeing that these objectives are realized.

Study No. 2.

EXPLANATORY NOTE

Although much can be learned concerning the methods of shaping and presenting issues to the legislature and the other factors characteristic of the legislative process by careful analysis of "case studies" such as the specimen just set out, a much more effective device is to make a first hand study of the original materials which establish the pre-natal history of a particular statute. As a part of its collateral work, each class in Legislation at the University of Minnesota Law School makes a study of the latest volume of session laws, the result being embodied in a Note in the Minnesota Law Review designed to acquaint the lawyers of the state engaged in general practice with the essential features of the new laws. [The latest example will be found in 31 Minn.L.Rev. 35 (1946).] The following questionnaire has been evolved by trial and error as a guide for this study. It is included here rather than in an appendix, since the sample answer illustrating its use presents a case study demonstrating additional points relevant to the topic of this Section and several to be encountered in later Chapters.

THE VOLUNTARY NON-PROFIT MEDICAL SERVICE PLAN CORPORATIONS ACT

(Study of 1945 Session Laws of Minnesota, Chapter 255)
(M.S.A.1945, c. 159)

By ROY W. HOLMQUIST and JAMES WANVIG, Class of 1947
The Law School, University of Minnesota.

I. SUBSTANCE OF THE ACT

1. Chapter 255¹ is a creative statute providing for the incorporation and regulation of nonprofit medical service plan corporations, which are authorized to make contracts with subscribers under which the subscribers are entitled to specified medical and surgical care. Such corporations may not, however, sell cash indemnity contracts. The act, among other regulations as to the organization and operation of such corporations, requires that under the contract the subscriber shall have free choice of any doctor of medicine.

This act is supplementary to Minnesota Laws, 1941, c. 53,² which provided for the incorporation of nonprofit hospital service plan corporations, in the sense that the medical service plan and the hospital service plan will be supplementary in providing complete prepaid medical care.

2. This act does not affect any other statutes directly.

3. Prior to the enactment of this law there was no Minnesota Statute dealing specifically with nonprofit medical service plan corporations, nor are there any judicial decisions dealing with such corporations. There was some doubt, however, as to the validity of such corporations in the absence of specific enabling legislation. Similar corporations had been subjected to legal attacks on two grounds: (1) that they were engaged in the corporate practice of medicine,³ (2) that they were insurance companies, and that in failing to comply with the insurance laws they were acting invalidly.⁴ This act eliminates any doubt on either ground by: (1) specifically authorizing such corporations, and (2) exempting them from operation of the insurance statutes, with specified exceptions.

4. This act has not been applied by the Minnesota Courts as yet. The projected nonprofit medical service plan corporation is still in the process of organization by the Minnesota State Medical Association, and has not yet commenced operations.

5. The announced objective of this act is "to make possible a wider and more timely availability of medical care, thereby advancing the public health and the science and art of medicine in this state." It is sought to achieve this objective through a plan for the prepayment of medical expenses, at reasonable rates, so that medical service will be available and paid for when needed. Another objective of the act is to preserve the "right" of free choice of physician by subscribers to the plan.

6. Socially, the facts calling for a medical service plan were that adequate medical service was unavailable to a large share of our population,⁵ and that severe financial strain was imposed by sudden severe illness upon many of those families to whom medical care was available. Legally, the stimulus for this legislation was the doubt which existed as to the validity of corporations organized to provide prepaid medical care. As has been suggested,⁶ the corporations might have been valid without enabling legislation, but this act clearly established their legal status. Whether the plan contemplated by the act will accomplish its purpose remains to be determined. The sponsors have never suggested that the plan is a panacea; but it seems likely that a considerable group of persons will be able more easily to meet the financial requirements of illness by the prepayment method.

7. Sanctions are not a major element of this act, since it is primarily an enabling act. But it is also a regulatory act, and some sanctions are therefore used.

A forfeit of $50.00 is imposed for failure to comply with a requirement that an announcement of incorporation be published and proof of publication be filed with the secretary of state.

It is provided that in the event a corporation has acted in a manner detrimental and unjust to subscribers, or contrary to or in violation of its articles and by-laws, the commissioner of insurance may request the attorney general to bring an action against such corporation to terminate its corporate existence.

Finally, it is provided that a violation of any provision of the chapter, or any false statement with respect to any report or statement required by the chapter, shall be a misdemeanor.

It would seem that these sanctions are the only kind reasonably adapted to enforcing an act such as this. It might be noted that the provision with respect to filing of articles of incorporation and publication of notice of incorporation⁷ have been adopted almost verbatim from the Minnesota Business Corporations Act,⁸ where the same sanction is effectively employed. There is no similar requirement of publication, however, with respect to nonprofit hospital service plan corporations,⁹ nor with respect to certain other nonprofit corporations.¹⁰

Similarly, there is no provision permitting the insurance commissioner to request the attorney general to bring suit to terminate the corporate existence of nonprofit hospital service corporations. On the other hand, rules governing chambers of commerce and trading exchanges are considerably more stringent, making it mandatory that the attorney general shall by quo warranto initiate proceedings to terminate the corporate existence, as well as prosecute and enjoin further violations.¹¹ The provision in the medical service plan bill, together with others giving some controls to the insurance commissioner, was added by amendment in the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and probably manifests a legislative opinion that some control of such corporations by the insurance commissioner was desirable, and that some sanction was necessary to make such control effective. That the degree of control and sanctions imposed was considerably less than that imposed upon some other types of corporations is probably an indication of legislative confidence in the sponsors of this act and of a desire not to hinder by excessive regulation the full and rapid growth of medical service plan corporations.

In some acts relating to corporations, violations of the provisions of the act are made felonies.¹² In view, however, of the nonprofit nature of medical service plan corporations, of the high ethical standards to be expected from the medical profession, of the relatively smaller opportunity for fraud, and of the great public pressure exerted on professional groups, it was apparently believed that making violations a misdemeanor would be sufficient in this instance.

II. STATUTORY HISTORY

Since this is the original enactment dealing with medical service plan corporations, the statute has no history in Minnesota prior to its enactment in 1945.

III. LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

1. The Minnesota State Medical Association sponsored this act.¹³ Why did they sponsor it? This act would enable the medical profession to devise and operate a plan whereby the persons with average incomes could pool their resources in purchasing medical service. It was designed to meet this need, but, of course, is applicable to persons in the higher income brackets too. The plan which this act visualizes not only serves this purpose, but it at the same time protects the private interests of the individual doctors. It assures that the individual shall have complete freedom in choosing any doctor whom he desires. It specifically prohibits corporate medical practice. The medical profession disfavors any plan involving corporate medical practice or a compulsion to be treated by a certain doctor or group of doctors. It assures their profession freedom and competition which they feel is the only method of maintaining the present high standards of the medical profession and progress of the medical sciences. Yet the medical profession sensed that they were not fulfilling their duty to the public and that too many people were unable to purchase needed medical service. To maintain their professional freedom and at the same time make their services more available, this act was sponsored by the medical profession of the state.

2. Companion bills were introduced in each house of the legislature. The authors of Senate File No. 308 were: Harry L. Wahlstrand, W. B. Richardson, and J. V. Weber. The authors of House File No. 382 were: Lawrence M. Hall, Roy E. Dunn, A. M. Burnap, A. B. Anderson, and Claude Allen.

¹³ 28 Minnesota Medicine 221, March, 1945.

The Minnesota State Medical Association obtained the signatures of the above named representatives and senators as authors of the bill. These legislators were strongly in favor of the bill and very influential in their respective houses. Their names on a bill carried much weight. They had the leadership and following to see the bill through both houses of the legislature. The Minnesota State Medical Association drafted the bill which was introduced in both houses as companion bills.

3 & 4. The Minnesota State Medical Association lobbied for the bill and was responsible for its passage. The Insurance Federation of Minnesota and the Group Health Association were the two chief opponents of the bill who lobbied against it. In addition a few insurance companies had legal counsel appear before the committees on their behalf, but the principal lobbyists pro and con were representatives of these three organizations.

Members of the Minnesota State Medical Association, its legal counsel, and the authors of the bill advanced most of the arguments for the bill. They cited the need for such an organization to equalize the burden of medical service among those who subscribed to the plan. This was to be a non-profit organization operated by the medical doctors themselves. Being nonprofit it could provide medical care at rates more reasonable than rates of insurance companies offering health insurance policies. This bill was designed to provide a plan which would appeal to and help the average wage earner. All persons would be able to subscribe to the plan whatever their risk. Insurance companies now only insure the good risks which deprives many persons in most need of such insurance of the advantage of it. Of course, waiting periods would be enforced to protect the corporation from fraudulent claims.

The proponents went on to point out the success of the Blue Cross Organization in Minnesota. The medical service plan was designed to supplement it—the Blue Cross providing hospitalization, and the medical service corporation the medical care. At the time this bill was under consideration nonprofit medical service plans were in operation in 21 states.¹⁴ The growth and success of these plans was cited. In addition, in a poll taken by the Medical Association it was found that 83% of the people of the state favored such a plan.¹⁵

Furthermore, this plan would protect the medical practice and safeguard the individual's right to choose his own doctor. Competition and initiative would be retained.

The lobbyists against the bill advance the argument that this would deprive insurance companies—free and competitive enterprises—of much business. They further contended that insurance companies were adequately fulfilling the need and the demand of the public for such protection and service at a price within reach of most people and that the number of people carrying health insurance was rapidly increasing. They pointed to similar plans in other states which met with failure.¹⁶ In their opinion this was a plan fostered by the medical profession to save themselves from socialized medicine and was not for the protection and welfare of the average wage earner.

¹⁴ 28 Minnesota Medicine 470, June, 1945.

¹⁵ 28 Minnesota Medicine 221, March, 1945.

5. In the House of Representatives the bill met with little opposition. It was sent to the Committee on Health and reported out favorably without any amendments.¹⁷ The House passed it by a substantial majority in its original form as introduced.¹⁸

Its passage through the Senate was more difficult. The Senate bill was referred to the Committee on Public Health. This committee recommended its passage without amendment.¹⁹ A futile attempt was made to rerefer the bill to the Committee on Insurance.²⁰ This can be interpreted as an effort by the opponents of the bill to kill it in committee or to amend the bill so as to put the corporations under the supervision of the Commissioner of Insurance to the same extent as insurance companies. The bill was then referred to the Judiciary Committee. It was reported out with recommendations for passage, but with the following amendments:²¹

a) In the first sentence of section 2 the words "hereinafter incorporated" were inserted after the word "corporations". So the section read as follows: "Nonprofit medical service plan corporations HEREINAFTER INCORPORATED may be organized under and in accordance with the provisions of this chapter by not less than 21 persons, . . . etc." (The amendment is in capital letters.) This was inserted to insure that this act would be applicable only to medical service corporations coming into existence after the act was passed and to leave no doubt that it did not apply to such corporations then in being.

(b) To section 3, subdiv. (g) was added: ". . . all of which shall be paid in in cash before the corporation commences business". This subdivision provides that the corporation must have a stated capital of not less than $25,000. before commencing business. It was added to insure that this $25,000. was not only contracted for, but in the form of ready cash.

c) The following addition (amendment in capital letters) was made to section 3: "Articles of incorporation may contain any other provisions, consistent with the laws of this state, for regulating the corporation's affairs, WHICH SAID ARTICLES OF INCORPORATION AND ANY BY-LAWS ADOPTED THEREUNDER OR ANY AMENDMENTS THERETO, AS WELL AS THE CONTRACT TO BE SOLD TO THE SUBSCRIBERS, SHALL BE SUBMITTED TO

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR EXAMINATION AND APPROVAL, SO AS TO CARRY OUT THE INTENT AND PURPOSE OF THIS CHAPTER." In the bill as introduced no provision was made for the submitting of the articles or contracts to the Commissioner of Insurance. It was the desire of the sponsors of the act that this organization would be independent of any governmental supervision. They argued that it was to be a nonprofit organization, incorporated and operated by the sponsors of the bill. There could be no incentive to make large profits at the expense of the public. The organization was for the welfare of the public. For these reasons the sponsors did not see the need for supervision. However, the committee felt some need for a check to insure complete protection of the public interest. This amendment was therefore made. To further safeguard the public interest, section 13, providing for an annual report by the corporation to the Commissioner of Insurance was inserted as an amendment by the committee. An amendment was added to section 14 providing that the Commissioner of Insurance may request the Attorney-General to bring an action to terminate its corporate existence if the corporation "has acted in a manner detrimental and unjust" to the subscribers.

d) In the last part of section 6 the following italicized words were deleted: ". . . the sum contributed as the working capital of such corporation shall be repayable only out of surplus earnings of such corporation, and after adequate and reasonable reserves to assure faithful performance of such contracts are provided for." In lieu thereof the following was inserted: ". . . after reserves for incurred claims, unearned subscriber's payments and a reasonable amount for contingencies have been provided and approved by the Commissioner of Insurance." This substitution was made for the protection of the public. Note that here again the committee provided for approval by the Commissioner of Insurance. Furthermore the committee desired that it be made more explicit what provisions are to be made financially by the corporations before the working capital is repaid. They had in mind the fact that the doctors contributed that working capital and through their control of the corporation might provide for its repayment before the subscribing members were fully protected financially.

e) To section 7 was added the following provision: "The names of the doctors of medicine belonging to said corporation or enrolled as members therein, shall not be printed or listed upon any contracts furnished to subscribers." The committee added this amendment to assure that doctors would not be able to insert their names on the contracts and through this association with the corporation have their individual names and practices advertised.

These amendments were duly adopted by the Senate²² and also the following were adopted by the Senate in Committee of the Whole:²³

a) Senator Carr proposed that section 2, line 1 be amended by striking the words "Every nonprofit" and in lieu thereof inserting the word "Nonprofit". He further proposed that the word "corporation" as used in the original bill in section 2, line 1 be changed to "corporations". The proposed amendments were so passed. These two amendments were of little significance and merely changed the wording of the sentence.

b) Senator Johnson proposed a third amendment in section 2, line 1. This was that the word "shall" after the words "hereinafter incorporated" be stricken and the word "may" be inserted in lieu thereof. It was duly adopted. This amendment did create a change in meaning and made incorporation of nonprofit medical service plan corporations under the provisions of this act discretionary. The retaining of the word "shall" would have made it mandatory. As it now reads the incorporators may incorporate under the provisions of charitable corporations act if they so desire.

The bill was passed by the Senate in this amended form,²⁴ sent to the House of Representatives for their approval and passed without any further amendments.²⁵ These amendments were correctly incorporated into the act.

IV. DERIVATION

1. The act was not original to Minnesota. Neither was it derived wholly from any one other state. At the time it was passed in Minnesota a number of states had similar acts—the first of its kind being passed in 1939. But the Minnesota statute is most closely allied to the Michigan Medical Service Plan Act passed in 1939.²⁶ At the time the Minnesota State Medical Association was drawing up the bill a number of member doctors went to Michigan and studied the operation of the plan incorporated under the Michigan act. Both of the Michigan and Minnesota acts specifically provide for free choice of doctor.²⁷ In both states the Commissioner of Insurance has the same checks and controls over the operation of the corporation. However, the Michigan act specifically provides that actions against the corporation based upon the physician-patient relationship are barred,²⁸ whereas the Minnesota statute does not. But the Minnesota act specifically forbids any contractual relationships between the corporation and the doctors "directly or indirectly".²⁹ This would seem to protect the corporation from any suit arising out of the physician-patient relationship.

²⁷ 1 Minn.Stat.1945, sec. 159.07; Mich.Stat.Annot., sec. 24.600.

The Minnesota statute has no tax exemption statute as does the Michigan act.³⁰ These corporations not being charitable, the sponsors of the Minnesota act saw no necessity or justification for tax exemption.

2. The Michigan statute has had no judicial interpretation. Its constitutionality has not been challenged in the courts. This history may justify the conclusion that the act was well drafted and that there have been no serious difficulties in its application. The medical service plan incorporated under the Michigan enabling act has worked very satisfactorily, although they went heavily into debt at first.³¹ There have been no amendments to the Michigan act since it was passed in 1939.

3. Twenty-two states, other than Minnesota, have similar acts.³² The statutes (see table attached as appendix.) vary in the degree of supervision exercised by the Commissioner of Insurance.³³ Chapter 255 provides for relatively little control by the Commissioner.

Some states have passed statutes under the provisions of which both medical and hospital service corporations may be incorporated or either of them. Minnesota's act provided only for the incorporation of medical service corporations because nonprofit hospital service plans had been provided for in the Blue Cross Hospital Service.³⁴

Approximately half of the states having a similar law specify that the doctor is to be under some kind of a contractual obligation with the corporation—in most instances to perform medical services for the subscribers. But the Minnesota act specifically forbids the corporation to enter into such contracts and provides that "all such matters shall be a matter of agreement directly between the patient and the doctor of medicine selected by the patient to treat him."³⁵ This provision assures the patient freedom to seek the services of any licensed medical doctor.

4. No cases were found interpreting the Minnesota statute nor any similar statute of another state.

V. CONSTITUTIONALITY

1. There is no question concerning the constitutionality of the act from a substantive viewpoint. The act does not deprive any person or persons of life, liberty, or property. Therefore, no question of due process is here involved. It does not in any manner impair ³⁰ Mich.Stat.Annot., sec. 24.605.

³¹ 28 Minnesota Medicine 470, June, 1945.

³² See tables attached as appendix listing these states (including Minnesota), the citations to their respective statutes, and the most important features of each statute.

³³ It might be mentioned at this point that shortly after the bill now under discussion was introduced another bill was introduced enabling the incorporation of nonprofit medical service plans, but providing for a very considerable amount of control by the Commissioner of Insurance.

³⁴ 2 Minn.Stat.1945, secs. 309.10-309.17.

the obligation of contracts. As has been brought out above³⁶ the Minnesota act specifically insures complete freedom of choice of doctor and there is no contractual obligation between the doctor and the corporation.

2. From a procedural or legislative viewpoint there is no question of the constitutionality of this act. Its passage through the legislature was in compliance with the procedural requirements of the Minnesota Constitution. The bill was read on three different days as required by the Constitution.³⁷ It was passed by a majority of both houses and the vote recorded in the journals.³⁸ The bill was properly enrolled³⁹ and upon passage signed by the presiding officers of each house and sent to the governor for his signature.

The act is not special legislation within the meaning of and prohibited by Art. IV, sec. 33 of the Constitution. The effect of judicial interpretation is that Sec. 33 forbids special legislation only on the subjects therein particularly enumerated, and the subject of this act is not one of those enumerated. But even if it were this would not be special legislation as its application is general: it applies equally to all persons who can comply with its prerequisites. Only medical doctors can by its terms organize a medical service plan under the provisions of this act⁴⁰ but this classification is germane to the purpose of the act. There is no question of uniformity of application and operation.

3. No constitutional problem has been raised in any state having similar statutes, so far as can be determined. A search has been made for cases dealing with the statutes listed in the appendix. Reference has been made to annotations of the statutes where available, to Shepard's Citations where state citators are available, and in all cases to the tables of Statutes Construed contained in the regional reporters of the National Reporter System. No cases were discovered. A further search was made for cases or opinions of the attorney general construing the Minnesota statute relating to non-profit hospital service plan corporations⁴¹ on the theory that such constructions would have persuasive effect by analogy. No such cases or opinions were found, however.

4. The title of the act appears to conform to Art. IV, sec. 27 of the Minnesota Constitution. The law seems to embrace only one subject, and that subject seems to be clearly expressed in its title, but maybe the title by specifying in greater detail than is necessary the objects of the act will have to be amended in a statute that later amends its substantive details.

(iii) PRESSURE OF ORGANIZED INTERESTS AND PUBLIC OPINION

NOTE—IMPROVING THE LEGISLATIVE PROCESS:
FEDERAL REGULATION OF LOBBYING

56 Yale L.J. 304 (1947).

In a world in which the center of political gravity is shifting from legislature to executive the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946¹ represents an attempt by Congress to reassess and strengthen its position as an integral part of representative government.² Congress has recognized the need for reorganizing and streamlining the decision making process if it is to recapture its position as the dominant policy determining branch of government. Reformation of the standing committees,³ increased use of governmental experts,⁴ higher sal-

³ Sections 102, 121. The 33 standing committees of the Senate and the 48 standing committees of the House are reduced to 15 and 19 respectively, thus eliminating many repetitive and overlapping functions previously performed. Regularization of committee procedure in respect to hearings, meetings, and record-keeping as well as definition of committee powers are all provisions designed to make more efficient utilization of both time and personnel. An unavoidable weakness of these sections is that they have only the force of Rules of the respective houses, and either may revoke provisions applicable to it. Opposition of legislators with vested interests in former committees may result in the mushrooming of new standing committees over a period of time. Although there is no indication that the number of standing committees will be increased by the 80th Congress, a growth in the number of special committees might also vitiate these provisions.

⁴ Sections 202, 203, 204. Appropriations to the Legislative Reference Bureau and the Office of Legislative Counsel are to be increased from $198,000 to $750,000 and $90,000 to $250,000 respectively in the hope that these services will be improved both in the quality of their work and in the number of legislators served. Other provisions provide for the employment of four experts to advise each standing committee and improved clerical aid. The original bill went even further in providing for an administrative assistant for each congressman and the establishment of an Office of Congressional Personnel designed to end the so-called patronage system. S. 2177, 79th Cong. 2nd Sess. (1946) §§ 201, 204. Opposition to the loss of such a political bonanza prevented their becoming a part of the Act. See 92 Cong. Rec., June 8, 1946, at 6654-6.

aries for members,⁵ prohibition of private legislation,⁶ regulation of lobbying activities⁷ are all methods of improving the intelligence function of government so as to increase the probability of rational legislative decision.

The provisions of the Act which regulate lobbying are, therefore, to be regarded as one element in a larger scheme to improve present political processes. Democratic political theory assumes that rational decision can best be reached after hearing and evaluating the interests of the component members of society. These interests are in theory expressed by individuals through the medium of their elected representatives in the legislature. Election of these representatives on a geographical basis overlooks the fact that individuals identify their interests not only with a state or political subdivision, but more importantly with a business, economic, social, or fraternal group. Technological advances in communication and transportation have facilitated group interests which are no longer confined within political boundaries. The failure of the Constitution to provide for group representation, the decline of the political party as a prompter of opinion and policy, the intrusion of government into virtually all fields of economic activity, and the increasing complexity of modern legislative problems have led to the development of a powerful extra-legal machinery for achieving group aims. Today legislation is the result of a compromise between these conflicting group interests, but survival of geographical representation largely obscures the functional basis for legislative action.

Two groups have advanced remedies designed to reconcile the existing fact situation with political theory. The first seeks a means by which group interests can be fitted into the formal pattern of government, a system of functional representation as a substitute for, or supplement to, existing political institutions.⁸ On the other hand, a

⁷ Section 301 et seq. Section 301 provides that Title III of the Act may be cited as the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act. See Comment (1947) 47 Col.L.Rev. 98.

⁸ Proposals for functional representation have never been as well received in the United States as in Europe. Political scientists have suggested constitutional revisions designed to eliminate the geographical system. See, for example, MacDonald, A New Constitution for a New America (1921). But practical efforts have been limited to proposals for advisory councils to represent economic interests as a supplement to geographical representation. In 1931 Senator LaFollette introduced a bill embodying this concept in Congress. See S. 6215, 71st Cong., 3rd Sess. (1931). Such a body to advise the executive was suggested by President Hoover's Research Committee on Social Trends, Recent Social Trends in the United States (1933). Pressure groups, notably the National Lumber Manufacturers Association and the United Steelworkers (CIO), have expressed approval of the idea. Statement of Robert K. Lamb, Hearings before the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress pursuant to H. Con. Res. 18, 79th Cong., 1st Sess. (1945) 1013.

Parliaments of industry or advisory councils have been widely adopted in Europe. Results in these countries have not, however, indicated that a formal joining of politics and economics is an effective solution to the problem of pressure groups.

second group regards the problem or representation as subordinate to a rationalization of the whole legislative process. Their emphasis is upon administrative efficiency, extension of federal research and information services, increased governmental planning, and bringing "lobbying" activities into the open. It is this view which Congress has espoused in the Reorganization Act.⁹

THE PROBLEM

If lobbying is defined in its broadest terms as any attempt by individuals or groups to influence governmental decision, it is apparent that in some form it inheres in all government.¹⁰ American history is full of examples of legislation passed at the instance of, and for the benefit of, special interests.¹¹ But lobbying today is both qualitatively and quantitatively a different problem from lobbying in the past. Whereas the old-style lobby, confined almost entirely to representatives of business interests, operated secretly and depended for its success upon personal solicitation of legislators, often accompanied by corruption, such methods are largely obsolete today.¹² Modern lobbyists, or legislative agents, act on behalf of almost every con-

¹¹ See Merriam, American Party System (1923) 113 et seq.; Odegard, Lobbies and American Legislation (1930) 31 Current History 690, 692. A recent study of 90 major laws disclosed that pressure groups were important in securing passage in every case, and that seven of these laws were in effect enacted by pressure groups, both the President and Congress subordinating their views to those of powerful lobbies. ¹² Discussions of the old-style lobby are found in Herring, op. cit. supra note 10, at 30-40; Boeckel, supra note 10 at 211-14; 2 Poore, Perley's Reminiscences (1886) 515 et seq. Occasionally the corruption resulted in a national scandal such as that which accompanied the operations of Cornelius Wendell, creator of the infamous "whiskey ring" during the administration of President Grant. The investigation of the Credit Mobilier in 1872 likewise revealed distribution of stock, free passes, telegraph and express franks to members of Congress. The old lobby center was Pendleton's Game Rooms, the "Hall of the Bleeding Heart," on Pennsylvania Avenue, where bribes were passed to impecunious legislators in the form of card winnings. Corrupt practices are still occasionally resorted to today. See the revelations of the activities of Robert Smith by the Black Investigating Committee, discussed in 27 Time (Mar. 30, 1936) 15-16, and the more recent disclosures of the Mead Committee Investigation of War Contracts, N. Y. Times, July 18, 1946, p. 1, col. 6. The greatest temptation to resort to bribery seems to be found in the awarding of contracts by governmental agencies.

ceivable business, economic, and social group,¹³ generally operate openly and frankly,¹⁴ and rely upon public opinion, real or stimulated through judicious use of publicity and propaganda, to compel legislative action.

Fundamental reasons for the transition from old to new lobby are to be found in the same considerations which have given rise to demands for functional representation.¹⁵ As the technological barriers to group organization on a national scale have been removed, the common interests of workers, farmers, professional men and social reformers have led each to strive to participate in governmental decisions. Increased public scrutiny of the legislative process, a consequence of the growth of radio and press services, has made legislators more conscious of the force of public opinion. Pressure groups with large memberships are an effective threat to an elective office holder through the votes they control and the large segment of public opinion they represent; those with a smaller popular base can secure legislative consideration of their proposals only by stimulating or feigning public approbation.

Legislative investigations aimed at disclosing the extent of lobbying practices bear striking testimony to the effectiveness of utilization of mass channels of propaganda provided by the newspaper, the radio, the school, the theater, and the church. Pressure can be brought on legislators by publicity campaigns designed to prompt constituents, within or without the pressure group, to bring influence to bear by writing letters or sending telegrams; at election dates, candidates, regardless of party affiliation, considered favorably disposed toward group interests can be supported by the organization; or public opinion can be skillfully moulded to identify the public interest with legislation favored by the group.

To supplement these indirect methods of influencing legislation most pressure groups maintain a Washington expert, and a technical information service. The expert, or lobbyist, makes the group's views known to legislators either through direct contact, testimony before committees or the submission of written statements, often carefully documented by highly paid legal counsel. He undertakes to provide extensive factual surveys to support his position, analyze legislation, draft bills, or perform any other service the congressman may desire. In addition he keeps the organization posted on the status of bills in committee or on the floor which may affect the group.

¹⁴ Since the power of modern pressure groups depends on the number of votes they control and their influence on public opinion there is little to gain from concealing their identity. For this reason many lobbyists, who represent groups with a large popular base, favor registration laws which will eliminate the "fake" lobbyist who represent non-existent groups. Furthermore, official recognition of their activities may serve to enhance their prestige. See Logan, supra note 10, at 73.

Even if no practical or constitutional difficulties were encountered, few observers today would advocate the abolition of pressure groups or forbid the activities of lobbyists. In addition to providing an unofficial form of functional representation, pressure group activities which publicize the legislative process, focus attention upon the voting records of congressmen, and keep the public informed as to the content and significance of legislative proposals are desirable in a democracy. The expert analysis of bills made by the competent lobbyist before congressional committees, and the link he provides between legislators and a large segment of the public may well improve the quality of legislative decision. While the larger and more cohesive the interest represented the more justification can be found for its activities, it remains true that the smallest minority has a right to be heard. It is hopeless to classify lobbies in terms of "good" or "bad", i.e., those which concern themselves with what they conceive to be the public welfare and those which work for the direct interests, usually economic, of their membership. All lobbies identify their interests with those of the general public and may, in particular situations, be justified in doing so. The danger to rational legislative decision lies not from hearing the claims of organized groups, but from inability to determine when those claims legitimately represent the welfare of the general public. This difficulty stems from the ignorance of legislators amidst the growing complexity of governmental functions, the unequal power of pressure groups, and the abuses which have survived the old lobby or arisen in the new lobby.

The evils disclosed by legislative investigations of lobbying fall roughly into two categories: (1) activities which leave the public and legislators with inadequate or unbalanced information on which to make decisions; and (2) activities which coerce or corrupt legislators.

Pressure group propaganda aimed primarily at influencing the public is often characterized by misrepresentation or distortion of fact, made more effective by concealment of source. When the source of a statement is undisclosed, or appears nonpartisan, legislators and the public, ignorant of motivation, cannot evaluate possible bias. Special interests have often created a favorable climate of opinion by such questionable practices as controlling newspaper editorial policy by placement or withdrawal of advertising, sending "canned copy" to country presses; hiring radio commentators and columnists to express favorable views, educators to write textbooks, and speakers to address clubs, schools, and churches without revelation of the contract of employment.

While most lobbyists admit their affiliations, many are prone to exaggerate the size and cohesion of their membership, and sometimes work for interests other than those they claim to represent. Often-times one group will serve as a "front" for another, disguising the partisan nature of the views it advocates; some lobbies of this type exist on paper only. The forces of group opinion can be magnified by instigation of letters, telegrams, and phone calls to congressmen which, though the sole creation of a special interest group, create a false impression of opinion in the legislator's home district.

Activities which coerce or corrupt congressmen are a hangover from the old lobby, and, though of lesser importance, are occasionally resorted to. Included in this category are such crude devices as bribery, threats, and promises of financial security, as well as the subtler techniques of social pressure.

PUBLIC UTILITIES—A CASE STUDY

The extent to which pressure groups engage in all forms of lobbying activities is well illustrated by the tremendous campaign of the public utility companies against government regulation or ownership. The investigation by the Federal Trade Commission in 1928-9 uncovered the expenditure of millions of dollars in a propaganda and educational program that achieved such proportions that the FTC was forced to conclude "that no campaign approaching it in magnitude has ever been conducted except possibly by governments in wartime."

The campaign was carried on under the direction of a Joint Committee of National Utility Associations which laid down the policy for twenty-eight state utility committees. Every effort was made to win newspapers to the Utilities viewpoint and techniques included placement of huge advertising contracts, social favors to editors and entertainment of newsmen, wide distribution of pamphlets and "clip sheets." An annual expenditure of over thirty million dollars a year in advertising proved an effective weapon. Financial support to news and editorial services, without disclosure to the public, also aided in achieving general newspaper support. Articles written by state publicity directors were placed in newspapers under the names of prominent men who had no apparent connection with utility interests.

A program of close cooperation with schools was likewise inaugurated so as "to fix the truth about utilities in the young person's mind before incorrect notions become fixed there." Friendly relations were cultivated with educators who were paid salaries during vacations to "learn the public utilities business at first hand." Funds for research were made available to institutions. Textbooks representing a viewpoint favorable to utilities were introduced in public schools and supplemented with pamphlets prepared by the state committees.

Public speakers representing the utility position made speeches before all types of audiences which were often later carried by newspapers as news stories. The rather narrow popular base of the group was widened and made more effective by increased sale of stock throughout the country.

Amidst this publicity campaign highly paid Washington representatives were busy contacting congressmen and exerting pressure on influential government officials. Such activity reached its height immediately prior to the vote on the Public Utility Holding Company Act, in opposition to which the utility lobby spent over four million dollars. Ex-legislators were employed to influence their former colleagues, aid of the social lobby was enlisted, and a deluge of telegrams, sent without the knowledge or consent of the signers, swamped wavering congressmen. It was this latter practice that moved Congressman Driscoll to inaugurate the subsequent investigation of the lobbying activities connected with the Holding Company Bill.

Passage of the Bill did not put an end to pressure group opposition which merely shifted its primary target from legislature to courts. Literally dozens of suits were filed by utility companies alleging the unconstitutionality of the Act. Similarly the competition offered by government through the Tennessee Valley Authority was widely fought in the courts.

Today the fight against rural electrification projects goes on apace. On March 11, 1946, Speaker Rayburn called the attention of Congress to the fact that the Capitol was "seething with utility lobbyists" out to kill rural electrification and public owned power in general. The National Association of Electric Companies has spent $192,000 on lobbying activities between August 2 and October 15, 1946. Its principal lobbyist receives a salary comparable to that of the President of the United States.

The methods of influencing legislation used by the Public Utilities lobby are employed to a greater or lesser extent by all national pressure groups. The problem of lobby regulation is not one of curbing the activities of a single, or even a few, special interests. It is, rather, the problem of insuring rational decision when legislators, and the public, are bombarded from all sides by the demands of hundreds of organizations. Solution to this problem does not necessarily resolve itself into a choice between suppressing such propaganda or allowing it to flourish. Exposure of lobbying activities to informed criticism through disclosure of the source of apparently disinterested statements is one method. The effectiveness of such publicity is well illustrated by the passage of the Public Utility Holding Company Act after discovery that the bulk of the opposition came from trumped-up Utility propaganda.

STATE REGULATION OF LOBBYING

While the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act represents the first federal statute passed with the end of bringing lobbying activities into the open, it has precedent in a number of state laws. In addition to the universal prohibition against giving, offering, or receiving bribes, thirty-five states have enacted statutes aimed at limiting lobbying activities. All of these statutes while differing in their specific provisions, proceed on the common principle that undesirable activities can best be controlled, not by prohibition, but by publicity.

The most frequent requirements of state laws are (1) registration, (2) filing expense accounts, and (3) prohibition of contingent compensation. The more comprehensive laws require registration of both the individual lobbyist and his employer with a governmental agency, usually the Secretary of State. Registration statements often include, in addition to name and address, specification of the legislation promoted or opposed, but here a very general answer suffices. Several states, following the pattern of the Massachusetts statute, make a distinction between "legislative agent" and "legislative counsel," but this differentiation appears to serve no functional purpose.

In seventeen states the employer and lobbyist must also file detailed statements showing the amounts received and expended in promoting or opposing legislation, including an affidavit as to the agent's salary. These expense accounts are usually submitted from one to four months after the close of the legislative session and are open to public inspection.

The frequent provision forbidding compensation which is contingent upon the success of the lobbyist in attaining the desired legislation is merely legislative condemnation of a contract which courts have long regarded as opposed to the public interest and unenforceable.

A major weakness of all state statutes is the lack of adequate enforcement provisions. Although criminal sanctions are imposed for violation of the registration requirements, no special agency is charged with investigating either the accuracy or inclusiveness of the registration lists and financial statements. That Attorneys General have exhibited no particular desire to bring actions except in the case of flagrant violations accompanied by wide publicity is indicated by the wide variation in the number registering from state to state and year to year, and the absence of entries of large sums in expense accounts. A conclusion that the law is broken with impunity is inescapable.

The failure of states to regulate pressure group activities successfully has often been attributed to lack of a specific statutory definition of "lobbying." Legislators drawing up state laws appear to regard lobbying as limited to the old methods of face-to-face persuasion with its accompanying graft and corruption, and give inadequate consideration to modern propaganda and publicity techniques. Even the most comprehensive laws emphasize the activities of the lobbyist rather than the pressure group he represents. This interpretation is most clearly indicated when statutes use such expressions as "to personally influence," "privately or secretly attempt to influence," or "improperly influence" to define lobbying practices. Not only the phraseology of the acts but their total divorcement from such analagous problems as corrupt election practices, improvement of legislative information services, and functional representation indicate that these statutes were directed at what was conceived to be an isolated evil which needed regulation. The failure, therefore, lies not merely in the inadequacy of statutory language, but in the more basic fault of which lack of precise definition is a manifestation: the inability of state legislatures to see pressure group regulation in its relation to the whole decision-making process.

PROVISIONS OF THE ACT

Legislative Background:

Just as the impetus to state legislation came from the disclosures of the Armstrong Committee's investigation of New York insurance companies in 1905-6, the most serious attempts at federal regulation have followed revelation of lobbying activities by the N.A.M. in 1913 on proposed tariff legislation, and by the public utilities in 1928 and 1936. Bills introduced by Senator Caraway in 1928 and Senator Black and Representative Smith in 1936 passed their respective houses but did not meet with the approval of Congress. Their failure of passage has usually been ascribed to congressional fear of interference with the constitutional right to petition and opposition of lobbyists to registration requirements. To this might be added a belief by congressmen that they are not susceptible to group pressures.

The report of the House committee in 1913 defined lobbying as the "activities of a person or body of persons seeking to influence Congress in any way whatever" and this broad definition has been incorporated directly or indirectly in subsequent bills. But despite the broad possibilities of such a definition, none of the aforementioned legislative proposals showed any attempt to deviate from the rather narrow conceptions embodied in state statutes. The Caraway, Black, and Smith bills focused their attention upon the activities of the Washington representatives rather than the pressure groups themselves, and were particularly concerned about the lobbying of specious organizations. Senator Black's investigation of airmail contracts prompted him to expand the Caraway proposals to include lobbying before administrative agencies.

Although the wording of the 1946 Act is almost identical with that of its predecessors, there is evidence that the views of the present Congress toward lobbying are significantly broader than those of the past. The Act studiously avoids use of the word "lobbying" and the committee reports refer to the activities of "pressure groups" and their "agents," emphasis being given to the activities of the former. The unfortunate identity of language between the instant Act and the Black and Smith bills is not solely explicable in terms of congressional intent; it is attributable largely to the speed which marked the drafting of the Reorganization Act, the indifference with which legislators regarded the lobbying provisions, and the political expediency of avoiding too sharp a break from past attempts.

The clearest indication that the Lobbying Act represents a more mature congressional view of the pressure group problem is provided by its enactment as part of the Reorganization Act. The fact that it does not come as the result of demand for restrictive regulation following an exposé by a congressional committee is further proof that Congress intended more than elimination of some of the more obvious abuses of the right to petition. A proper evaluation of the Act can only be made if it is regarded as an initial step toward solution of the problem of fitting the activities of organized groups into existing patterns of government.

The structure of the Lobbying Act indicates its composite origin. Section 308, a slightly modified version of the Black Bill, relates to the activities of those engaged in lobbying for pay. Sections 303, 304, and 305, modeled after the Smith proposal, cover the financing of lobbying through solicitation of contributions, or expenditure of funds, to influence legislation. Section 307, also from the Smith

Bill, is a catch-all provision defining persons to whom the Act applies.

As in the analogous state statutes, the law establishes requirements for registration and provides for public disclosure of pressure group activities. But the vagueness of its provisions and the absence of any attempt to define directly the activities it seeks to regulate has led to much confusion as to who must register or file financial statements under the terms of the Act. The refusal of the Attorney General to render an official interpretation has left individuals and organizations the obligation of deciding for themselves whether or not the law is applicable to them.

Registration of Professional Lobbyists:

Section 308(a) provides that "Any person who shall engage himself for pay or for any consideration for the purpose of attempting to influence the passage or defeat of any legislation . . . shall, before doing anything in furtherance of such object, register with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate. . . ." Although "person" is defined elsewhere to include both individuals and groups, it seems clear that this section refers primarily to the individual lobbyist or legislative agent.

Certain exceptions to this provision should be noted. It does not apply to (1) persons who merely appear before a committee and "engage in no other activities to influence legislation"; (2) public officials acting in their official capacity; (3) newspapermen "acting in the regular course of business"; and (4) persons now required to report under the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act.

Construed by itself, Section 308 sets up two conditions which must be satisfied before a person need register; he must be employed by another for a valuable consideration, and the purpose of the employment must be to influence legislation. But a difficulty arises as to whether this section, as well as the section which requires the organization to file an expense account, can be read alone or must be construed in the light of Section 307 which reads, in part, as follows:

"The provisions of this title shall apply to any person who . . . directly or indirectly solicits, collects, or receives money or any other thing of value to be used principally to aid, or the principal purpose of which person is to aid, in the accomplishment of any of the following purposes:

"(a) The passage or defeat of any legislation by the Congress of the United States.

"(b) To influence, directly or indirectly, the passage or defeat of any legislation by the Congress of the United States." (Emphasis supplied.)

An interpretation of the Act which regards this section as qualifying all others would appear to have the support of legislative intent. On the floor of the House it was referred to by a member of the Committee as containing "the gist of the anti-lobbying provision." Furthermore, unless this section is read literally as restricting the application of the Act, the phraseology in italics above is surplusage and serves no useful purpose.

The superimposition of the language of Section 307 upon that of 308 leaves a third condition which must be fulfilled before registration is required: not only must the person be engaged for pay to influence legislation, but this must also be his principal activity. Although it is probable that most of the professional lobbyists in Washington could meet all three of these conditions and be required to register, there are at least three fairly common fact situations which may cause difficulty.

The first, and quantitatively the most important, of these situations is the case of the Washington lawyer, or law firm, who is retained by a special interest group or corporation to advise on pending legislation, render opinions as to its effect and construction, and possibly to draft bills which the group will submit to Congress. This work may be part of a large law practice.

The second situation is that of the officer of a corporation whose general duties have no reference to legislative matters but who comes to Washington to oppose a specific bill which may adversely affect the interests of his firm. He speaks to congressmen, testifies before committees, and distributes literature. Immediately after the passage or defeat of the bill he returns to his usual duties.

The third problem is that presented by the member of a group who comes to Washington to testify before a committee, distributes literature to congressmen, and takes his local Representative to dinner. The group pays his expenses but nothing more.

It is probably that the lawyer would not have to register. Although the phrase "influencing legislation" is a broad one, it is not within the legislative intent to include activities of counsel who merely perform advisory functions.⁶³

The corporate officer would, on the other hand, have to register before he undertook to engage in such typical lobbying activities. He might, of course, argue that he was not employed to influence legislation and that this was not his principal activity. But it is reasonable to assume that at least part of his corporate duties are of this nature and thus part of his compensation is derived for such activities. He is acting in his official capacity and not as an individual since it is the interests of the corporation which are affected by the pending legislation. Likewise, it is apparent that the word "principal" can be defined only if given a time reference. Although over a long period of time his principal activity may be with other corporate affairs, nevertheless his principal activity during his Washington stay is representing the corporate interest before legislators. This same rationale would apply to the lawyer in the first example if he went beyond interpreting legislation and approached congressmen, or if he himself submitted the drafted bill to a member of the legislature.

⁶³ Many state statutes specifically exempt lawyers who do not personally approach legislators and confine their activities to interpreting and analyzing legislative proposals. Even in the absence of statutory exemption analogous state laws have been deemed inapplicable to attorneys engaged in a purely advisory capacity. See (1937) 26 Op. Att'y Gen. (Wisc.) 183-4.

The representative of the interest group in the third illustration would not have to register. Although he meets the requirements of "influencing legislation" and "principal activity," he is not engaged for pay. The intent of Congress was not to limit in any way the individual's right to petition and was aimed only at professional lobbyists. If the compensation were merely actual expenses, it would not meet this test of employment for consideration, but if the sum given should substantially exceed expenses, he would have to register.

It may be difficult in any given case to determine just what constitutes "influencing legislation." The Act is indefinite in this respect and, since criminal statutes must define prohibited acts with certainty, this indefiniteness might make it technically defective. It is more likely, however, that courts will construe the provision strictly and require proof of actual intent on the part of an organization or individual to promote or defeat passage of a definite legislative proposal. Sufficient intent might, for example, be indicated by the presence of a legislative program endorsed and advocated by the group or its representative.

Filing of Expense Accounts:

A. By the Lobbyist:

Every person who registers under Section 308 is required to file in addition to the registration form a detailed report under oath of all money received and expended by him during the preceding calendar quarter. The report includes a statement identifying the person paid, the purposes for which the money was expended, and the legislation he is paid to support or oppose. He also must state the names of any papers or periodicals in which he has caused editorial or news matter to be published.

B. By the group or organization:

Section 305(a) provides that "Every person receiving any contributions or expending any money" to influence legislation must file a detailed statement every calendar quarter with the Clerk of the House. The term "person" again is defined to include any individual or group of persons, corporation, partnership or association, but excludes anyone registering under the Corrupt Practices Act.

As in the case of individual lobbyists the provisions of Section 305 are limited by Section 307. Thus construed, only those organizations which solicit money or receive contributions principally to aid in the influencing of legislation, or those receiving or expending mon-cy whose principal purpose is to influence, directly or indirectly, legislation must register. Obviously the efficacy of the provision hinges on judicial interpretation of the word "principal."

Past congressional investigations have disclosed the fact that the most important pressure groups today are the National Association of Manufacturers, the Chamber of Commerce, the AF of L, the CIO, various trade and professional associations, labor groups, farm associations, and veterans' organizations. All of these special interests could argue that their principal activity is dissemination of information within the group for business or social purposes, trade promotion, or research, and that their lobbying activities, however extensive, are not the principal purpose of the organization. Such an interpretation would completely emasculate the Act; almost no group which exercises a substantial influence over public or legislative opinion would be required to register. Groups spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in propaganda activities would be exempt from reporting such expenditures, while other groups spending only insignificant sums would have to submit detailed accounts.

Despite the fact that a literal interpretation of "principal" makes little sense in the light of the factual situation, a strong argument to support this view can be made from the legislative history of Section 307. The Smith Bill, from which the section was copied almost verbatim, originally used the phraseology "in whole or in part," and its sponsor substituted the word "principally" when the breadth of the former provision was brought to his attention. When asked whether labor and fraternal organizations would have to register, Representative Smith replied in the negative. He stated that the provision was intended to exclude many large organizations with thousands and millions of members who spent only a minor part of their funds influencing legislation.

In debate on the instant Act it was stated that the groups which were included in this section were "those whose principal purpose, not incidental purpose" was "to influence the passage of legislation." Juxtaposition of the words "principal" and "incidental" indicates that all purposes of an organization which are not "incidental" are in the category covered by the Act, suggesting a much broader meaning of the word "principal" than it might be given if taken alone.

A classification of activities which only incidentally influence legislation can be found in cases construing provisions of the Internal Revenue Code. Tax exemption is provided for gifts to charitable and educational organizations "no substantial part of the activities of which is . . . attempting to influence legislation." The test imposed by the courts has been whether or not the political activity is incidental to the main purposes of the organization, and relevant criteria include its stated purpose as determined by the articles of association, the amount expended in political activities as contrasted with other business, the presence or absence of a political program, and the controversial nature of the propaganda promulgated. Under these rules gifts to trade associations, labor unions, professional groups, and social reform organizations have been deemed taxable. Although the analogy of the instant problem to taxation is far from perfect, neither the classification of groups nor the criteria imposed seem entirely inapposite.

If a test case should bring Section 307 before the courts for judicial construction, any one of three results is possible. The court could construe "principal" narrowly to mean "primary," "chief" or "most important." Although this interpretation would exempt most pressure groups and vitiate the Act it would, nevertheless, have the support of Representative Smith's remarks, coupled with legal dogma requiring a strict construction of criminal statutes. Where, as in the case of the typical trade association or labor union, more than one activity is engaged in, the burden of proof upon the government to establish lobbying as the most important activity would seem to preclude many convictions. Exactly what the government would have to prove, assuming the difficulties of obtaining evidence were overcome, is largely a matter of conjecture; if the objective test of comparison of sums spent on lobbying with sums spent on other activities were adopted, would it be necessary to prove that more was expended on lobbying than any other activity or than all other activities, and over what period of time would it be necessary to compare such expenditures?

An interpretation of "principal" to mean "substantial," or any activity not purely "incidental," would overcome most of the objections to which the narrower construction is subject and has already proved workable in tax cases. While the problem of the correct time reference would still be present, the breadth of activities included would make it factually insignificant. Furthermore, this interpretation is the only one which appears reasonable in the light of the pressure group problem as apparently understood by the present Congress.

The third possible result of litigation would be a holding that Section 307 is so vague and indefinite as to require invalidation of the Act. There is little practical difference in a strict interpretation of the word "principal" and a holding that Section 307 violates the Constitution; in either case the operative effect of the Act would be negligible.

It should be noted that there is no interrelation between those who file statements under Section 305 and those who register under Section 308 as is common in state statutes. Thus, it is possible for an individual lobbyist to name an employer who need not file under Section 305. But if liberal interpretation is given to the word "principal," the correlation between the two lists should be high.

The quarterly statement of the group filed under Section 305 includes the name and address of all who contribute over $500, the total sum of all contributions and the total expenditures including the name and address of those who receive an aggregate of ten dollars or more. Further provisions require that detailed accounts of contributions and expenditures be kept and preserved for at least two years.

Enforcement.

Violations of any provisions of the Act are punishable by a fine not exceeding $5000 and imprisonment for not more than twelve months. In addition, conviction automatically disqualifies a person from attempting to influence legislation or testifying before a committee for three years with more severe penalties provided for violation of this provision. Although this latter sanction appears to be directed at the individuals registering under Section 308, the broad statutory definition of "person" makes it applicable to associations and groups as well. How it could be enforced against the latter is not clear, and in any event it could scarcely bind the individual members of a group without deprivation of their constitutional rights.

THE REQUIREMENTS OF AN EFFECTIVE LOBBYING STATUTE

The inadequacies of the Regulation of Lobbying Act are in large measure attributable to the fact that despite evidence of a new and realistic congressional understanding of the problems raised by pressure group activity, the statutory vehicle for expression of its ideas was hurriedly drafted and modeled on anachronistic precedent. That the federal statute will be little more successful than its state counterparts is already indicated by the number of individuals and groups complying with its provisions. During the first quarter 36 organizations and 124 individuals filed statements under Sections 305 and 308. Only three important pressure groups complied with Section 305, others apparently relying on exemption by virtue of the "principal" requirement.

The most obvious weaknesses of the Act are the use of the word "principal" to restrict persons to whom the Act is applicable and the lack of adequate enforcement provisions. Such powerful pressure groups as the Chamber of Commerce and the NAM are construing the word narrowly and maintain that their principal purposes are trade promotion, education and research. Failure to submit accounts to the Clerk of the House indicates that most trade associations and labor organizations are adopting the same view. Although a test case might possibly result in an interpretation which would force their compliance, it would be preferable to amend the law so as to include all organizations which spend more than a specified sum influencing legislation.

Failure to provide sanctions to overcome the procedural difficulty of criminally prosecuting unincorporated associations is an elementary drafting error which may seriously weaken the punitive provisions of the Act. As a consequence it is questionable whether a large proportion of pressure groups could be made subject to its penalties, a shortcoming best cured by providing that all expense accounts be signed by a responsible executive who is personally liable for violation. If no expense account is submitted, the officers of the association should be held.

The enforcement difficulties of the Act, however, are more extensive than those embodied in a mere technical drafting error. The Department of Justice will undertake prosecution of violators of the Act only when a violation is brought to its attention. The absence of provision for a special agency to investigate the activities of lobbyists has always meant non-compliance with state laws; there is no reason to believe that there will be a significant difference in the case of a federal statute.

One of the principal reasons for requiring registration of professional lobbyists was to reveal, in addition to their identity, the size and cohesion of the groups they claimed to represent. Such knowledge is indispensable to legislators seeking to evaluate the political force of divergent views. To this end the Senate Report recommended that the registration statement include evidence of bona fide membership;⁸⁹ but this provision was never embodied in the bill as submitted to Congress. Not only should this information be required but it should be supplemented by a statement as to how the membership decides its lobbying policy and by what right the lobbyist speaks for the group. Democratic procedures within the group itself are necessary if lobbying activities are to be regarded as a legitimate manifestation of a functional need.⁹⁰

The instant Act confines itself to persons who exert pressure on Congress. The decline of Congress as a policy making body and the increased discretion exercised by administrative bodies have, however, effected a parallel shift in lobbying activities. No adequate law can ignore the pressures upon all branches of government, and registration of all those who lobby before governmental agencies should be included within the provisions of the Act.⁹¹

The need for a specific enforcement agency:

Evolution of lobbying methods has made regulation of pressure groups primarily a problem in propaganda control. Control by either quantitative or qualitative suppression of political propaganda has never achieved success in the United States.⁹² Furthermore, it runs counter to democratic theory, made explicit in the First Amendment, that free discussion best promotes the informed public opinion necessary to rational legislative decision. But informed public opinion presupposes knowledge of all the facts, including any personal interest and bias on the part of the speaker. The force of partisan propaganda can be effectively diminished by revelation of its source and exposure to informed public criticism. This theory underlies lobby registration; the publicity principle⁹³ is embodied in the fact that all records are open to public inspection.

The publicity given to pressure group activities by the Act is more illusion than reality. Even if the loopholes in the registration provisions were plugged by amendment and additional pertinent information required, it is improbable that the Act would accomplish much toward mitigating the evils presently existing. Operation of the publicity principle requires that actual awareness of the extent of pressure group activities be known both to legislators and the public. The Lobbying Act depends upon the fact that the information is open to the public coupled with its publication in the Congressional Record to counteract the publicity methods of groups which use every possible communication outlet to propagate their viewpoints. Furthermore, the most important information from the public's point of view, that revealed by the group's financial statement, does not even get the limited circulation of the Record.

Examination of operation of the publicity principle under the analogous provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act,⁹⁴ the Voorhis Act⁹⁵

and the Foreign Agents Registration Act leaves no doubt that some positive steps to secure circulation of the information revealed on registration statements and financial records is necessary if the Act is to accomplish its objectives. Although registration of foreign agents was reasonably complete, no effort to turn the "pitiless spotlight of publicity" upon their propaganda was made. Administration by the State Department was so inept that it was transferred to a special division of the Justice Department, where information submitted was analyzed by experts and efficiently filed.

Special committees of the House and Senate appointed to investigate operation of the Corrupt Practices Act came to the conclusion that the analogous publicity provisions of that Act had not yet been made effective. Specific criticisms included the lack of a single central office with power to develop a uniform accounting system and render data intelligible to the public, as well as the lack of concern of officials over failure to file the requisite forms. Both committees, however, felt that disclosure could be made an operative regulatory device.

It is clear that neither the Clerk of the House nor the Senate Secretary has the administrative organization to analyze relevant information submitted under the Lobbying Act, make pertinent extracts from it, and adopt an efficient classification and indexing system. But efficient administration would be merely a prerequisite to preparing the data revealed into concise and comprehensible statements which would be made available to press and radio services. If the public is to be informed of the facts disclosed by registration, those facts must get the widest possible circulation in a simplified and intelligible form.

If registration is to become an effective device for revealing group pressures, a special enforcement agency must be established to investigate the accuracy of statements filed and the compliance of those to whom the law applies. It must be staffed to analyze propaganda, assess its effects, accurately summarize detailed financial statements, and make the information thus compiled readily available to press and radio services. Standard administrative procedure which combines civil and criminal sanctions should be adopted to enforce registration. Enforcement of disclosure requirements should depend in the first instance upon publicity; criminal sanctions should be invoked only as a secondary sanction to enforce compliance of recalcitrant registrants with the agency's regulations.

Such an agency could best operate under the supervision of a permanent joint congressional committee which would be charged with overseeing its methods and determining its policy. Full time personnel should be entrusted with carrying on the investigatory work tion provisions might well serve as a model of the kind of information which could be required of lobbyists.

required. Congressional committees do not, in general, perform repetitive jobs efficiently, and it is unlikely that exposure of pressure group activities would be sufficiently sensational to overcome this handicap. Precedent for a committee in a supervisory capacity can be found in the Reorganization Act itself, which establishes congressional oversight of the Legislative Reference Service, the Congressional Record and the Office of Legislative Council.

New techniques for molding public opinion are constantly evolving and efficient administration of a registration act would require that statutory authority given an enforcement agency be flexible enough to meet all such developments. The act should, therefore, be broad enough to cover all organizations which mold political opinion in any way, and should give the agency authority to exempt those which it found to be outside the pressure group category, e.g., genuinely educational societies. A similar measure of discretion should be given in the determination of the type of information to be submitted.

Instead of exempting, as does the present Act, all those subject to the narrow provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act, a comprehensive act would include them within its provisions. The problem of regulating election pressures is only part of the larger problem of regulating all political pressures exercised by organized groups. Support of favorable candidates is just one method used by special interests to influence legislation. If such activities were brought within the publicity provisions of an effective lobbying statute present inadequate legislation could be repealed.

OTHER PROVISIONS AFFECTING LOBBYING

Any legislative provision designed to improve the knowledge and efficiency of legislators will diminish the likelihood of lobbying abuses. The effectiveness of the professional lobbyist in securing legislation depends in large measure upon his technical knowledge of the complicated subjects of modern laws. Legislators, incapable of personally investigating every governmental problem, have become dependent on these experts for information in the field of their special interest; this information is, of course, often biased. Legislation proposed and drafted by lobbyists has been accepted without proper evaluation of its consequences.

The Reorganization Act has attempted to meet these problems by increasing greatly appropriations to the Legislative Reference Service¹⁰¹ and Office of Legislative Counsel.¹⁰² Employment of research

¹⁰¹ Section 203. The Legislative Reference Service is established as a separate department of the Library of Congress and appropriations will be increased annually until 1949 when the sum of $750,000 will be provided. Specialists in certain fields such as agriculture, education, labor, taxation and others are available for special work with committees. Some of these specialists have already been appointed and include such recognized experts as Francis Wilcox (State department consultant), Howard Pignet (Chief economist of Tariff Commission), Gustaf Peck (Labor adviser to NRA, WMC, and WPB), T. A. Goldenweiser (Federal Reserve Board), Ray Manning (Taxation authority), George Galloway, Meyer Jacobstein (Brookings In-experts to provide both committees and individual members of Congress with unbiased information on all subjects of proposed legislation will weaken the ability of pressure groups to determine congressional policy. Similarly, increased personnel to assist legislators in drafting legislative proposals will make congressmen less eager to accept the services of legal counsel employed by special interests. Presentation of factual data and digests of bills and hearings¹⁰³ to fit the needs of Senators and Representatives should aid them in coming to a rational decision.

The prohibition of private legislation and the transfer of responsibility for determination of governmental tort liability¹⁰⁴ to the judiciary may also serve to lessen the pressures of those seeking legislative favors. It is not improbable that these provisions aimed only indirectly at lobbying will be more effective than the direct regulation imposed by the lobbying title of the Act.

CONCLUSION

It is probable that the Lobbying Act will prove largely ineffective. The loopholes provided by the "principal" requirement, the incompleteness of the information required to be filed, the lack of an adequate enforcement agency, and the weakness of the publicity provisions may combine to make the Act as dead a law as similar state statutes.

Congress has recognized the need for regulating pressure group activities. It has seen the solution not as prohibition of an undesirable practice but as an adaptation of present imperfect mechanisms for expressing group opinion into a political pattern which will utilize this opinion to improve the decision-making process. It is to be hoped that this growing realization of the problem will lead Congress to amend the present Act to effectuate more nearly the congressional purpose.

¹⁰² Section 204 of the Reorganization Act increases appropriation to the Office to $250,000 by 1949 for bill drafting services. It is unlikely that this sum will be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of individual legislators, although it should be sufficient to draft bills for committees. Other provisions which will help improve the knowledge and efficiency of Congress are discussed supra notes 3, 4, 5, 6.

2. In "The Atlantic Report", the Atlantic Monthly for July 1947, 3-5, comments: "Lobbyists have become an essential feature of our government. They have been called the 'invisible government.' Yet there is nothing invisible about their operations. You will see them in the corridors of the Capitol every day, buttonholing or conferring with the legislators. Their aid is indispensable, and Representative Estes Kefauver goes so far as to say in block letters in his current book, A Twentieth Century Congress, that 'Congress cannot function today without lobbyists.'

"There are a number of contributing causes; the confusion and planlessness of the business of drafting laws, the complexity of present-day problems, the increasing role of government in our life, and the lack of enough expert aid at the Congressman's elbow. The legislators are so overburdened with work that lobby-inspired bills get by for want of adequate research and study time.

"Newcomers with a passion for good government are always appalled by this sloppiness. They are dismayed at the easy dependence on lobbyists by the old-timers. It is so convenient to let some lawyer or trade association do the donkey work in drafting new legislation. But the spectacle makes the freshmen itch for reform.

"It would be invidious to try to pick out the most influential of the lobbies. There is certainly no counterpart for that genius of the Anti-Saloon League, the late Wayne B. Wheeler. But there are scores of the ablest men in industry and labor who devote their talents to influencing legislation. Their activities have been exposed in at least two investigations. One was the Caraway inquiry; the other was the famous public utility probe conducted by the Federal Trade Commission.

"All that came out of these investigations was a bill requiring lobbyists to register. This was put into the law under the La Follette-Monroney Act of last year. The trouble lay in definition. A lobbyist is a person who devotes a 'major portion' of his time to influencing legislation. But how prove that lobbying takes up most of a person's time? It is so easy to demonstrate the contrary that relatively few lobbyists have complied with the registration requirements of the La Follette-Monroney Act.

"The real remedy for the power of the lobby is, of course, to put the Federal legislature in a position to rely on its own resources. Already a start has been made in this direction by the La Follette-Monroney Act. Congress has strengthened the bill-drafting service in the two houses, enlarged the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress, and given the committees more aid through the provision of expert staffs.

"Representative Kefauver thinks this is just a beginning in enabling Congress to become independent of lobbyists. The problem as he sees it is to give the legislators more time as well as more help to do their work. Thus he would limit debate in the Senate, do away with the intolerable burden of non-legislative duties, and improve the liaison with the Executive branch of government.

"By this last suggestion he does not mean that Congress should rely on experts in Executive employ. There is too much of that already. In a way, reliance upon the Executive is just as bad on reliance upon the outside aid of lobbyists. What is needed is the time that is now wasted in haggling with the Executive in matters that might be adjusted by a better method of liaison.

"Doubtless these steps will one day be formulated in a new measure. The chief preoccupation of reformers of Congress at present is to realize in performance the partial reorganization effected under the La Follette-Monroney Act of 1946. It is clear from the hubbub in Congress that this reform is not being administered according to plan."

FRANK V. CANTWELL,* PUBLIC OPINION AND THE LEGISLATIVE PROCESS40 Am.Pol.Sci.Rev. 924 (1946).

The rôle played by public opinion in a democracy, particularly as it affects the legislative process, has long been a subject for speculation by political scientists. The advent of controlled quota sampling permits of the study of this important relationship in measurable terms. The object of the present discussion is to trace the interaction of public opinion and the executive and legislative branches of government as they have dealt with a single public question—reorganization of the Supreme Court, as presented to Congress for consideration by President Roosevelt on February 5, 1937. Enlargement of the Supreme Court from nine to fifteen members was the most controversial feature of the general reorganization of the federal judiciary proposed by the President, aimed at speeding up the process of clearing cases through the federal court system, and making the system more “representative” of the wishes of the people.

The debate on enlargement of the Supreme Court provides a useful and interesting case study for several reasons. The case as a public issue has a definite beginning and end, ranging from the proposal of the judiciary reform bill by the President on February 5 to the death of Senator Joseph T. Robinson on July 14, 1937. As it was debated by public and legislators, the issue was a relatively clear-cut one, uncomplicated by side issues or utterly foreign events that might have influenced the course of either legislators or the public. Finally, and of decided importance, the American Institute of Public Opinion made weekly measurements of opinion toward the proposal during the entire period that reorganization of the Court was a public question. This permits the correlation of reliable opinion samplings with events in the debate and the observation of their relationship.

From this observation it is hoped to throw light on several specific questions: (1) What is the general nature of the relationship between the public and its legislators? (2) What are the forces at work which determine the direction that public opinion will take in a debate of this type? (3) Is there a noticeable tendency on the part of legislators to follow the guidance of public opinion, and if so, to what extent do legislators take their lead from the public? (4) To what extent do legislators attempt to swing opinion to their way of thinking? (5) Are there any phases of the relationship between the public and legislators that might be improved so as to make it more effective in approaching the process of deciding public policy?

I. THE DEBATE ON THE COURT BILL

From accounts of the Court debate as carried in the New York Times, the following short outline of leading developments in the debate has been prepared:

Chronological Listing of Events in the Court Debate

- February 5*—President Roosevelt sends message to Congress recommending reorganization of the federal judiciary, including increasing the membership of the Supreme Court from nine to fifteen members. President reported "calm and confident," reflecting his conviction that he has a huge popular mandate for what he is doing. Message creates shock throughout country.
- March 1*—The Supreme Court upholds Congressional resolution abrogating payments in gold. Decision is of aid to New Deal.
- March 4*—President Roosevelt, in Democratic Victory Dinner speech, calls for party loyalty on the Supreme Court issue.
- March 8*—The President, in a fireside chat, assures Americans that, in proposing reorganization of the Court, he is seeking to protect them from the Court's usurpations.
- March 9*—Homer Cummings, Attorney-General, opens Administration arguments before Senate Judiciary Committee, saying the bill will restore the governmental machinery to its proper balance.
- March 22*—Senator Burton K. Wheeler opens opposition arguments before Senate Judiciary Committee and reads a statement from Chief Justice Charles E. Hughes saying enlargement of the Court is "unnecessary." Statement is said to have the approval of Justices Brandeis and Van Devanter.
- March 29*—The Supreme Court reverses Adkins v. Children's Hospital decision and holds constitutional minimum wage law of the state of Washington. Adkins case specifically overruled by 5-4 decision. Decision opens way for federal minimum wage legislation.
- April 12*—In handing down decisions in four specific cases, the Supreme Court upholds the National Labor Relations Act (Wagner Act). Decision in chief case is 5-4.
- April 28*—Senators Hatch, McCarran and O'Mahoney, members of the Senate Judiciary Committee previously uncommitted on Supreme Court Bill, announce opposition on basis of testimony offered before the Committee.
- May 10*—Washington reports say that Justices Brandeis and Van Devanter will retire from Court in June.
- May 18*—Justice Willis Van Devanter, 78, retires.
- May 24*—The Supreme Court upholds the Social Security Act in ruling on three cases, two by 5-4 decisions.
- June 14*—The Senate Judiciary Committee reports unfavorably to the Senate on the Court bill, terming the proposal "a needless, futile, and utterly dangerous abandonment of constitutional principal." Vote is 10-8 against proposal.

July 14—Senator Joseph T. Robinson, majority leader of the Senate, dies suddenly. Supreme Court Bill will be abandoned.

Charts 1 and 2 have been prepared from two questions asked weekly by the Gallup Poll during the debate. The first question, recorded in Chart 1, was asked during the period from February 15 to April 5, and reads: "Are you in favor of President Roosevelt's proposal regarding the Supreme Court?" The second question, recorded in Chart 2, covers the period from April 12 to June 7, and reads: "Should Congress pass the President's Supreme Court plan?" In both questions, the Supreme Court plan was stated to be "President Roosevelt's." Possibly the use of the President's name might have introduced a bias, although throughout the debate, in the newspapers, on the radio, and in the halls of Congress, the plan was also identified with the President. In view of this very common identification, the possibility of such a bias is minimized. In any event, any tendency toward bias would not affect the validity of the figures as used in this study, since a bias would be constant.

Phase One of the Debate. The initial period in the debate extends from the introduction of the President's proposal on February 5, until the week immediately preceding the two speeches made by the President. As may be seen from Chart 1, in this early period public attitudes toward the proposal divided equally, 45 per cent of the people expressing approval of the proposal, and 45 per cent expressing disapproval, with 10 per cent in the "no opinion" category. These figures are from the Gallup Poll taken during the week of February 15. At approximately the same time, the New York Times reported that an informal poll of senators made by Times reporters showed that 32 senators were on record as favoring the proposal, 28 as against the proposal, while 35 remained uncommitted. Thus, while 90 per cent of the public had put themselves on record as favoring or disapproving the proposal, only 63 per cent of the senators had taken a definite stand. One week later, on February 17, the Times news columns carried this statement from a Washington staff member: "Conservative Democrats . . . especially those in the Senate, gagged at the proposals. . . . Many of them maintained a prudent silence, waiting to see how the cat of public opinion would jump."

In this first stage of the debate, newspapers and radio commentators began to take definite stands on the proposals, and senators and other public figures began to make statements setting forth their positions. Senator Norris declared against the bill; former Governor Alf Landon, who had carried the Republican standard in the presidential election a few months earlier, came out against the proposal; Senator Champ Clark declared against the scheme; and Senators Glass and Wheeler denounced it. The only figure of magnitude to raise his voice in favor of the proposal was Senator La Follette. In the face of this cumulation of official opinion against the proposal, public opinion began to turn against the plan, and by March 1 the Gallup Poll reported that the anti-proposal vote had grown to 48 per cent, while the pro-proposal vote had slumped to 41 per cent—a difference of 7 percentage points. The President and his advisers became aware that public sentiment was turning away from the proposal.

As early as February 15, the Times reported that Attorney-General Cummings and Senator Sherman Minton were planning to make appeals for public support of the plan. The Times news columns said: "The frank object of all these appeals is to induce the backers of the President to send telegrams and letters to their senators and representatives to offset the thousands received at the Capitol in the last few days in opposition to his sweeping plan for remaking the Supreme Court with more liberal-minded men." On February 19, the Times said: "On the showing of informal polls that the Administration's judiciary reform bill may hang on the decision of less than a dozen senators, President Roosevelt and the forces identified with him, particularly organized labor, intensified their efforts to insure its passage as a prerequisite to further New Deal legislation. . . . The opposition strategists in the Senate . . . were . . . making preparations for one of the stiffest legislative battles of recent years. They were making no particular effort to dig into the dwindling reservoir of unpledged senators, leaving that to the weight of the letters and telegrams still coming in from all parts of the country." Phase One of the debate may be summarized by saying that the President introduced the proposal with the hope that public opinion, which had given him a handsome victory in November, would provide the pressure necessary to push the proposal through Congress. This public pressure was not forthcoming, and the public had become increasingly hostile. Opposition senators were biding their time as they watched public opinion swing behind them. So far as the Administration was concerned, a counter-attack was necessary to win back public favor to the proposal.

Phase Two. The second phase of the debate may be entitled the Administration drive for public support. The outstanding development during this phase was the entry of the President directly into the discussion. With opinion turning away from the proposal, it became obvious that use of the most power weapon in the New Deal arsenal was indicated—a personal appeal from the President. Consequently, the President made two speeches to the nation within five days, an address at the Democratic Victory Dinner on March 4 and a fireside chat on March 8. The New York Times reported the fireside chat in these words: "He had no intention of packing the Court with 'spineless puppets.' He simply proposed to return the Court to its 'rightful and historic place' and save the Constitution from 'hardening of the arteries.'" On the morning following the fireside chat, Attorney-General Cummings opened the Administration case before the Senate Judiciary Committee, saying that the proposal would restore the governmental machinery to its proper balance. The Gallup Poll for the week of March 1 immediately registered the impact of the President's speeches. As may be seen from Chart 1, the anti-proposal vote fell to 47 per cent and in two weeks dropped precipitately to 41 per cent, the lowest point reached by the No vote at any stage of the debate. On the other hand, the pro-proposal vote began a climb that was to last until March 29, rising from 41 to 45 per cent during the month. Success had apparently crowned the effort of the Administration to win the favor of public opinion, for the Yes vote now held a slim margin over the No vote. However, as will be seen, this margin was to prove far from decisive.

Phase Three. On March 22, the opposition forces swung back into action as Senator Burton Wheeler, chief of the anti-court reorganization forces, opened the opposition arguments before the Senate Judiciary Committee. As the first opposition witness, Senator Wheeler read a statement from Chief Justice Charles E. Hughes saying enlargement of the Court was "unnecessary"; and the statement was said to have the approval of Justices Brandeis and Van Devanter. Chart 1 shows that during that week the No vote turned again and began a steady climb upward which was to mount almost steadily until the proposal was finally killed. Evidently, opposition arguments before the Judiciary Committee were sufficiently convincing to solidify the No vote, and Chart 2 shows the constant strength of the oppositionists among the public from this date onward.

Phase Four. The turning point in the debate was reached on March 29. On that day, the Supreme Court handed down a decision reversing an earlier decision in the Adkins v. Children's Hospital case. The effect was to hold constitutional the minimum wage law of the state of Washington, thus paving the way for federal minimum wage legislation, one of the chief objectives of the New Deal. The effect on public opinion of the switch by the Supreme Court was nothing short of profound. An examination of both Charts 1 and 2 reveals that the Yes vote, or those in favor of reorganization, began a sharp slump from which it never fully recovered. In terms of percentages, the Yes vote dropped from a high of 45 per cent in the week before the reversed decision in the Adkins case to a low of 31 per cent on May 17. It is safe to say that the Administration lost its case before the public on the day when the Supreme Court did its famous about-face. It is to be noted, however, that the Yes vote which became estranged from the proposal did not shift into the No group, but fell into indecision and became allied with the No Opinion group. Charts 1 and 2 show that the growth of the No Opinion group almost matches, point for point, the decline in the Yes group. This phenomenon will be enlarged upon below.

From the beginning of Phase Two onward, the Senate Judiciary Committee had been holding extensive hearings at which educators, farm and labor leaders, women's group leaders, and the representatives of almost every special interest group in the nation appeared and presented their case. To what extent the members of the Judiciary Committee were "holding off" from presenting the bill for a formal test on the Senate floor is difficult to tell with exactness. During this period, opinion was in a state of flux, and the Judiciary Committee served a valuable function by permitting opinion to crystallize. Some evidence of political maneuvering to take advantage of a favorable climate of opinion is revealed in a charge made by Senators Wheeler and Van Nuys on April 3, five days after the Supreme Court handed down the decision in the Adkins case. The New York Times reported the two senators as charging Attorney-General Cummings with a "gag" attempt, based on reports that Mr. Cummings had hinted that he would like to see the Judiciary Committee bring the hearings to a close. The Times reported the Senators as saying: "There is no doubt the Attorney-General would like to close public hearings on this issue. . . . Hundreds of American citizens, holding responsible positions at the bar, in universities, and in the molding of public opinion have asked to be heard . . . it is the duty of the Senate Judiciary Committee to continue these hearings until every cross-section of public opinion has been given an opportunity to present its views." Senator Wheeler was astute enough to realize that the tide of opinion was running against the proposal, and that time was playing into the hands of the opposition, just as Mr. Cummings knew that time was playing against the Administration. The two opposition Senators realized the impact of the Supreme Court decision of March 29 on the public and were willing to continue the hearings of the Judiciary Committee until such time as the increased opposition they expected from the public should have an opportunity to register itself through witnesses at the hearings and through senatorial channels of sounding opinion. The Judiciary Committee did continue its hearings, and reports continued to furnish the bulk of newspaper and radio accounts of the reorganization debate. The incident is illustrative of the dependence that both sides placed upon the pressure of public opinion to furnish the force needed to carry the day. Opponents and proponents alike realized that without the backing of public opinion they were lost, and were anxiously trying to win opinion to their side, while waiting for opinion to crystallize sufficiently so that a clear-cut case of public support would be forthcoming.

On April 12, with the No vote holding a six per cent margin over the Yes vote, the Supreme Court handed down a decision upholding the National Labor Relations Act in rulings on four specific cases. In the chief case, the decision was five to four in favor of the act. Strangely enough, the effect of this decision on public opinion was the reverse of that in the Adkins case, as Chart 2 shows. The No vote went down slightly while the Yes vote mounted slightly. This reversal of opinion can be traced to the fact that the Administration immediately made capital of the two successive favorable decisions of the Court, following a series of reverses for the New Deal—maintaining that the two decisions proved the point that the Court was actually composed of human beings who were subject to error and could see the error of their ways. The Administration raised its famous cry that Court decisions rested on whether a Justice came down heads or tails, which indicated the need for a larger Court membership. This argument, although it had an immediate effect, was not powerful enough to change the trend of opinion, and the following week (April 19) the No vote rose three percentage points, while the Yes vote sank two points.

Phase Five. The next development of note in the debate occurred on May 10, when reports from Washington circled the country to the effect that Justices Brandeis and Van Devanter intended to retire from the Court in June, Chart 2 shows that the effect of this report was to increase public indecision, which had been mounting steadily from the introduction of the proposal, and after the report had gained credence the No Opinion group stood at a high of 25 per cent on May 17. It is worth pausing to note the state of opinion at this time.

SHIFT IN VOTE ON COURT REORGANIZATION, FEBRUARY 15-MAY 17¹

	February 15	May 17	Difference
Yes, favor reorganization	45%	31%	-14%
No, oppose reorganization	45%	44%	- 1%
No opinion	10%	25%	+15%

Table 1 shows that the opposition group had held its own, despite sharp dips. The Yes group, proponents of reorganization had lost a total of 14 percentage points; the No Opinion group had risen from 10 per cent to 25 per cent; and the table shows that those who lost faith in their position did not feel powerfully enough affected to jump into the opposite camp, but that their reaction was to fall into a state of indecision. The gain for the No Opinion represents the total defection from both the Yes and No groups. In other words, the public was still not clear upon a course of action, although the number of Yes people who were growing increasingly doubtful of their position was very much larger than the respective No group. The importance of this observation lies in the assumption that members of the Senate were idling along, waiting for a popular reaction. This was not to be forthcoming, since the people were becoming increasingly indecisive. But for the next event unfolding on May 18, it is difficult to say how long this deadlock between the people and their legislators, each waiting for the other to act, might have lasted.

Phase Six. The deadlock was broken on the date mentioned with announcement of the retirement from the Supreme Court of Justice Willis Van Devanter at the age of seventy-eight. Chart 2 shows that this announcement immediately cleared the atmosphere, and both opponents and proponents of the court reorganization proposal were enabled to make up their minds definitely. Opinion had at last crystallized. The retirement of Justice Van Devanter meant that the President would be able to appoint to the Court a Justice more in sympathy with New Deal objectives. In turn, this appointment, together with the recent "liberalization" of the Court in the Adkins and Wagner Act decisions, meant that for all practical purposes the Court had been reorganized. De facto reorganization apparently was satisfactory to the public, and the No vote rose quickly until on June 7 opponents of court reorganization had 50 per cent of the public behind them, while only 35 per cent favored reorganization. The No Opinion vote sank rapidly from 25 per cent on May 17 to 15 per cent on June 7.

Table 2 shows that after the retirement of Justice Van Devanter, opinion crystallized more rapidly in the direction of opposition to the proposal than in favor of it. A total defection of 10 per cent of those originally favoring reorganization can be noted, five per cent of these people switching their vote into opposition, while five per cent were unable to come to a decision and moved into the No Opinion group.

This evident satisfaction of the people with the changed court situation came as a great relief to legislators, who were now able to deal with the delicate problem of de jure court reorganization. On June 14, with the battle of public opinion decided, and with opinion firmly behind it, the Senate Judiciary Committee reported unfavorably (ten to eight) to the Senate on the Judiciary Reorganization Bill, terming the measure "a needless, futile, and utterly dangerous abandonment of constitutional principle." Reorganization of the Court was no longer a public issue; and whatever lingering inclination there might have been on the part of the Administration to press for court reform in the face of public opposition was dissipated by the death on July 14 of Senator Joseph T. Robinson, majority leader of the Senate, who had thrown all of his strength into the fray on behalf of the proposal.

II. CONCLUSIONS

Having examined in some detail the interplay between public opinion and events in the court debate, it is now possible to form conclusions as to the general nature of the relationship between the public and its legislators as they deal jointly with a public question. In many respects, the debate on the Court is typical of the problems which present themselves for solution in our democracy. For this reason, the conclusions which follow have been cast in such a form that they may be applied to understanding the nature of any similar debate on a public question. At the same time, it must be borne in mind that so many diverse factors operate while a question runs its public course that these conclusions have applicability only in so far as the phenomena at work in a given situation are taken into consideration. Further study of the type of relationship under consideration will permit the understanding with considerable exactness of how public opinion and the legislative process affect each other. This, in turn, will enable the public and legislators to operate together at full efficiency; for it is undeniable that national questions must be solved by the joint action of the people and their elected legislative representatives.

1. Legislators display an inclination to "wait on" public opinion to shape itself before dealing formally with questions. This does not mean that senators were content merely to follow the lead of public opinion, for many made an effort to mold opinion to their way of thinking through radio addresses and personal appearances. It does mean that the great majority of senators were keenly aware of the existence of public opinion and hesitant to take action so long as its final direction was not absolutely certain. Although many senators committed themselves publicly during the course of the debate, at no time did either side show determination to force a showdown on the floor of the Senate, such hesitation seeming to stem from the uncertain condition of public opinion, which never registered above 50 per cent either for or against the proposal.

The function of the Senate Judiciary Committee as a sounding board is interesting. As long as any doubt remained about public sentiment toward the bill, the committee remained in session, and only when it was perfectly plain that public support for the proposal would not be forthcoming did it make its unfavorable report. During the extended period of public hearings, an amazing array of witnesses appeared before the committee and every possible type of argument for and against the proposal was brought forth. Doubtless this varied array of witnesses gave to the senators valuable clues as to public feeling on the proposal, and it was on the basis of testimony offered before the committee that Senators Hatch, McCarran, and O'Mahoney announced their opposition to the bill. The most useful function of the committee seems to have been to hold in abeyance the necessity of making a formal decision while senators waited in the hope that public opinion would develop in a decisive direction and render unnecessary a decision on the Senate floor.

2. Events played a more important rôle than Congress or the President in shaping the direction of public opinion. The six leading determinants of opinion in the debate were: (1) the President's Victory Dinner speech and fireside chat on the fourth and eighth of March; (2) the opening of the Administration case before the Senate Judiciary Committee on March 9; (3) the opening of opposition arguments against the proposal before the committee on March 22; (4) the decision of the Supreme Court overruling an earlier decision in the Adkins v. Children's Hospital case on March 29, which paved the way for federal minimum wage legislation and broke the succession of anti-New Deal decisions handed down by the Court; (5) Washington reports, beginning on May 10, that Justices Brandeis and Van Devanter were planning to retire; and (6) the retirement on May 18 of Justice Van Devanter.

Of these six steps in the downfall of the Court proposal, three were attempts by government officials (the President and senators) to mobilize opinion in a particular direction. The other three were events in the sense of being unanticipated happenings beyond the province of either proponents or opponents of the proposal. While the President's speeches and the arguments given before the Senate Judiciary Committee affected public opinion measurably, they were incapable of affecting it decisively. The major event in opinion-determination was the decision of the Court in the Adkins case. From the time of this decision, the public Yes vote dropped off steadily, while the No vote rose. The second most important step in opinion-determination was the retirement of Justice Van Devanter, with the effect of crystallizing opinion which had been drifting into indecision as the debate wore on. As Cantril has said, "opinion is generally determined more by events than by words—unless those words are themselves interpreted as an event."¹

3. Public opinion cannot propose a course of action, and a healthy public opinion requires leadership. Throughout the course of the debate, as shown by the accompanying charts, public opinion was responsive to political moves and events. At no time was there observable any great spontaneous movement of opinion in a direction which would have indicated to legislators the necessity for taking a particular course of action that would have broken the deadlock. It is characteristic of public opinion that it cannot generate a proposal or series of proposals serving to satisfy its needs. Public opinion can indicate very powerfully the general area of its needs, but it remains for an individual or group of individuals to come forward with specific proposals toward which opinion can display approval or disapproval. We have seen how, during the course of the debate, the public support that fell away from both the Yes and No sides of the discussion tended to gather in the No Opinion category, where it remained in a state of indecision awaiting some new determining factor that would move it once more into the realm of decision. Those legislators who waited in the hope that public opinion would show them the way were waiting in vain. Public opinion in a democracy responds to leadership, and needs the stimulus of leadership in order to crystallize one way or the other on specific proposals. Legislators are perfectly correct in sounding opinion so that they may determine whether or not they are moving in a direction calculated to meet popular needs. It is completely fallacious for legislators to wait on public opinion to tell them what to do, because public opinion waits on leadership to supply the grist of fact and suggestion so that it can fulfill its function, which is the acceptance or rejection of proposals. In a sentence, when faced with a specific problem, public opinion will respond to proposals, but cannot generate them; generation of proposals is the function of the legislators.

LEGISLATIVE ORGANIZATION AND PROCEDURE

SECTION 1. OUTLINE OF LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE: THE STAGES IN THE PROGRESS OF A BILL

NEW YORK LEGISLATIVE RECORD AND INDEX: A COMPLETE AND CUMULATIVE RECORD ISSUED WEEKLY

The Course Followed by a Bill from Time of Introduction in the Legislature until it Becomes a Law Is Indicated Below:

IN SENATE

1. Introduction and Reference to Committee.
2. Referred to Committee of the Whole on report from Committee.
3. Ordered to Third Reading and referred to Committee on Revision.
4. Passed and transmitted to the Assembly for action by that house.
5. Transmitted to Governor.

IN ASSEMBLY

1. Introduction and Reference to Committee.
2. Ordered to Second Reading on report from Committee.
3. Ordered to Third Reading and referred to Committee on Revision.
4. Passed and transmitted to the Senate for action by that house.
5. Transmitted to Governor.

When a bill is introduced in Senate or Assembly it is referred to a standing committee or by unanimous consent may be advanced. In the Assembly, the time limit for introduction of bills is March 7th. Bills carrying out recommendations by state departments must be introduced by February 15th.

When a bill is reported by the committee in the Senate, either favorably or for consideration, it is referred to the Committee of the Whole. In the Assembly it goes to second reading.

After consideration by the Committee of the Whole or on second reading, the bill is advanced to a third reading, then examined as to language and form by the Revision Committee, after which it is engrossed and ready for final consideration.

A bill passing its own house goes to the opposite branch of the legislature, and takes the same course in that branch as though it originated there, unless it is substituted for an identical bill which is on the Calendar, or by unanimous consent it may be given immediate consideration and passed.

A bill may be reported by a committee either favorably, adversely or for consideration of the house. If reported favorably, it advances to the next order of business. If reported adversely and the house agrees to the report, the bill is dead; if the report is not agreed to, the bill is before the house for disposition and generally advances to the next order of business.

A committee may be ordered by a vote of the house to report a bill. This is done by moving to discharge a committee from further consideration of the bill.

A bill may be amended in committee, in the Committee of the Whole of the Senate or on the order of second reading in the Assembly, or while on third reading in either house. A committee may report a bill with amendments for reprinting and recommitment.

A Senate bill may be amended in the Assembly, after it has passed the Senate, and vice versa. Such amendments must be concurred in by the house in which the bill originated, before the bill can be transmitted to the Governor.

After a bill has had a third reading, an amendment thereto shall not be offered unless by unanimous consent.

In the Assembly, on a date fixed by the Speaker, Rules Committee takes over all bills not already acted on along with other matters pending; date so fixed by the Speaker, however, shall be not less than one week after the time limit set for the introduction of bills. The Committee on Rules may report a bill that has been recommitted from the floor. In the Senate, the committees have charge of all bills up to the close of the session. The Committee on Rules of either house has power to take a bill from a committee and place it immediately upon the order of final passage. It may also introduce a bill or amend a bill in any particular.

A bill must be reprinted each time it is amended and it can not be passed in final form, in either house, unless it has been upon the desks of the members for three legislative days. The Governor, however, may send a message dispensing with the three-day requirement and stating the facts in his opinion which necessitate the immediate passage, in which case the bill must be upon the desks of all members in final form, not necessarily printed, before final passage. A message given on a bill by the Governor does not necessarily mean the legislation has his approval as the required message is sent only to expedite passage.

A bill relating to the property, affairs or government of any city, which shall be special or local in its effect, shall not be passed, unless: (1) so requested by the Mayor of the city affected, concurred therein by the local legislative body, (2) or upon the request of two-thirds of the members elected to such body, declaring a necessity exists and reciting the facts thereof, and in each case a two-thirds affirmative vote of members of the Senate and Assembly is required before passage.

A bill, special or local, in terms relating to one county, shall not be passed, except: (1) on request of the elective governing body of each county affected, (2) and in any county having an alternative form of government providing for an elective county officer, upon request of elective governing body with the concurrence of executive officer of each county affected; by a two-thirds vote of the local governing body after the refusal or failure of approval by the executive officer, (3) or upon certificate of necessity from Governor reciting the facts of such necessity and thereupon receiving a two-thirds affirmative vote of both houses.

A bill relating to the property affairs or government of a village with a population of five thousand or more (first class village) shall not be passed, unless: (1) so requested by chief executive officer of the village affected, concurred in by a majority vote of the local legislative body, or (2) a message of necessity is sent to legislature by the Governor; in either case, the request must be accompanied with a message declaring a necessity exists and reciting the facts thereof; also two-thirds affirmative vote of each house is required.

Concurrent resolutions, proposing amendment to the Constitution, must be transmitted in original form and each time amended, to the Attorney-General in accordance with the Constitution, and when his opinion is received (required within twenty days) the proposal is given consideration by the legislature in the same manner as a bill. If it is passed by both houses it is sent to the Secretary of State for filing and does not require action by the Governor. After the proposed amendment is passed by two consecutive legislatures it is submitted to the people for consideration, and if accepted becomes part of the Constitution and if rejected it has no effect. Resolutions proposing or ratifying an amendment to the United States Constitution shall be considered in the same manner as a bill.

A bill may be progressed without regard to the regular order in either house, by unanimous consent or by a suspension of the rules up to the point of final passage.

During the session of the legislature the Governor has ten days, exclusive of Sundays, in which to approve or veto a bill. If he does not take action within that time the bill becomes a law. If vetoed, the bill may be passed and enacted into law over his veto by two-thirds vote of each house.

All bills passed during the last ten days of the session are treated as thirty-day bills and the Governor has thirty calendar days, after the legislature adjourns, within which to act. All bills not signed by the Governor during that period are dead.

ABBOT LOW MOFFAT, THE LEGISLATIVE PROCESS.

It is quite amazing how many people are ignorant of the procedure by which our laws are made. Indeed, few understand even the nature of the legislative process which is the corner stone of representative democracy. It is particularly disturbing that so many lawyers not only are not familiar with the subject, but are inclined deliberately to ignore it. Perhaps this is the fault of the law schools, which until recently were inclined to treat statute law as an unfortunate intrusion in the reasoning process by which the common law was developed. But, whatever the cause, the result is rather similar to that of the professional chauffeur who is satisfied with driving an automobile, knowing little or nothing of the machinery under the hood.

Statute law is the basis of legal practice. There are many lawyers, however, who do not know their way around the statute books and are lost if they must go outside the various compiled and consolidated laws. Probably even more encounter difficulty in the matter of statutory interpretation—the hunt for the mythical “legislative intent”—which includes not merely interpretation of language and court decisions, but the actual background and history of a law and each phrase contained therein. It is particularly discouraging to find how few lawyers are capable of good bill drafting, which is an art in itself, and how many assume that they have ability in this field.

The emphasis of the law is constantly changing. As one field of law diminishes in importance, others arise. Some trends are obviously of comparatively short duration, while others will doubtless last through at least several generations. The automobile negligence case which in the past twenty years has become so widespread will, in my opinion, prove to be of the former type, because the present machinery is out of trend with the social necessities of the modern era. On the other hand, as government becomes more and more complex, there will be an increasing growth of administrative law. What is often overlooked is that the basis of all administrative law and practice is statute law. There is also developing a field of practice which might be described as “legislative consultant”—the lawyer who, without participation as a lobbyist, advises on legislative trends and the remote as well as the immediate economic and social consequences of legislation.

How does a law come into being? In all legislative bodies there are differences in detail, but an outline of the procedure in the New York State Assembly will cover the usual and essential steps.

It is in committee that the real work of legislative bodies is done. A legislature is too large and unwieldy a body and is too inexpert in most of the technical problems presented to it to act in the first instance as a whole. The sifting process is done, therefore, by committees. Each committee specializes in a particular field, but unlike the Congress, where committees are in session throughout the legislative term, in state legislatures the committees disband at the end of the session and, of necessity, are not especially expert in their subjects. Seldom does a committee itself draft legislation or even undertake to improve or change a bill that comes before it. It either accepts or rejects the proposal. Occasionally a member will indicate to the introducer what objections were raised, and if he is sufficiently interested he himself will prepare amendments to overcome these objections.

It is also important to bear in mind that almost no legislation originates within a legislative body. Requests come from citizens, agencies, organized groups and administrative officials. For example, an organization of rooming-house keepers, believing that a certain statute which refers to lodging-house keepers applies also to them, brings suit in the courts and is greatly aggrieved when the court rules that the protection afforded to lodging-house keepers does not apply to them. The organization thereupon writes to a member of the legislature pointing out the injustice of this situation and urges that the protection be made uniform.

The member takes the letter to the Bill Drafting Commission, an official agency of the legislature for the preparation of legislation in proper form. The commission prepares three typewritten drafts which the member "drops in the box" as, for historical reasons, the act of introducing bills by handing them to the Clerk is called. One copy is for the Committee on Revision, one for the printer and one for the Legislative Index. The next day when the legislature convenes, after the prayer and a motion to dispense with reading the journal of the preceding day, comes usually the First Reading of Assembly bills. The Clerk reads the title of three or four of the newly introduced bills (there may be a hundred or more on the desk) and the Speaker announces to what committees they are referred for consideration. The ninety-six which have not been read are, of course, also sent to committees but reading the titles aloud and making an announcement of committees is omitted to save time. Every bill must by Constitutional requirement have three readings and this reference to the committees constitutes the First Reading. Within three or four days the bills are printed, showing at the head to what committee they have been referred, and are placed on the desks of the members. No bill, except on emergency message from the Governor, may be passed until it has been in printed form on the desks of the members for three days. For this reason copies of all bills which have been introduced in the Senate are also placed on the shelf of each member's desk as soon as printed.

The introducer of the rooming-house bill presently goes before the committee to which it has been referred at one of its meetings, explains the purpose of the bill and why he thinks it should be adopted. The committee, feeling the change desirable, by majority vote reports the bill favorably to the Assembly and it appears on the calendar on the Order of Second Reading. At the next session of the Assembly, shortly after the First Reading of bills, the titles of all bills on the Order of Second Reading are read aloud in the order they appear on the printed calendar which is on each member's desk. When the title of the rooming-house bill is read, if no one has objection to the bill it is advanced to Third Reading and will come up for final vote a few days later. But, if some member is opposed to the bill or wants an explanation, he calls, "Strike out," an abbreviation for the expression "Strike out the enacting clause," a motion which, if carried, would defeat the bill. Bills may be struck out on both the Second and Third Reading calendars. The bill is thereupon laid aside temporarily and the reading of the calendar continued until all the bills to which there is no objection are advanced or, in the case of Third Reading, finally passed. The bills which have been laid aside are then taken up once more, the title again read and debate on the proposal is had.

In the Assembly, it is seldom that there is serious debate or opposition to a bill on Second Reading because the pending question is the advancement of the bill and if the bill fails to advance it retains its place on Second Reading and appears on the calendar again the following day. Most debate, therefore, is on the Third Reading of bills when a vote pass or defeat the proposal can be had.

There are two ways of defeating a bill. The first is on a motion to recommit the bill to committee. Once a bill is recommitted, it cannot be reported again except by majority vote of the entire Assembly. If the motion to recommit is lost, it is still possible that the bill will be defeated on the roll call, at which time a majority of all the members is required.

There are two kinds of roll call. The short roll call, used to save time when there is no serious objection to a proposal, consists of reading the first and last names and the names of the party leaders. Every member, whether present or not, is assumed to have voted in the affirmative unless he raises his hand and requests to be recorded in the negative. On the long or slow roll call, each of the one hundred fifty names is read, the member answering personally "aye" or "no". When the minority party wants to be recorded in the negative but does not wish to take the time for a slow roll call, the minority leader calls "Party vote" on a short roll call and the vote is then recorded with the majority members "aye" and the minority members "no" unless individuals indicate a contrary vote.

After a bill has passed its Second Reading it is sent to the Revision Committee where the bill is reprinted in final form, or, to use the old terminology which still obtains, is "engrossed", and the "engrossed copy" in its "jacket" is at the desk when finally passed. It is then signed officially by the Speaker and sent to the Senate where it is referred to a Senate committee.

If a bill is defeated on Third Reading and the sponsor has reason to believe that he can pass it at a later date when absent members are present, he can move to reconsider the vote, lay the motion on the table and bring the bill up for a second vote at a later date. But only one reconsideration is permitted.

In some states a bill is introduced in one house alone, but in New York it is usual to introduce the same bill in both the Senate and Assembly. If the Senate, for instance, passes a bill first, it comes over to the Assembly and is referred to committee like any Assembly bill on First Reading. The Assembly committee may report favorably the Senate bill, but it frequently happens that the Assembly companion bill has already been reported and is on Second or Third Reading. Just before a vote is taken, therefore, the introducer of the Assembly bill moves to discharge the Assembly committee from further consideration of the Senate bill for the purpose of substitution, as the identical bill must pass both houses. If the Assembly passes the bill, the engrossed Senate copy which already bears the signature of the Senate's presiding officer (the Lieutenant-Governor) is signed by the Speaker, returned to the Senate and by the Senate transmitted to the Governor.

If a bill fails to pass both houses it is, of course, lost. But from time to time a bill will be amended in the other house before it is passed. It must in such case be returned to the first house. If that house concurs in the amendments the bill is automatically passed. But it may send the bill to committee and do nothing further, it may itself amend the amended bill, or it may decide to try to reach a compromise agreement through the appointment of a conference committee of the two houses. This is the usual procedure in Congress, but there has been only one conference committee in the New York State Legislature in over twenty years. That followed a deadlock on the budget.

Either house may, before action by the other and with the consent of the other, recall a bill which it has passed. Similarly, a bill can be recalled from the Governor. This procedure is used quite often at the informal request of the Governor who may want some amendment made to a bill or who may desire thirty days in which to consider a bill instead of ten days. A bill that goes to the Governor must be signed or vetoed by him within ten legislative days or else it will become law without his signature. However, the Governor is given thirty days to sign or veto bills which are passed within the last ten days of the session and if he does not sign these so-called "thirty day bills" they fail to become law. As in Congress, the Governor's veto power is not absolute. A bill can be passed over his veto by a two-thirds vote.

It is comparatively easy to follow legislation in the New York Assembly. The bills themselves are clearly printed with all proposed new matter in italics and existing law, proposed to be deleted, enclosed in heavy brackets. Every bill when it is introduced receives in numerical order an introductory number and by this number one can always find it without difficulty. At the same time, it also receives and there is printed on the bill itself a print number. When a bill is amended it has to be reprinted and thereupon receives an additional print number. These numbers are placed on the bill in numerical order as each bill is printed and a bill which has been amended several times will frequently carry three or four print numbers as well as its introductory number. One can, therefore, look up a bill in each stage of amendment. There is printed weekly during the session a Legislative Index which gives the introductory numbers, a brief synopsis and the exact status of each bill (i.e., what committee it is in, or if it is on Second Reading, or Third Reading, or before the Governor, etc.), all the print numbers and their corresponding introductory numbers, and all legislation indexed both under the name of the introducer and under its subject matter. Accordingly to follow any legislation, it is only necessary to know either of its numbers, its sponsor or the subject matter.

The legislature convenes the first Wednesday of January in each year. Its term is without limit, but it usually adjourns in March or April. The first session of each week is held on Monday night at eight-thirty so that members from distant parts of the state can get to the session without traveling on Sunday. During January and the early part of February, most of the members go home on Tuesday, as there is little business before the house. The committees begin to function shortly after organization, but they are not inclined to report bills favorably until they have had an opportunity of finding what legislation will be proposed on a given subject, so that they may compare the various bills offered. Skeleton sessions are usually held at 11 A.M. each day during the balance of the week. It is not until a number of weeks have passed that these sessions are sufficiently important for most of the members to attend.

During the last few days of the session, the Assembly procedure differs very considerably from that which obtains in most states. As indicated above, all bills are referred to different committees for consideration. Towards the close of the session, however, these committees terminate their activities and all bills upon which they have not acted are referred to a committee of which the Speaker is chairman, known as the Rules Committee. When Rules Committee takes charge, the legislative body begins to function very rapidly. Bills reported by the Rules Committee are reported on the Order of Second and Third Reading at the same time, so that there is no delay between the two readings. It is this period, and especially the last day, that is the object of much, and sometimes legitimate, criticism. On the last day of the session when it may be physically impossible to have a printed calendar of the bills, members have little opportunity to secure and look over copies before they are passed. Indeed, if the bill has been recently amended or introduced, there may not even be copies available, and many votes are cast in complete ignorance of what is being voted on. Rules Committee is composed of the leaders of both parties, and the votes under these circumstances are based on political faith in such leaders. When the leadership is conscientious, no intrinsic harm results; but it is in such periods that a callous leadership "puts over" or lets "slip through" bill that would normally not withstand the cross-fire of debate.

One other matter which receives occasional publicity deserves mention. The house can always by vote of a majority of its membership take over control of legislation and discharge a committee from consideration of a bill so that the bill comes before it. Motions to discharge committees are quite frequently made towards the end of a session. The purpose of such motions, however, is generally political in order to secure a record vote for use in campaigns. It is an unwritten rule from which there are but few deviations that the majority party will support the committees which it controls so that such motions, requiring a majority of the house membership, hardly ever prevail. Where there is a sufficient number of the majority members who wish to join with the minority, the committee, even though its members may not approve the bill, will generally report it to the house for consideration, although without recommendation as to the action of the house.

The procedure in every legislative body has two purposes. Its primary purpose is to secure careful consideration of each proposal and to safeguard the right of every member to express his views as he wishes and to vote, but at the same time care is taken that the majority party control the fate of legislation, for the passage or defeat of which it must assume public responsibility.

BOOK I MCKINNEY'S STATUTES, DIVISION II (1942) *

II. Formalities of Enactment and Approval.

§ 11. Legislative procedure generally

The general outline of procedure to be followed by the Senate and Assembly in enacting laws is laid down by the Constitution, and within this framework each house of the Legislature may determine the rule of its own proceedings. Thus the Constitution provides that no laws of this state shall be enacted except by bill; that bills may originate in either house; that, having been passed by one house, they may be amended by the other; but that upon the last reading of a bill no amendments shall be allowed. After the final reading of a bill, also, the question of its passage is to be taken immediately, and the ayes and nays entered on the journal. Similarly the Constitution provides that no bill shall be passed in either house, unless it has been printed and upon the desks of the members, in its final form, for three legislative days. The Governor, however, may certify to the Legislature facts which, in his opinion, necessitate an immediate vote on a bill, in which case the bill need only be upon the desks of the members in final form, not necessarily printed, before passage. No bill can become a law except by the assent of a majority of the members elected to each branch of the Legislature, and the Constitution provides that the enacting clause of all bills shall be "The people of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows."

These, briefly, are the rules prescribed by the Constitution by which laws shall be enacted. Within them the Legislature has standardized its procedure so that bills in the process of enactment follow a more or less routine course. Any bill may be introduced in either house, and no preliminary finding or investigation is necessary to their introduction. . . .

§ 14. Approval of Governor

The Constitution provides for the presentation of bills to the Governor for his approval as follows: "Every bill which shall have passed the senate and assembly shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the governor; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it shall have originated, which shall enter the objections at large on the journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration, two-thirds of the members elected to that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved by two-thirds of the members elected to that house, it shall become a law notwithstanding the objections of the governor. In all such cases the votes in both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the members voting shall be entered on the journal of each house respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the governor within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the legislature shall, by their adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall not become a law without the approval of the governor. No bill shall become a law after the final adjournment of the legislature, unless approved by the governor within thirty days after such adjournment. If any bill presented to the governor contain several items of appropriation of money, he may object to one or more of such items while approving of the other portion of the bill. In such case he shall append to the bill, at the time of signing it, a statement of the items to which he objects; and the appropriation so objected to shall not take effect. If the legislature be in session, he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of such statement, and the items objected to shall be separately reconsidered. If on reconsideration one or more of such items be approved by two-thirds of the members elected to each house, the same shall be part of the law, notwithstanding the objections of the governor. All the provisions of this section, in relation to bills not approved by the governor, shall apply in cases in which he shall withhold his approval from any item or items contained in a bill appropriating money."

In objecting to items of an appropriation bill, however, the objection of the Governor is to be directed to items of money appropriated and not to limitations or conditions under which the appropriation is made. Hence a provision that an appropriation was not to be used for personal services was not an item which the Governor could veto while approving the rest of the bill.

To the requirement that all bills be submitted to the Governor for his approval before becoming a law, there is also one specific exception. An appropriation bill originally submitted to the Legislature by the Governor becomes a law immediately upon being passed by both houses of the Legislature without any further action by the Governor; except that appropriations for the Legislature and judiciary, and separate items added by the Legislature to such bills, are subject to his approval as in the case of other laws.

The Legislature, being unable to enact a law without the approval of the Governor, or by a two-thirds majority in case he disapproves, cannot repeal a statute without the same formalities. Hence a legislative enactment may not be declared inoperative by a mere concurrent resolution, and a legislative grant of immunity from prosecution on account of testimony given before a legislative committee would be ineffective unless approved by the executive of the state.

§ 15. Submission of laws to popular vote

Under the republican form of government in force in this state all legislative power is derived from the people. But when the people adopted the Constitution they surrendered the power of making laws to the Legislature and imposed it upon that body as a duty. Hence, except as they expressly reserved such power in the Constitution, the people now have no authority to ratify or adopt laws proposed by their representatives. Thus it was held in a comparatively early case that the Legislature had no power to submit to popular vote the question of whether a given enactment should become a law. While, however, this holding still reflects the general rule, the later cases have refused to extend its doctrine and have sanctioned numerous exceptions to it. A distinction has been drawn, for example, between the submission of a general law to the electors of the whole state and the submission of a local law to the voters of a particular locality; and the latter has been permitted where the former was not allowed. The reason for this distinction, it is said, rests in the manifest propriety of making local changes dependent upon the vote of the local electors, who, of all persons, could best determine their convenience. Thus it has been held that the bonding of a municipal corporation in aid of the construction of a railroad could be made contingent upon the consent of a certain percentage of the taxpayers of such municipality; the issuance of liquor licenses in a certain district could be made to depend upon the vote of the local electors; the location of a county seat could be submitted to the electorate of the county; and the voters within a proposed county could be permitted to vote on whether a law erecting such county should go into effect.

Another difference recognized in the more recent decisions with regard to the voluntary submission of laws to popular vote is between the power to determine whether an act shall become a law and the power to determine whether a law shall become operative. In the first case, it is said, the act does not purport to be a law when it leaves the Legislature. The very question of its becoming such is submitted to the electors. But in the second case the legislating is done and the statute is a completed law, its future operation being dependent on a contingency; namely, the affirmative vote of the people. In this respect statutes of the latter type are comparable to conditional statutes, and a referendum concerning them is permissible, though with reference to the former it is not. A law, therefore, which sets forth a number of forms of city government and authorizes cities to adopt them, is not of the kind which violates the provision of the Constitution vesting legislative power in the Senate and Assembly.

In addition to those cases already considered in which the Legislature may voluntarily submit a law to popular vote, it is to be observed that the Constitution requires such procedure in the enactment of certain laws. It commands a referendum in the case of legislation contracting additional state indebtedness; upon the annexation of territory to a city; upon the creation of a public utility to serve a given locality; and upon the adoption of an optional form of county government.

When a referendum law has once been passed there arises the problem as to how it may be amended. In this regard there appears, at first glance, to be some conflict in the decisions. The Attorney General has observed that such legislation ranks next to the Constitution and may not be changed or modified, in respect to basic requirements, without a resubmission as in the case of the original law, and at least one case upholds this view. Two lower courts, on the other hand, have flatly declared that the Legislature could not by voluntarily submitting a law to popular vote, deprive itself of its plenary power to amend all legislation, including referendum laws. The conflicts in these adjudications, however, can be reconciled on the ground that one line of decisions represents cases in which a referendum was required by the Constitution; while the other covers those wherein the Legislature submitted laws to the people of its own volition. Hence the true rule would seem to be that laws required by the Constitution to be submitted to popular vote may be amended only by the same formality; while laws voluntarily submitted to popular vote may be amended by the Legislature alone.

In connection with the amendment of referendum laws courts may likewise consider the object of the Legislature in submitting the original law to the people; and if a proposed amendment does not interfere with the original design, or basically change the law, a referendum is not required to make the amendment effective. Thus it has been said that the only question submitted to the people under the Constitutional provision requiring a referendum in the case of legislation contracting state debts, was the advisability of contracting the debt. Hence an amendment to a referendum law which did not affect the debt contracted was upheld. So likewise with an amendment which only corrected a defective detail in the original act.

Notwithstanding the opinion of the Attorney General that referendum laws rank next to the Constitution, the approval by the people of an act not required to be submitted to them cannot be construed to be an amendment of the fundamental law; for the Constitution can be changed only by the methods provided for therein.

§ 16. Proof of passage; time of becoming law; publication

When a bill has passed both houses of the Legislature the laws of this state prescribe certain formalities which establish the time and manner of its passage; fix the time at which it became a law; and provide for its publication. The Legislative Law provides that upon the passage of a bill by either house, the presiding officer thereof shall append to such bill a certificate of the date of its passage by the votes of a majority of all the members elected to such house or in the presence of three-fifths of such members, if such be the case, or by the votes of two-thirds of all the members elected to such house, as the case may be. Upon the passage of a bill as to which a part becomes law immediately and a part requires further action by the governor, two copies shall be certified as above provided, one of which, upon final passage by both houses, shall be transmitted to the governor and the other to the secretary of state. Should a controversy arise as to the passage of a bill, the certificates of the presiding officers become of prime importance. The Legislative Law provides that no bill shall be deemed to have passed unless so certified and that the certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the passage of the bill in the manner specified. The journals of the Legislature, therefore, may not be received in evidence to impeach certificates which are legal in form and which, on their face, show the bill to have been duly passed. Nor is a defect in the certificate in failing to show that the requisite numbers were present or voted sufficient to overcome this conclusive presumption, but in such case, recourse may be had to the journals of the respective houses to support the validity of the enactment. The certificates to be considered in deciding controversies are the original certificates of the presiding officers and such officers may not make any substitution, alteration, or addition to them after the adjournment of the Legislature.

If a bill becomes a law by the approval of the Governor, the Legislative Law provides that his certificate shall be the evidence of the time when the bill becomes a law; but if a bill becomes a law otherwise than by the approval of the Governor, the certificate of the Secretary of State showing the time when the bill was filed in his office shall constitute such evidence.

If, after passage by both houses, a bill be approved by the Governor or passed over his veto, the Constitution commands the Legislature to provide for its speedy publication. This the Legislature has done by section 45 of the Legislative Law, which provides that the Secretary of State shall annually cause the session laws to be published as soon as possible after the adjournment of the Legislature. In the publication of every law, the certificates of the presiding officers of each house are omitted, but there is inserted immediately under the title of the law, a statement to the effect that it became a law upon the properly specified date, with or without the approval of the Governor, or notwithstanding his objections, as the case may be, and adding the words "passed by a two-thirds vote," "passed, three-fifths being present," or "passed, a majority being present," and the words "on emergency message" if passed by a two-thirds vote on an emergency message from the Governor. In the case of an appropriation law submitted by the Governor, certain provisions of which become effective without his approval, the statement in addition to the other matter prescribed is required to state that part of it became a law upon a properly specified date by the action of both houses of the Legislature and that part of it became a law upon a properly specified date with or without the approval of the governor, or notwithstanding his objections, as the case may be.

Generally speaking, and aside from statutory provisions on the subject, an act contained in the printed session laws is presumed to have been passed in the mode prescribed by the Constitution, and the burden is on one asserting the contrary to set up his claim in his pleadings and produce evidence to overcome the presumption of regularity. But it is to be observed that this presumption attaches only to the certificates of the presiding officers which are filed in the office of the Secretary of State, and does not run to statements made by the Secretary based upon them and printed in the session laws. The Legislative Law specifically provides that such statement shall be only presumptive evidence that the original law was certified by the presiding officer of each house accordingly. Hence the courts may look beyond the printed statute book to examine whether a statute has been constitutionally passed, and a statement in the session laws that an act was passed by two-thirds vote may be rebutted by the production of the original certificate showing that such was not the case.

FINAL REPORT OF THE NEW YORK STATE JOINT LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATIVE METHODS, PRACTICES, PROCEDURES AND EXPENDITURES

N. Y. Leg.Doc. (1946) No. 31; 23-38 *

THE NEW YORK STATE LEGISLATURE—AN OVERALL VIEW

Powers

Concern has been expressed over what is said to be the diminished powers of state legislatures today in contrast with the powers conferred upon them by original state constitutions and in relation to the growing power of the Executive and the Federal Government. Under the first New York State Constitution of 1777 the powers of the Legislature were practically limitless. Vested in the Legislature were broad residual powers restrained only by a few general rules. The trend since has been well summarized by Charles Z. Lincoln:

“ . . . subsequent Constitutions have imposed important restrictions on legislative action, and have, in some cases, reserved power to the people themselves, and in others have committed these subjects to subordinate local agencies in the political subdivisions of the state. Limitations on legislative power have also been imposed by the Federal Constitution, which has deprived the states of any authority to enact laws on specified classes of subjects, including laws impairing the obligation of contracts, affecting vested rights, denying equal protection of the laws, depriving citizens of the privileges and immunities secured by the Constitution, and laws infringing upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce."

The limitations and restrictions imposed upon the Legislature have taken the following forms: The Legislature may not pass any laws in violation of any right or privilege specifically guaranteed to the people by the Constitution of the United States and of New York State. In certain cases it may not pass any private or local bills and must act only by general laws. The form of all bills and the number of votes required to pass certain bills are rigidly prescribed. The Legislature cannot audit or allow certain claims or accounts against the state. Under the Executive budget system, its power to amend, consider and act upon budget bills and other bills carrying appropriations is restricted in a number of respects. Specifically prohibited is the giving or loaning of State moneys or credit. The Legislature's power to contract indebtedness is likewise limited. Among other curbs imposed upon legislative sovereignty are the amendments safeguarding the home rule powers of villages having a population of 5,000 or more and of counties, and cities.

Despite these restrictions, it is premature to portend the dissolution of representative government in the State. Unlike the Congress of the United States which acts on the basis of well-defined and sharply limited powers specifically conferred by or implied in the Federal Constitution, the New York State Legislature is given an affirmative and omnibus grant of lawmaking power, broader in scope than that possessed by Congress. Unless the Legislature is specifically restrained by the Constitution, its latitude of action is virtually unhampered and unlimited. What is meant by legislative sovereignty, fundamentally, is the power of the representative body to determine State-wide policy and to make certain that administrative agencies conform to that policy; the power to raise revenue; the power to appropriate funds and to make certain that expenditures are made in accordance with the intent of the Legislature. Whatever the historical reasons for the various restrictions imposed upon the Legislature may be (and such discussion does not come within the scope of this report), these basic powers have not been vitiated.

The expansion of rule-making powers of administrative agencies has led to the assertion that the lawmaking powers of the Legislature have contracted over the years. The duty of making laws for the conduct of the inhabitants of the State has been entrusted by the people solely to their elected representatives. This is provided for by Art. III, Sec. 1 of the State Constitution. The courts have consistently interpreted that provision strictly. The Constitution-makers intended that those whom the people select to make their laws shall do so and no others. The duty imposed upon them may not be delegated to others. This admonition of the people through their fundamental law is restated here because it seems to have been forgotten even by legislators.

How far this doctrine has been overlooked is brought sharply to attention by an examination of statutory enactments of recent times. Such a survey reveals the fact that more and more legislatures are wont to pass on to administrative officials the duty of writing in the details of administration by conferring on them wide rule-making powers.

Scope of Legislative Operations

Volume of Bills Introduced

Although the present New York State Legislature is alleged to be overshadowed by the Federal Government and curbed in the exercise of its powers by the State Constitution, New York's fifty-six Senators and one hundred fifty Assemblymen act on more measures and on more important measures annually than were considered by earlier legislatures at a time when the national government was weaker and the State Constitution more generous in its grant of legislative powers. As the concept of the role of the State in society has changed over the years, the Legislature has been called upon to enact far-reaching measures governing education, health, social welfare and industrial and labor relations.

BILLS INTRODUCED, NEW YORK STATE LEGISLATURE, 1896-1945*

†INCLUDES SPECIAL SESSION.

In the last fifty years alone there has been a significant increase both in the over-all volume of bills introduced and in the number of general measures of such broad scope as to affect all the citizens of the State. Although considerable fluctuation marks the number of bills introduced in the years from 1896 to 1945 as Chart 1 shows, there is yet discernible a definite upward trend. The volume of measures introduced in both houses ranged from 2,209 in 1902 to 4,698 in 1933 or twice as many. In addition, there were hundreds of amendments annually, each one of which was considered a new bill. On the average, 47 per cent more bills were filed during the 1941-1945 period than were introduced during the five years from 1896 to 1900. Increases in the total number of bills introduced are particularly evident during the war years, 1939-1945, and those immediately preceding the war.

Nature of Bills Introduced

No other state legislature contends with the staggering total of more than 4,000 bills introduced annually. In its scope of operation, the New York State Legislature is second only to Congress among the legislative bodies in the United States. Most of the bills introduced reflect the complex economic and social conditions of the State.

From 1943 to 1945, consecutively, Senators introduced 1,650, 1,723 and 1,981 bills. During the same period Assemblymen put in the hopper 1,944, 2,069 and 2,356 bills. While the bills concern almost every subject comprehended by the lawmaking power of the Legislature, the principal emphasis appears to lie on measures affecting education, labor and workmen's compensation, civil service and pensions, the Civil Practice Act, appropriations and taxation, and counties, cities, towns and villages. Approximately, four-fifths of all bills filed are general bills of State-wide concern, the remainder having local or private application.

Nature of Legislative Action . . .

Of each hundred bills introduced, twenty-one are destined to become law, to cite the experience of the last three sessions. What happens to the other bills in the course of their legislative journey is shown in Table 1. Committees in both houses have been responsible for the defeat, on the average, of 52 per cent of all bills introduced, with the mortality heaviest in the first house. As many as 558 bills, on the average, or 14.3 per cent of all bills introduced were substituted for in the first house by bills arriving from the second house. Because both houses usually support the decisions of their committees, relatively few bills failed to pass on the floor after being reported. In all, on the average, only 3.8 per cent of all bills introduced either died on the second reading or general orders calendar or were defeated on the floor of the first house. The number of bills introduced in both houses during the last three sessions ranged from 3,594 to 4,337. Of this amount, the number that survived both houses and reached the Governor ranged from 1,015 to 1,272. This represented, on the average, 28.8 per cent of the aggregate number of bills introduced. After reaching the Governor, a few bills were recalled and recommitted by the first house. Vetoes by the Governor averaged only 7.9 per cent of all bills introduced.

Analysis of legislative action would be incomplete without reference to the number and type of amendments made to Senate and Assembly bills during the 1943-1945 period. This is shown in Table 2. The number of Senate amendments ranged from 391 to 417 and the number of Assembly amendments from 457 to 486, constituting approximately one-fifth of all bills introduced in each house. More than three-fifths of all amendments, on the average, were bills that were amended and recommitted to committee, usually upon the initiative of the introducers to meet objections. Senate amendments made on the floor on general orders or third reading averaged slightly more than one-fifth of all amendments. Less than one-fifth of all Assembly amendments, on the average, were made after the bills were reported by committees.

Additional insight into the nature of legislative action may also be gained by an analysis of the time consumed at various stages of the legislative process. This is particularly important with reference to state legislatures which, unlike Congress, hold brief sessions—for the most part biennially—lasting rarely more than three months. During the 1945 session the Senate was in session sixty-one legislative days and the Assembly fifty-nine. Table 3 shows that, on the average, it took twenty-seven legislative days for Senate bills and twenty-five legislative days for Assembly bills to be passed by both houses. Committee action in the first house averaged approximately fifteen legislative days and calendar action approximately five legislative days. Completed action in the second house averaged seven legislative days for Senate bills and approximately six legislative days for Assembly bills. The use of companion bills accounts for the fact that relatively few days are required by the second house to complete action on measures sent to it for concurrence or rejection by the first house. Most measures introduced in one house duplicate companion measures introduced in the other house under separate sponsorship. Under this system most of the committee work in both houses is completed by the time the first house approves the bill, making it possible for the bill to receive prompt consideration on the calendar of the second house without reference to committee.

The Legislative Product

As has been pointed out earlier, slightly more than one-fifth of all bills introduced during the last three sessions reached the statute books. Contrary to popular impression, most of these statutes were not new sections, articles or chapters, but rather amendments to the various existing consolidated and unconsolidated laws and separate acts. In a comprehensive article on legislative procedure in New York, a former chairman of the Assembly Ways and Means Committee has stressed this phase of the legislative process:

“Frequently, criticism is voiced of the “vast quantities of new laws turned out by our legislative mills.” This is an easy criticism, but it is seldom based on more than a superficial glance at the number of session laws enacted. The repeal of an old law involves enactment of a new law to effect such repeal. Appropriations for the support of government require one or more statutes. A very large percentage of laws are the result of what might well be thought of as petition in equity—the private individual who seeks the right to bring suit against the state for an alleged grievance; the municipality which to strengthen its credit, seeks to have validated by the state its action in authorizing a local bond issue. The great majority of the other statutes are those which adjust or correct some comparatively minor situation perhaps of administration, perhaps of relationships between citizens which have been called to the attention of the legislature by those who found themselves affected adversely. It is a rare occurrence when as many as three or four really new laws affecting the people of the state are enacted at any single session of the legislature.”

The data shown in Table 4 support this view. The various amendments to existing statutes accounted, on the average, for nearly three-fifths of all measures approved by the Governor from 1943 to 1945. An amendment, of course, may be more important than the statute amended. It can also be a complete revision of the law. Less than one-fifth of all the bills approved were special local acts. Appropriation and revenue measures represented more than 5 per cent of the to-

Problems Concerning Legislative Procedure and Methods

The review of the nature and scope of legislative action in New York indicates that the New York State Legislature is discharging ever-increasing responsibilities on a scale hardly anticipated decades ago. Despite the great growth of Federal power, nationally, and of Executive power within the State, the Legislature remains the main policy-determining body on countless varied and complex social, economic and political problems. Its strength and prestige depend on its ability to come to grips with these problems and to become a more efficient agent of the people's will in determining State policy.

To achieve these ends, the Legislature has recognized from time to time that it cannot afford to perpetuate obsolete methods, antiquated practices and cumbersome procedures that were adequate in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Until the organization of the Committee, it has, however, not called for a sweeping, comprehensive inquiry into legislative problems. Instead, over the years there has been a steady, evolutionary improvement in legislative machinery. That a more systematic approach to the problem of legislative reorganization has been lacking until recently may be explained by two factors: (1) Crowded, brief annual sessions have left no time for a consideration of the mechanics of law-making. Concerned with administering to the needs of others, legislators have overlooked their own problems, except when some specific defect in the legislative process became patent. (2) Only during the last decade has public emphasis begun to shift from the reorganization of the Executive branch to the strengthening of the Legislative branch, explained perhaps by the heightened importance that depression and war have lent to representative government.

Legislative Improvements Effected

The net effect of the legislative improvements accomplished over the years, however, is that procedure in the New York State Legislature is simpler and easier to follow than in most other states and that legislators enjoy more technical assistance than is available in other state legislative bodies. Thanks to a detailed recordkeeping system open to the public, it is possible at any time to determine the exact status of the bill, and the records of individual members and committees. Not even in Congress are the record-keeping facilities more comprehensive. Every bill is readily identifiable by an introductory number which remains unchanged regardless of the number of amendments made. When a bill is originally printed, it also receives a print number. Every amendment necessitates reprinting and a new print number which is added to the old one. Consequently, a bill amended several times carries several print numbers but retains its original in-introductory number. This makes it easy to compare the amended bill with its original provisions.

Aware of the importance of expert bill drafting, the New York State Legislature was the first legislative body in the United States to establish a bill drafting agency. Similarly, it pioneered in creating a law revision agency responsible for examining the substantive statutory law with a view to scientific revision and for correcting the form and language of statutes. In 1891 the establishment of a Legislative Reference Section by the State Library led to the national movement for independent legislative research facilities.

Considerable improvements have been effected in the holding of committee hearings. In the last few years all hearings without exception have been joint meetings, sponsored by the corresponding committees in both houses. Advance notice has generally been adequate and has averaged two weeks. The hearings have covered series of integrated bills rather than isolated pieces of legislation.

Both houses have taken a long step forward in the direction of expediting procedure by limiting the introduction of bills to a definite date some weeks before adjournment. In the Assembly department bills must be introduced by February 15 and all other bills by March 7, except those introduced by the Rules Committee. In the Senate, the Temporary President who has the power to set a final date for the introduction of bills usually designates a day to correspond with the Assembly rule. To eliminate the unnecessary reading of the titles of bills, the rules provide that upon introduction and reference to committees, bills in the Senate are deemed to have their first and second reading and in the Assembly their first reading.

The Assembly has eased congestion of business toward the end of the session by providing that at least one week elapse from the final date for the introduction of bills to the date Assembly committees cease functioning and the Rules Committee takes charge of all bills undisposed of at that time. This rule enables standing committees to consider more effectively all bills referred to them and greatly reduces the number of bills considered by the Rules Committee toward the end of the session.

In both houses revision clerks attempt to read as many bills as possible before introduction with the result that there has been a reduction in the number of technical amendments to correct the form, style or language of bills. When bills are returned from the printer, they are checked by the revision department against the original manuscript and the present law. If "revision" amendments have to be made, they are incorporated whenever possible with substantive amendments, thus saving the time and cost involved in additional amendments.

Under Article IX of the New York State Constitution, certain bills affecting counties, cities and villages require "home rule requests" from the executive concurred in by the local legislative body or by such body upon its own initiative. Much delay, difficulty and litigation have been avoided by determining in advance of the reporting of the bill by committee whether a home rule request is required by the Constitution. All bills of that nature are stamped with the words "message required" and cannot be reported out of committee until the requests are actually received. Procedures have been perfected to notify the introducer that a bill requires a home rule request or the committee that a request has arrived from the locality. Without such precautions, calendars would become clogged, vexatious delays would be encountered and utter confusion would ensue.

Additional evolutionary improvements are highly technical for the most part and require no elaboration here. They have tended to insure accuracy and expedition in committee reports, roll calls, substitution of bills, engrossing of bills, discharge motions, amendments, journal entries, the printing of bills and the recall of bills. There is insufficient awareness on the part of the public of the complexity of the legislative process and of the fidelity and painstaking care with which bills must be processed.

SECTION 2. THE SPEAKER

"MISTER SPEAKER"

42 Time Magazine 19-20 (1943).*

. . . On the eve of election year, with politics weighing more day by day, in a House almost equally divided between Democrats and Republicans, anything can happen. To prevent anything disastrous happening to the Democrats is one job of Texas' Samuel Taliaferro Rayburn, 42nd Speaker of the U. S. House of Representatives.

But Sam Rayburn has a greater responsibility: to guide, shepherd and rule the sometimes unruly 435 Representatives of the U. S. people.

*(Courtesy of TIME, Copyright Time Inc. 1943.)

Powerful Sam Rayburn's job has often been called the "second most powerful job in the nation." From the days of Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, the German Lutheran pastor who presided over Congress' first sessions in New York, Speakers of the House have written their will and words into U. S. history. Some of the mighty:

Gaunt Henry Clay, only man who ever stepped into the Speakership the day he entered Congress, was the first to crack the whip over the House, the first to organize it firmly.

James Knox Polk, who guided the House in the hectic Jacksonian era, took more abuse and needling than any other Speaker, before or since. Polk put his, and Jackson's, program through Congress and graduated to the Presidency.

Bearded James Gillespie Blaine rose to the Speakership in 1869, in a year when only two-fifths of the House members were holdovers. He organized the House on strict party lines, held unquestioned leadership.

Of "Uncle Joe" Cannon, who held the Speakership from 1903-10, a minority member truly said: "I have seen him wield more power than the President." Uncle Joe owed much of his power to Maine's resolute Tom Reed, who had so rigged House procedure (the famed Reed's Rules) that the Speaker became, in effect, a dictator, Uncle Joe reaped the whirlwind in the spirited "revolution of 1910," when the House, under the prodding of a young Representative from Nebraska named George Norris, rewrote the rules.

Once the rigid rules were broken, Speakers were forced to wield power by tact, persuasion and favors. "Nick" Longworth kept a firm grip on the House through shrewd committee maneuvers; Texas' Jack Garner held sway by means of his long seniority and experience.

The Compromiser. No one, in the whole 155-year history of the Speakership, held it in a more difficult time than Sam Rayburn. Some Washington observers have called him "the greatest compromiser since Henry Clay." But Henry Clay compromised on issues; Sam Rayburn works to bring about compromise among factions. His technique is something to watch.

A short, stocky man with an almost evanescent fringe of white hair around his bald head, he spends much time leaning on the railing in the rear of the House. There, and in the cloakrooms and offices, he buttonholes his colleagues, lobbying for legislation which he feels must pass, sympathizing, advising, counseling. Sam's approach is disarmingly personal; when all other arguments fail, he says to a recalcitrant legislator: "You will be doing me a big personal favor if you vote for this." His difficulties are immense. The White House has been taking on more and more power for a decade. Sam Rayburn's job is to translate into Congressional action the will of a President who has frequently regarded Congress with cheerful contempt.

Most notable piece of Rayburn generalship occurred in the summer of 1941, when Congress wrestled over extending the one-year life of the draft. For weeks it seemed certain Congress would defeat the bill. Sam Rayburn sweated day and night, persuading, cajoling, pleading with the members. Congressmen worried desperately over the political effect of the bill on mothers and fathers. But Sam Rayburn was convinced that defeat of the bill would be disastrous to the United States. When the day for the vote arrived, Sam Rayburn was in a state of honest mental anguish; neither he nor anyone else knew for certain how the votes would go. As the clerk called the roll, Sam kept accurate count: the final tally showed the bill passed 203-202. Before any coward could switch his vote, Sam Rayburn, in a shrewd tactical move, announced the total, gaveled down all moves for reconsideration. He had won; and the U. S. Army was not disbanded four months before Pearl Harbor.

The leadership that brought Sam Rayburn through that crisis was grounded in experience: 31 years in the House (only two have served longer: Illinois's Sabath and North Carolina's Doughton); 25 years on the Interstate Commerce Committee (five as its chairman); and four years as majority leader before he ascended to the Speakership in 1940. . . .

SECTION 3. THE COMMITTEE SYSTEM AND LEGISLATIVE FACT FINDING

A. Introductory Note

The types of committees most commonly used in legislatures in the United States today are (1) standing committees, (2) select or special committees, and (3) conference committees. By means of standing or "permanent" committees of both houses, to each of which is assigned specific subject matter, a division of the labor of considering proposed measures after their introduction is accomplished. It is in these committees that the fact finding and policy forming functions of the legislatures are actually performed, rather than on the floor of the houses. So important have the standing committees become that President Wilson described the government of the United States as "a government by the chairmen of the Standing Committees of Congress." The same is true of state legislatures. The select or special committee, as the name indicates, is usually created ad hoc to conduct an investigation of a particularly searching nature or to attend to some temporary non-legislative matter. A conference committee is really two committees, one from each house, appointed to reconcile points of difference between the bills or resolutions passed on the same subject by the respective houses.

The so-called "committee of the whole" is really a stage in the order of legislative procedure at which immediately after second reading of bills, the entire membership is constituted into an informal body for the detailed consideration of proposed legislation. Since the system of standing committees became established the committee of the whole has, except in a few states, been rarely used. Minnesota is one of the exceptions.

The committees mentioned above and others, such as joint and interim, are discussed in this and other sections of this book.

NOTE

Although the standing committee system originated in the English Parliament, it died out with the rise of cabinet government. It was adopted in the seventeenth century by the assemblies of the southern and New England colonies, and has become a characteristic feature of the congressional system which has prevailed in the state and federal governments of the United States since the establishment of the republic. B. Committees of the Congress

REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE ORGANIZATION OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES PURSUANT TO H. CON. RES. 18

79th Congress, 2nd Session, Pages 1-14; 34-35 *
Senate Report No. 1011 (1946).

REORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS

INTRODUCTION

The Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress submits herewith its report of recommended changes in the two Houses of Congress.

This joint committee was directed:

"To make a full and complete study of the organization and operation of the Congress of the United States"— and to—

"recommend improvements in such organization and operation with a view toward strengthening the Congress, simplifying its operations, improving its relationships with other branches of the United States Government and enabling it better to meet its responsibilities under the Constitution."

Our committee was created in response to a widespread congressional and public belief that a grave constitutional crisis exists in which the fate of representative government itself is at stake. Public affairs are now handled by a host of administrative agencies headed by nonected officials with only casual oversight by Congress. The course of events has created a breach between government and the people. Behind our inherited constitutional pattern a new political order has arisen which constitutes a basic change in the Federal design. Meanwhile, government by administration is the object of group pressures which weaken its protection of the public interest. Under these conditions, it was believed, the time is ripe for Congress to reconsider its role in the American scheme of government and to modernize its organization and procedures.

The committee held 39 public hearings and 4 executive sessions between March 13 and June 29, 1945. The testimony of 102 witnesses was taken, 45 of whom were Members of Congress. In addition, 37 Members and many interested private citizens submitted written statements. A review of all the testimony received reveals a wide area of agreement among the witnesses with respect both to the conditions that handicap Congress in the efficient performance of its proper functions and as to many appropriate remedies for these defects.

In evaluating the suggestions, we have been guided by what Justice Holmes called "the felt necessities of the time." To all these proposals we have applied the simple test: Will they strengthen Congress and enable it to do a better job?

Under the Constitution the framers vested primary powers in the National Legislature. They gave it the power of the purse, the right to declare war, the power to legislate and impeach, to regulate commerce and promote science and the arts. They also authorized Congress to determine the structure of the executive department and the powers of all administrative officers, the number of the Supreme Court Justices and its appellate jurisdiction, and the form and jurisdiction of inferior tribunals.

In strengthening the Congress through proper organization and procedure, your committee believes that the first mandate of the Constitution will be carried out.

I. COMMITTEE STRUCTURE AND OPERATION

Your committee believes that no adequate improvement in the organization of Congress can be undertaken or effected unless Congress first reorganizes its present obsolete and overlapping committee structure. This is the first and most important test of whether Congress is willing to strengthen itself and its organization to carry the tremendous work load that present-day governmental problems place upon it.

About 90 percent of all the work of the Congress on legislative matters is carried on in these committees. Most bills recommended by congressional committees become laws of the land and the content of legislation finally passed is largely determined in the committees.

We feel that there is nothing sacrosanct in the present arrangement of our committees. A study of the committee system of both Houses reveals that since the First Congress the committees have undergone many realignments and changes as conditions demanded.

As "the workshop of Congress" the committee structure, more than any other arm of the legislative branch, needs frequent modernization to bring its efficiency up to the requirements of the day.

However, because of obvious difficulties attendant upon the reduction of standing committees, Congress for many years past has neglected to survey its over-all needs for a more effective system. New committees have been established to do particular jobs, but little attention has been paid to realignment of committees and their jurisdictions on an over-all basis.

Congress can no longer afford the luxury and waste of manpower and time in maintaining a total of 33 standing committees of the Senate and 48 standing committees of the House. We recognize the difficulties inherent in simplifying this old system of 81 standing committees. We realize that loyalties to these present committees, certain perquisites of membership upon them, established seniority rights, and a desire to maintain these traditional rights make reorganization of our committee structure the No. 1 problem to be faced in any attempt to modernize and strengthen the Congress.

Only by untangling the existing overlapping jurisdictional lines and merging standing committees which today have almost concurrent jurisdiction can present-day legislation be adequately handled. We have attempted in the following recommendation to merge closely related committees into one where their jurisdictions overlap or where they deal with similar subjects.

By limiting Members of Congress to service on a few committees, they can become more familiar with their committee work. By consolidating many minor committees, a system of major committees for both houses will be created and members will have time properly to weigh and consider legislative matters referred to these consolidated committees. Many Members of the Senate now serve on as many as 10, 9, 8, and 7 special and standing committees, while some House Members serve on as many as 6 or more. By reducing this scattered work load through reorganization, Members will be relieved of many unrelated lines of legislation on their present hodgepodge of committee assignments in exchange for positions on one or two committees of greater responsibility and related legislative subject matter.

1. Reorganization of Senate Committees

Recommendation: That the 33 standing committees of the Senate be reorganized into 16, substantially as proposed by Senator La Follette.

Your committee, after studying many proposals for committee consolidation, believes that the recommendation for consolidating the 33 standing Senate committees into 16, based on Senator La Follette's proposal, offers the best chance for improving the committee structure of the upper House.

Under this plan, each Senator would be limited to membership on two standing committees. By permitting concentration on two major committee activities, much of the present waste of time and scattered attention would be avoided. Each committee would have work of sufficient importance to justify specialization in its particular lines of activity. Each standing committee should have power to act jointly with the corresponding committee of the House of Representatives.

Therefore, your committee recommends consolidation of existing Senate standing committees as follows:

Existing committees	Reorganized committees

2. Reorganization of House Committees

Recommendation: That the 48 standing committees of the House be reorganized into 18, substantially as proposed by Representative Wadsworth.

After considering many committee consolidation proposals made for the House, your committee believes that the proposal made by Representative Wadsworth offers, with one or two minor changes, the most practical and feasible arrangement. It would limit each of the Members of the House to one major committee assignment, and would regroup, and redistribute the work-load so as to justify giving each reorganized committee the status of a major committee.

This regrouping would further permit an average membership of 23 on all major standing committees of the House, keeping the important Appropriations Committee at its present size of 43 members.

Your committee therefore recommends consolidating the existing committees of the House of Representatives as follows:

Existing committees	Reorganized committees
Agriculture	Agriculture.
Appropriations	Appropriations.
Expenditures in the Executive Departments	Expenditures in the Executive Departments.
Banking and Currency	Banking and Currency.

3. Jurisdiction of Committees

Recommendation: That House and Senate Rules be amended to define clearly the jurisdiction of each reorganized committee so as to avoid overlapping and duplication and conflicts of jurisdiction.

Reorganization of the committees as recommended above will require a revision of the rules of the two Houses so as clearly to define the jurisdiction of the new standing committees. It is recommended that as this is done, the jurisdiction of each reorganized committee be clearly defined so that overlapping and duplication will be eliminated. The definitions should enumerate the activities covered and describe their scope in terms of subject matter of legislation as well as the administrative organization of the Federal Government so that disputes over jurisdiction will be minimized or eliminated.

The major objective or predominant character of a bill, in the opinion of the presiding officers of the Senate and the House, should be controlling in determining the reference of bills to committees. We recommend the exercise of more care in the reference of Senate bills. A bill should be referred without regard to the author's service on any particular committee seeking jurisdiction when its subject matter does not normally lie in the defined province of that committee.

In redefining the jurisdiction of committees, great care should be taken clearly to resolve existing conflicts by specifying which committee shall have jurisdiction.

4. Legislative Oversight by Standing Committees

Recommendation: That the standing committees of both Houses be directed and empowered to carry on continuing review and oversight of legislation and agencies within their jurisdiction; that the power of subpoena be given them; and that the practice of creating special investigating committees be abandoned.

One of the most difficult problems studied by your committee was that of improving the relationship between Congress and the executive departments of Government. This was ordered in the joint resolution under which we have been operating and appears to your committee to be one of the important phases of our study.

While the Constitution directed the separation of powers between the executive and legislative branches, it did not intend them to go separate ways and in opposite directions. Each year the gulf between Capital Hill and the departments widens. And without effective legislative oversight of the activities of the vast executive branch, the line of democracy wears thin. Only 1 man out of the 3,000,000 Federal employees is elected by and is responsible directly to the people.

Composed of the directly elected representatives of the people, Congress needs to improve its lines of communication, its relationships, its understanding of the departments. At present there is no regular machinery of cooperation between them, aside from inadequate informal conversations or correspondence or a full-dress investigation, by which the common problems of governmental policy can be surveyed.

Vast powers are often necessarily delegated to governmental agencies. Sometimes the laws are not clear or specific and sometimes a problem defies specific legal description and adequate limitation. A clear and continuing understanding of the objectives and methods of the departments should be achieved.

We feel that this oversight problem can be handled best by directing the regular standing committees of the Senate and House, which have such matters in their jurisdiction, to conduct a continuous review of the agencies administering laws originally reported by the committees. Frequent consultation with and reporting to the committees would greatly improve relationships between the executive and legislative branches.

Such review might well include a question period by the committee arranged with the help of a greatly improved committee staff. By this method an open channel of complaints of agency shortcomings or abuses of authority could be maintained so as to furnish all Members of Congress with a clearinghouse for bringing complaints to the attention of administrators through the proper legislative committees.

Directing the regular standing committees to carry on this supervisory function appeals to your committee as a better method than the appointment of numerous select investigating committees when situations have grown so difficult as to arouse public demand for correction or special study. We recommend that the practice of creating special committees of investigation be abandoned.

Each of the reorganized standing committees should be given the power of subpoena and should be authorized to undertake studies of matters within its jurisdiction either by full or subcommittee action. By directing its standing committees to perform this oversight function, Congress can help to overcome the unfortunate cleavage between the personnel of the legislative and the executive branches.

5. Committee Hearings and Records

Recommendation: That all committees set aside monthly docket days for the public hearing of Members who have bills pending before them; that committees set regular meeting days for the consideration of such business as the committee determines; that complete records of all committee proceedings (except executive sessions) be kept; that attendance records be kept; and that a record of the votes of all Members on bills and amendments when a record vote is demanded be printed in the Congressional Record.

Criticism of conditions that handicap the individual Member of Congress as well as committee members was voiced in our hearings. These include the frequent inability of a Member of Congress to obtain a hearing on legislation which he has introduced.

Hundreds of bills introduced by Members of Congress are never considered even for a brief period by the committees to which they are referred. In order to get a hearing by the committee having their legislation in charge, members must informally solicit committeemen for the privilege of even a brief cursory appearance. This tends to bottle up legislation originating in Congress itself, while the right-of-way is generally given to legislation originating in the executive departments.

To correct this sometimes arbitrary discrimination against the bills of Members of Congress and committeemen themselves, we propose that a regular period each month be set aside by the standing committees when Members who have introduced bills may appear and publicly explain them, outline their support, and ask the full committee to decide whether extended hearings shall be held.

In order further to facilitate self-rule by the committees, it is recommended that each standing committee fix regular weekly, bi-weekly, or monthly meeting days when the committee will be in session at stated hours for the transaction of any business that committee members themselves may determine. Extra meetings in addition to the regularly stated sessions would be called by the chairman.

All committees should be required to keep a complete record of all committee proceedings, except executive sessions. Such records would include the attendance of Members at committee sessions and the votes of all members of the committee on bills and amendments on which a record vote is demanded. Such record votes should be printed in the Congressional Record.

6. Reporting of Bills

Recommendation: That committee chairmen be required to report promptly all bills approved by the committee and seek a rule to bring them to the floor for consideration.

In order to insure the carrying out of the will of the standing committees having jurisdiction of legislation, some change in the rules governing the reorganized committees is necessary.

We consider that each committee is a creature of the Congress and will have coequal standing with the other committees under the recommended reorganization plan. Each chairman, even though he is the executive of the committee, should be bound by the decisions of its members as expressed in regular committee session. The withholding of legislation from the floor, through failure to report it to the Chamber or failure to obtain a rule making it in order for consideration by the Chamber, is not consistent with the authority and rights of the committee as expressed by its action and status.

We therefore recommend that, in the revision of the rules governing the reorganized committees, a chairman be required to report promptly to the Chamber any bill approved by his committee and to take such steps as will give the Chamber a chance to vote on it. But no committee should report out a bill unless a majority of the committee members actually are present and vote in favor of a report.

7. Limitation of Conference Reports

Recommendation: That conferees of the two Houses be limited to adjustment only of actual differences in fact between the two Houses and that matters on which both Houses are in agreement be not subject to change in conference.

Considerable testimony regarding the introduction by conferees of new material into conference reports, and the elimination or substantial change of legislation agreed to by both Houses, was presented during our committee's hearings. While the standing rules are clear regarding the limitation of conferees to the disagreements between the two Houses, parliamentary procedures makes it possible for conferees completely to rewrite legislation substantially agreed upon in both Chambers.

This is done by one House striking everything after the enacting clause, substituting one over-all amendment, and thus technically placing everything in the bill in disagreement and therefore making it subject to complete revision by the conferees. This is clearly not the intent of the rule on conferences.

Therefore, your committee recommends that rules governing conferences be clarified and enforced so as to permit consideration only of sections or parts of a bill on which the Houses have, in fact, disagreed and to forbid conferees to change those parts of legislation agreed to by both Houses.

8. Digest of Bills in Reports

Recommendation: That a complete and understandable digest of a bill, together with legislative changes made by the bill, written in nontechnical language, accompany the committee report on each bill; and that this digest include a supporting statement of reasons for its passage, of the national interest involved, its cost, and the distribution of any benefits.

Complaint was received by the committee that much of the legislation now considered by Congress is so complex as to render difficult a complete understanding of its subject matter. Not only Members of Congress, but the press, the radio, and the interested public are entitled to clear and concise explanations of legislation being considered by Congress. A clear outline of proposed legislation should be incorporated in the committee report accompanying a bill in nontechnical digest form. The report should also include supporting arguments for the passage of the bill as determined by the committee and a statement of the national interest involved in its passage. The report should also include estimates of the cost of carrying out the legislation and the distribution of the resulting burdens and benefits.

9. Expert Staffs for Committees

Recommendation: (1) That each reorganized legislative committee be authorized to employ four staff experts in its particular province; that employment be limited to persons qualifying under prescribed standards; that staff employees be not dismissed for political reasons; that staff employees serve on committee work only; and that all committee records and files be separately maintained by staff employees. (2) That present clerical personnel of committees be retained up to six per committee to serve as clerks and stenographers for the committee staff, two each to be available for committee-connected work in the offices of the chairman and ranking minority member.

The lack of skilled staffs for the committee work-shops of Congress was more complained of than perhaps any other matter before your committee. Such complaints came not only from Congress itself, but also were mentioned by almost every student of governmental affairs who appeared.

The shocking lack of adequate congressional fact-finding services and skilled staffs sometimes reaches such ridiculous proportions as to make Congress dependent upon "hand-outs" from Government departments and private groups or newspaper stories for its basis fund of information on which to base legislative decisions. Many comparisons could be drawn to illustrate the sad state of committee staffing and the lack of attention hitherto paid by Congress to this very important facility.

Your committee feels that, by considerably increasing the number and greatly improving the technical competence of committee staffs, Congress can make a great contribution to sound legislative decisions on matters involving the security and future welfare of the Nation. Just as the committee system is the most important arm of the National Legislature, so the committee staff and its competence will substantially determine the strength of this arm.

Aside from the appropriation committees (which will be considered below), we feel that each of the reorganized committees should be given at least four highly skilled professional staff members in addition to their present clerical staffs.

The four professional staff members should be paid salaries ranging between $6,000 and $8,000 a year, large enough to command a high level of technical skill, and appointment to these positions should be so restricted that only persons with adequate experience and understanding of the committee's work can qualify.

We recommend that such personnel be eligible for appointment solely on merit and have qualifications to be determined by the director of congressional personnel (proposed later in this report). They should be appointed without regard to political affiliation and only persons whose qualifications are approved by the director of congressional personnel should be eligible for appointment by the committee. The staff members would be considered permanent employees of the Congress and should not be dismissed for political reasons.

Your committee realizes the difficulty in presenting a blueprint of the specific positions on each of the reorganized committees. Some committees will need two skilled attorneys and two economists; others will require a different division of skill and training. We feel that that is a matter of committee policy that must be made to fit the individual needs of the committees. The success of the addition of staff personnel will be determined by the planning of the job to be done by each staff member, and by the qualifications of the men chosen.

We further recommend that present clerical and stenographic personnel attached to the standing committees be retained for each reorganized committee up to a maximum of six clerks, but that the position of committee janitor be abolished. Two of these clerks, or others to be employed, should be attached to the office of the chairman, two to the ranking minority member, and two to the professional staff. They will be available to handle the committee correspondence and stenographic work, both for the committee staff and for the chairman and ranking minority member on matters related to committee work. It is suggested that the clerical staffs of committees be paid salaries ranging between $2,000 and $6,000 a year.

Professional staff members, as distinguished from clerical and stenographic personnel, should work only on matters of strictly committee business and the assignment to them of other congressional office duties should not be permitted.

All committee records, data, charts, and files should be kept distinct and separate from the congressional office records of the member serving as chairman of the committee. Committee records should be the property of the Congress and continuing access to them should be given to all members of the committee and Congress.

In addition to the staff employees authorized, committees at any time should be able to draw on the Legislative Reference Service for additional skilled assistance for limited periods of time when committee work is heavy. It is contemplated that skilled personnel will be employed by the Reference Service in order to provide for these part-time aides to assist the standing committees. (A later section of this report deals with the improved staffing of the Legislative Reference Service.)

No committee should be allowed to borrow personnel or experts from executive agencies without the express permission of the Committee on Administration. We feel that the current custom of borrowing personnel is neither economically sound nor politically wise. Whatever staff Congress needs should be employed by Congress itself with qualifications meeting our specifications and they should work for Congress alone. We do not see the sense of appropriating money to Government agencies and asking them to hire the personnel we need.

Once the standing committees have been reorganized and expertly staffed, it will be possible to plan and conduct committee hearings more efficiently. At present hearings are often held with little advance preparation and are largely occupied by the reading of prepared statements by the witnesses. This procedure consumes precious committee time and leaves little for questions and answers. We suggest that the practice be adopted of requiring all witnesses before congressional committees to file statements of their testimony in advance and to limit their oral presentations to brief summaries of their main points. Part of the job of the expert committee staff would be to prepare digests of these statements in advance of the hearing and to brief the committeemen on the questions to be asked each witness. In this way the tedious oral repetition of written testimony could be avoided, much valuable time would be saved, and the conduct of committee hearings could be greatly expedited. Moreover, the record as presented to Congress, the press, and the public would be greatly improved.

10. Expansion of Legislative Counsel

Recommendation: That present appropriations to the Office of Legislative Counsel be expanded from $90,000 per year to $150,000 per year for the next 2 years; with further expansion later.

Testimony generally agreed that the work done by the Office of Legislative Counsel, within its present limitations, is very valuable and constructive. So successful has this work been in furnishing expert legal talent to the standing committees and to the conferees that many Members have asked for its expansion so as to make these bill-drafting services available to all the committees and Members of Congress. At present only 12 attorneys and law clerks compose the combined staff of the office at a total annual cost of $90,000.

Much of the testimony heard by your committee dealt with the origins of legislation. It is well known that the formulation of legislation is no longer exclusively a congressional concern. For most bills introduced Members are merely conduits for the executive departments, private organizations, and individual constituents. More than half of the bills dropped into the "hopper" originate in the Federal departments and bureaus and are later revised in committee to accord with congressional views. Executive initiative in law making finds its fundamental warrant in the constitutional provision that the President—

“shall from time to time give to the Congress information on the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.”

Although comparatively little legislation originates in Congress today, that body is still responsible for sifting, testing, and debating all legislative proposals wherever they come from and for determining the final shape of public policy. Congress must decide what bills are to be considered and approved and what the legislative policies of the Nation are to be. The executive branch formulates and executes. The legislature determines policy and evaluates its performance. We feel that Congress should play a larger part in preparing legislation and determining national policy, and that it should place less reliance on bills drafted by interested departments and other groups seeking legislation.

By the progressive expansion of the Office of Legislative Counsel this will become possible. Skilled bill draftsmen, understanding legislative methods and procedures, can add much to clarity of expression, standardization of form and style, and proper construction of proposed legislation. We recommend that for the next 2 years the appropriation to this Office should be increased to $150,000 and that provision be made for further expansion for the 2 years following. Part of this increase could well be used to expedite the revision and codification of the permanent statutes as recommended by many Federal judges and bar associations.

II. MAJORITY AND MINORITY POLICY COMMITTEES

Strong recommendations were made to your committee concerning the need for the formal expression within the Congress of the main policies of the majority and minority parties. These representations called for some mechanism which could bring about more party accountability for policies and pledges announced and made in the national platforms of the major political parties.

These recommendations were based on the theory that in a democracy national problems must be handled on a national basis. Only through the expression of the will of the people by their support of political parties on the basis of their platform pledges can the majority will be determined. Likewise the minority viewpoint is also expressed in support of the minority platform.

No one would claim that representative democracy as we know it today could exist without majority and minority parties. The 435 voices of the House and the 96 of the Senate would be a confused babel of conflicting tongues without party machinery. Instead of unorganized mob rule where the strength of varying viewpoints cannot be measured or determined, party government furnishes a tug-of-war in which the direction and strength of opposing viewpoints can be more or less accurately measured and weighed.

Under the American party system there are always two main groups, each checking the other and offering the choice of alternative courses of action. Around these two groups Congressmen can rally and express themselves, helping in party caucuses to determine the policy for their group.

Your committee recognizes the need for freedom of action on the part of the individual Member of Congress and his right to vote at any time against the announced policy of his party. But we feel that if party accountability for policies and pledges is to be achieved, stronger and more formal mechanisms are necessary. The present steering committees, an informal and little-used device, seldom meet and never steer.

We recommend that these be replaced with the formal establishment in the House and the Senate of majority and minority policy committees. The majority policy committees of the two Houses would meet jointly at frequent intervals, as would those of the minority, to formulate the over-all legislative policy of the two parties. The majority policy committee of each House would also hold frequent meetings to consider its role in expediting consideration and passage of matters pledged to the people by their party.

On issues where party policy is involved the decisions of these policy committees would be formally announced in the proceedings of Congress and formal records would be kept of such decisions. No member of either party would be required to follow such announced party policy except as he chose to do so. Each member would be free to vote as he saw fit, but the record of his action would be available to the public as a means of holding both the party and the individual accountable.

1. Creation of Policy Committees

Recommendation: That both the House and the Senate establish formal committees for the determination and expression of majority policy and minority policy. Each of these four committees would be composed of seven members appointed in its entirety at the opening of each new Congress. The majority and minority policy committees in both Houses would be appointed by their respective majority and minority conferences.

We feel that, in the establishment of such policy committees, the Congress chosen at the last general election should be controlling and that the policy-committee membership should therefore be chosen at the beginning of each new Congress. Membership on all policy committees would automatically expire at the close of each Congress.

2. Joint Legislative-Executive Council

Recommendation: That the majority policy committees of the Senate and House serve as a formal council to meet regularly with the Executive, to facilitate the formulation and carrying out of national policy, and to improve relationships between the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

In order to narrow the widening gap between the executive and the legislative branches, we recommend that the Senate and House majority policy committees serve also on a formal council to meet at regular intervals with the Executive and with such members of his Cabinet as may be desirable, to consult and collaborate in the formulation and carrying out of national policy and to improve relationships between the two branches of the Government.

Improved understanding of each other's problems will be promoted by consultation before legislation is introduced to carry out pledged party promises and on matters of high administration policy. By giving congressional leaders a part in the formulation of policy, instead of calling upon them to enact programs prepared without their participation, better cooperation can be obtained.

It would also be desirable, we think, to include the minority policy committee from time to time in these joint conferences on broad questions of foreign and domestic policy as a further means of promoting mutual understanding and harmony between the legislature and the Executive.

The Legislative-Executive Council also would enable Congress to approach more directly the solution of difficulties and complaints resulting from administrative action. Formalizing the relationships between these two great branches of the Government, we believe, will improve and strengthen the performance of each.

3. Staffing of Policy Committees

Recommendation: That the majority and minority policy committees of each House receive $30,000 per year each for the maintenance of a high-grade secretariat to assist in study, analysis, and research on problems involved in policy determination.

With the formal recognition of the policy committees and of their part in formulating majority and minority policy, adequate staffs should be provided by the Congress for their use.

Careful study and research will be needed in order to arrive at sound decisions. To strengthen party machinery without giving it the tools to aid in policy making would be an idle gesture. The better equipped each party is adequately to survey the issues before making its decisions, the better these decisions will be.

Therefore, your committee recommends that the majority and minority policy committees of each House receive $30,000 per year each for the maintenance of their secretariats. Freedom of choice should be given the policy committees to select their own staffs, but no salary should be paid to any policy committee employee, we think, in excess of $8,000 per year.

* * * * * * *

In addition to the matters discussed above, the joint committee heard testimony from Members of Congress and others in support of, and in opposition to, other changes in the organization and operation of Congress. The more noteworthy of these suggestions pertained to—

1. Selection of committee chairmen by some method other than seniority.
2. The powers of the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives.
3. Experimentation with periods for questioning executive-department heads.
4. Limitation of debate in the Senate.

These proposals relate to problems that have long perplexed observers of the legislative process. In each case there is much to be said on both sides. The third and fourth topics listed above, however, deal with aspects of floor procedure upon which we are not at liberty to make any recommendations under the terms of House Concurrent Resolution 18.

On the seniority system and the powers of the House Rules Committee, we heard testimony and deliberated in executive session. But we are not now prepared to submit positive recommendations with regard to them because of a lack of agreement within the committee as to workable changes in existing practices.

Representations were also made to your committee in support of broadcasting the proceedings of the Houses and committees of Congress. We investigated the technical feasibility and cost of this proposal, but make no recommendation with regard to it, owing to differences of opinion within the committee as to its desirability.

CHARLES W. SHULL, THE LEGISLATIVE REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1946

20 Temple L.Q. 375, 379-381 (1947).

Passed in the closing days of the Seventy-Ninth Congress, the so-called Congressional Reorganization Act came into a somewhat belated being. Signed by President Truman on August 2, 1946 the measure became law to be operative upon the convening of the Eightieth Congress on January 3, 1947. A number of subjects, loosely related to legislative procedure, are conjoined within the one statute, giving it the appearance of an omnibus measure. All of the proposed changes in congressional procedure have been urged, jointly and severally, for a number of years, and the Legislative Reorganization Act¹ comes as the first step towards the fruition of these suggestions—some of which have become gray with age. . . .

First of all, the number of standing Committees in the Senate is reduced to fifteen. These are defined in the statute as the committees on Agriculture and Forestry, Appropriations, Armed Services, Banking, Civil Service and Currency, District of Columbia, Expenditures in the Executive Departments, Finance, Foreign Relations, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Judiciary, Labor and Public Welfare, Public Lands, Public Works, and Rules. With the sole exception of the Appropriations Committee, which is allowed twenty-one members, all of the remaining bodies are given a fixed membership of thirteen. There are then 203 committee assignments possible under the new provisions of the Reorganization Act. Each Senator may serve on two standing committees and no more; except that Senators of the majority party who are members of the Committee on the District of Columbia and of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments may serve on three standing committees and no more.

In the House of Representatives there also occurs a severe revision of the committee system. The forty-eight House committees on Agriculture, Appropriations, Armed Services, Banking and Currency, Post Office and Civil Service, District of Columbia, Education and Labor, Expenditures in the Executive Departments, Foreign Affairs, House Administration, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Judiciary, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Public Lands, Public Works, Rules, Un-American Activities, Veterans' Affairs, and Ways and Means. Nine members comprise the Committee on Un-American Activities; twelve compose the Rules Committee. Nine Committees, Post Office and Civil Service, District of Columbia, Education and Labor, Expenditures in the Executive Departments, Foreign Affairs, House Administration, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Public Lands, and Ways and Means, have twenty-five members each. The Committees on Agriculture, Banking and Currency, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Judiciary, Public Works, and Veterans' Affairs will have a membership of twenty-seven. Armed Services as a committee consists of thirty-three members, and the Appropriations Committee has forty-three. The grand total of committee seats under the new organization will be 484. Each member shall be elected to serve on one standing committee and no more with the following exceptions. Members of the District of Columbia Committee or of the Un-American Activities Committee may be selected to serve on two standing committees, while members of the majority party on the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments or House Administration Committee are also limited to two posts.

The jurisdiction of each of these newer House and Senate Committees is carefully defined in the body of the statute with a view of eliminating the conflicts and overlappings which have marred the orderly process of congressional legislation. As far as it was possible, previous allocations of the fields of specialization of the individual committees were preserved. Much of the chance for confusion of effort and controversy within the congressional committee system was eliminated by the device of the statutory definition of the field of endeavor and jurisdictional scope of each such body. Senate provisions mention the appointment of committees; the word election appears in those which have to do with the choice of the personnel of these bodies in the House. Presumably there will be no great change in the methods by which committees are actually chosen within each chamber, at the present time.

At the commencement of each Congress, says the statute, the House shall elect a chairman of each standing committee; temporary vacancies are to be filled according to seniority and rank within the group, but any permanent vacancy reverts to election by the whole House of Representatives.

Aside from the reduction in the number and volume of committees and committee positions, the effect of the statute upon the procedure and modes of establishing committee personnel will be scant. Seniority and specializations will still have to be considered in determining the personnel of the committees within each branch. Some members—for instance Senators O'Mahoney and Lucas—will have to descend from their lofty pinnacle of an impossible number of committee assignments.

Many individual critics of the measure will be disappointed that the reorganization of the committee system was not more thorough. Perhaps they are right, but a good half loaf is often better than a painful of mouldy loaves. Should there be an installation of this newer system, some difficulties, some dilemmas, some defects and demerits of congressional committee procedure and organization will certainly vanish and disappear.

LEGISLATIVE REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1946

Chapter 753, Public Law 601, Laws of 79th Congress, 2nd Session.

TITLE I—CHANGES IN RULES OF SENATE AND HOUSE

RULE-MAKING POWER OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE

Sec. 101. The following sections of this title are enacted by the Congress:

(a) As an exercise of the rule-making power of the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectively, and as such they shall be considered as part of the rules of each House, respectively, or of that House to which they specifically apply; and such rules shall supersede other rules only to the extent that they are inconsistent therewith; and

(b) With full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules (so far as relating to the procedure in such House) at any time, in the same manner and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.

PART 3—PROVISIONS APPLICABLE TO BOTH HOUSES

PRIVATE BILLS BANNED

Sec. 131. No private bill or resolution (including so-called omnibus claims or pension bills), and no amendment to any bill or resolution, authorizing or directing (1) the payment of money for property damages, for personal injuries or death for which suit may be instituted under the Federal Tort Claims Act, or for a pension (other than to carry out a provision of law or treaty stipulation); (2) the construction of a bridge across a navigable stream; or (3) the correction of a military or naval record, shall be received or considered in either the Senate or the House of Representatives.

CONGRESSIONAL ADJOURNMENT

Sec. 132. Except in time of war or during a national emergency proclaimed by the President, the two Houses shall adjourn sine die not later than the last day (Sundays excepted) in the month of July in each year unless otherwise provided by the Congress.

COMMITTEE PROCEDURE

Sec. 133. (a) Each standing committee of the Senate and the House of Representatives (except the Committees on Appropriations) shall fix regular weekly, biweekly, or monthly meeting days for the transaction of business before the committee, and additional meetings may be called by the chairman as he may deem necessary.

(b) Each such committee shall keep a complete record of all committee action. Such record shall include a record of the votes on any question on which a record vote is demanded.

(c) It shall be the duty of the chairman of each such committee to report or cause to be reported promptly to the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be, any measure approved by his committee and to take or cause to be taken necessary steps to bring the matter to a vote.

(d) No measure or recommendation shall be reported from any such committee unless a majority of the committee were actually present.

(e) Each such standing committee shall, so far as practicable, require all witnesses appearing before it to file in advance written statements of their proposed testimony, and to limit their oral presentations to brief summaries of their argument. The staff of each committee shall prepare digests of such statements for the use of committee members.

(f) All hearings conducted by standing committees or their subcommittees shall be open to the public, except executive sessions for marking up bills or for voting or where the committee by a majority vote orders an executive session.

COMMITTEE POWERS

Sec. 134. (a) Each standing committee of the senate, including any subcommittee of any such committee, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate, to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to take such testimony and to make such expenditures (not in excess of $10,000 for each committee during any Congress) as it deems advisable. Each such committee may make investigations into any matter within its jurisdiction, may report such hearings as may be had by it, and may employ stenographic assistance at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

(b) Every committee and subcommittee serving the Senate and House of Representatives shall report the name, profession and total salary of each staff member employed by it, and shall make an accounting of funds appropriated to it and expended by it to the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, as the case may be, at least once every six months, and such information shall be published periodically in the Congressional Directory when and as the same is issued and as Senate and House documents, respectively, every three months.

(c) No standing committee of the Senate or the House, except the Committee on Rules of the House, shall sit, without special leave, while the Senate or the House, as the case may be, is in session.

CONFERENCE RULES ON AMENDMENTS IN NATURE OF SUBSTITUTE

Sec. 135. (a) In any case in which a disagreement to an amendment in the nature of a substitute has been referred to conferees, it shall be in order for the conferees to report a substitute on the same subject matter; but they may not include in the report matter not committed to them by either House. They may, however, include in their report in any such case matter which is a germane modification of subjects in disagreement.

(b) In any case in which the conferees violate subsection (a), the conference report shall be subject to a point of order.

LEGISLATIVE OVERSIGHT BY STANDING COMMITTEES

Sec. 136. To assist the Congress in appraising the administration of the laws and in developing such amendments or related legislation as it may deem necessary, each standing committee of the Senate and the House of Representatives shall exercise continuous watchfulness of the execution by the administrative agencies concerned of any laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of such committee; and, for that purpose, shall study all pertinent reports and data submitted to the Congress by the agencies in the executive branch of the Government.

DECISIONS ON QUESTIONS OF COMMITTEE JURISDICTION

Sec. 137. In any case in which a controversy arises as to the jurisdiction of any standing committee of the Senate with respect to any proposed legislation, the question of jurisdiction shall be decided by the presiding officer of the Senate, without debate, in favor of that committee which has jurisdiction over the subject matter which predominates in such proposed legislation; but such decision shall be subject to an appeal. . . .

PRESERVATION OF COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Sec. 141. The Librarian of the Library of Congress is authorized and directed to have bound at the end of each session of Congress the printed hearings of testimony taken by each committee of the Congress at the preceding session.

REMODELED CONGRESS AT WORK

Reprinted from the United States News, Vol. 22, pp. 42-43 (1947).*

From committees to subcommittees. Streamlining trimmed off about three fifths of the old committees and gave the rest broader fields of jurisdiction, more power and better-paid staffs. Each committee was expected to do whatever investigating was needed in its own field.

But the streamlining left 47 Senators and Representatives who otherwise would have been committee chairmen without any committees to head. The first breaks in the reorganization plan came with the creation of special investigation committees: for national defense and small business in the Senate; for supply of newsprint and small business in the House.

After the committees were organized, the dam broke. The new committees were large, and dealt with many subjects. And there were about 40 chairless would-be chairmen. The committees broke into huddles of subcommittees. In the House, some committees have 10 or 12 subcommittees. Members who used to go from one committee meeting to another now go from one subcommittee meeting to another.

This new technique in some cases is tending to add another layer of red tape to congressional procedure. Under the old system, the committee that prepared a bill brought the measure to the floor, directly. Now the first group to handle a bill usually is a subcommittee, and the product has to be approved by the full committee before going to the floor.

If the chairman insists upon a meticulous study by the full committee before approval, the work of the subcommittee is gone over from end to end, amounting to a double job.

WALTER P. ARMSTRONG, SPECIFIC STEPS FOR IMPROVING LEGISLATION

(A review of Kefauver and Levin, "A Twentieth Century Congress")
33 A.B.A.Jour. 674, 675-676 (1947).

. . . This study was published some four months after the effective date of the LaFollette-Monroney Act and takes into account the limited experience under that statute. While appreciating the progress made under this Act, the authors point out that the Resolution creating the Joint Committee tied its hands by forbidding consideration of "certain basic matters that go to the heart of any thorough repairing of ancient Congressional machinery. Equally important, due to the wide divergencies of viewpoint existing among the members of the Joint Committee, only a part of the worthwhile suggestions that were made found a way into their Report to Congress. Finally, even the recommendations of this diluted Report were whittled down drastically by the political compromises that were essential if any reorganization bill was to pass at all. Consequently, the real job still remains." . . . It was by reducing and paralleling the committees of the House and Senate that the proponents of the Reorganization Act hoped to accomplish the greatest reform. There has been improvement but the goal is far from attained either in theory or practice. It was a major accomplishment of the Reorganization Act to reduce Senate committees from thirty-three to fifteen and House committees from forty-eight to nineteen. Moreover, some of the Senate and House Committees are matched so as to have identical functions. Mr. Kefauver and Dr. Levin endorse the proposal of Dr. George B. Galloway⁶ for thirteen committees in each House, with identic functions. They do not suggest, however, how the evil of sub-committees⁷ and special committees is to be eliminated. Riders to appropriation bills are prohibited by the Reorganization Act; they should not be permitted to be attached to any bill.

The Act provides that the House taxing and spending committees shall meet jointly at the beginning of each session and prepare a legislative budget fixing the maximum amount to be appropriated. "But these well-intentioned provisions are of little value because there are no means of enforcing them. The only effective way that receipts and expenditures can be balanced is to vest the money-raising and spending powers in . . . one Committee . . ."

C. Methods and Powers of Investigation

NEBBIA v. PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Supreme Court of the United States, 1933.

ROBERTS, J. The Legislature of New York established, by Chapter 158 of the Laws of 1933, a Milk Control Board with power, among other things, to "fix minimum and maximum . . . retail prices to be charged by . . . stores to consumers for consumption off the premises where sold." The Board fixed nine cents as the price to be charged by a store for a quart of milk. Nebbia, the proprietor of a grocery store in Rochester, sold two quarts and a five cent loaf of bread for eighteen cents; and was convicted for violating the Board's order. At his trial he asserted the statute and order contravene the equal protection clause and the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and renewed the contention in successive appeals to the county court and the Court of Appeals. Both overruled his claim and affirmed the conviction.

The question for decision is whether the Federal Constitution prohibits a state from so fixing the selling price of milk. We first inquire as to the occasion for the legislation and its history.

During 1932 the prices received by farmers for milk were much below the cost of production. The decline in prices during 1931 and 1932 was much greater than that of prices generally. The situation of the families of dairy producers had become desperate and called for state aid similar to that afforded the unemployed, if conditions should not improve.

On March 10, 1932, the senate and assembly resolved "That a joint Legislative committee is hereby created . . . to investigate the causes of the decline of the price of milk to producers and the resultant effect of the low prices upon the dairy industry and the future supply of milk to the cities of the States; to investigate the cost of distribution of milk and its relation to prices paid to milk producers, to the end that the consumer may be assured of an adequate supply of milk at a reasonable price both to producer and consumer." The committee organized May 6, 1932, and its activities lasted nearly a year. It held 13 public hearings at which 254 witnesses testified and 2350 typewritten pages of testimony were taken. Numerous exhibits were submitted. Under its direction an extensive research program was prosecuted by experts and official bodies and employees of the state and municipalities, which resulted in the assembling of much pertinent information. Detailed reports were received from over 100 distributors of milk, and these were collated and the information obtained analyzed. As a result of the study of this material, a report covering 473 closely printed pages, embracing the conclusions and recommendations of the committee, was presented to the legislature April 10, 1933. This document included detailed findings with copious references to the supporting evidence; appendices outlining the nature and results of prior investigations of the milk industry of the state, briefs upon the legal questions involved, and forms of bills recommended for passage. The conscientious effort and thoroughness exhibited by the report lend weight to the committee's conclusions.

In part those conclusions are:

Milk is an essential item of diet. It cannot long be stored. It is an excellent medium for growth of bacteria. These facts necessitate safeguards in its production and handling for human consumption which greatly increase the cost of the business. Failure of producers to receive a reasonable return for their labor and investment over an extended period threaten a relaxation of vigilance against contamination.

The production and distribution of milk is a paramount industry of the state, and largely affects the health and prosperity of its people. Dairying yields fully one-half of the total income from all farm products. Dairy farm investment amounts to approximately $1,000,000,000. Curtailment or destruction of the dairy industry would cause a serious economic loss to the people of the state.

In addition to the general price decline, other causes for the low price of milk include: a periodic increase in the number of cows and in milk production; the prevalence of unfair and destructive trade practices in the distribution of milk, leading to a demoralization of prices in the metropolitan area and other markets; and the failure of transportation and distribution charges to be reduced in proportion to the reduction in retail prices for milk and cream.

The fluid milk industry is affected by factors of instability peculiar to itself which call for special methods of control. Under the best practicable adjustment of supply to demand the industry must carry a surplus of about 20 per cent., because milk, an essential food, must be available as demanded by consumers every day in the year, and demand and supply vary from day to day and according to the season; but milk is perishable and cannot be stored. Close adjustment of supply to demand is hindered by several factors difficult to control. Thus surplus milk presents a serious problem, as the prices which can be realized for it for other uses are much less than those obtainable for milk sold for consumption in fluid form or as cream. A satisfactory stabilization of prices for fluid milk requires that the burden of surplus milk be shared equally by all producers and all distributors in the milk-shed. So long as the surplus burden is unequally distributed the pressure to market surplus milk in fluid form will be a serious disturbing factor. The fact that the larger distributors find it necessary to carry large quantities of surplus milk, while the smaller distributors do not, leads to price-cutting and other forms of destructive competition. Smaller distributors, who take no responsibility for the surplus, by purchasing their milk at the blended prices (i. e., an average between the price paid the producer for milk for sale as fluid milk, and the lower surplus milk price paid by the larger organizations) can undersell the larger distributors. Indulgence in this price-cutting often compels the larger dealer to cut the price, to his own and the producer's detriment.

Various remedies were suggested, amongst them united action by producers, the fixing of minimum prices for milk and cream by state authority, and the imposition of certain graded taxes on milk dealers proportioned so as to equalize the cost of milk and cream to all dealers and so remove the cause of price-cutting.

The legislature adopted Chapter 158 as a method of correcting the evils, which the report of the committee showed could not be expected to right themselves through the ordinary play of the forces of supply and demand, owing to the peculiar and uncontrollable factors affecting the industry. The provisions of the statute are summarized in the margin.

Section 312(e), on which the prosecution in the present case is founded, provides: "After the board shall have fixed prices to be charged or paid for milk in any form . . . it shall be unlawful for a milk dealer to sell or buy or offer to sell or buy milk at any price less or more than such price . . . , and no method or device shall be lawful whereby milk is bought or sold . . . at a price less or more than such price . . . whether by any discount, or rebate, or free service, or advertising allowance, or a combined price for such milk together with another commodity or commodities, or service or services, which is less or more than the aggregate of the prices for the milk and the price or prices for such other commodity or commodities, or service or services, when sold or offered for sale separately or otherwise. . . ."

. . . The more serious question is whether, in the light of the conditions disclosed, the enforcement of section 312 (e) denied the appellant the due process secured to him by the Fourteenth Amendment.

. . . The milk industry in New York has been the subject of long-standing and drastic regulation in the public interest. The legislative investigation of 1932 was persuasive of the fact that for this and other reasons unrestricted competition aggravated existing evils, and the normal law of supply and demand was insufficient to correct maladjustments detrimental to the community. The inquiry disclosed destructive and demoralizing competitive conditions and unfair trade practices which resulted in retail price-cutting and reduced the income of the farmer below the cost of production. We do not understand the appellant to deny that in these circumstances the legislature might reasonably consider further regulation and control desirable for protection of the industry and the consuming public. That body believed conditions could be improved by preventing destructive price-cutting by stores which, due to the flood of surplus milk, were able to buy at much lower prices than the larger distributors and to sell without incurring the delivery costs of the latter. In the order of which complaint is made the Milk Control Board fixed a price of ten cents per quart for sales by a distributor to a consumer, and nine cents by a store to a consumer, thus recognizing the lower costs of the store, and endeavoring to establish a differential which would be just to both. In the light of the facts the order appears not to be unreasonable or arbitrary, or without relation to the purpose to prevent ruthless competition from destroying the wholesale price structure on which the farmer depends for his livelihood, and the community for an assured supply of milk. . . .

So far as the requirement of due process is concerned, and in the absence of other constitutional restriction, a state is free to adopt whatever economic policy may reasonably be deemed to promote public welfare, and to enforce that policy by legislation adapted to its purpose. The courts are without authority either to declare such policy, or, when it is declared by the legislature, to override it. If the laws passed are seen to have a reasonable relation to a proper legislative purpose, and are neither arbitrary nor discriminatory, the requirements of due process are satisfied, and judicial determination to that effect renders a court functus officio. "Whether the free operation of the normal laws of competition is a wise and wholesome rule for trade and commerce is an economic question which this court need not consider or determine." Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U.S. 197, 337-8, 24 S.Ct. 436, 48 L.Ed. 679. And it is equally clear that if the legislative policy be to curb unrestrained and harmful competition by measures which are not arbitrary or discriminatory it does not lie with the courts to determine that the rule is unwise. With the wisdom of the policy adopted, with the adequacy or practicability of the law enacted to forward it, the courts are both incompetent and unauthorized to deal. The course of decision in this court exhibits a firm adherence to these principles. Times without number we have said that the legislature is primarily the judge of the necessity of such an enactment, that every possible presumption is in favor of its validity, and that though the court may hold views inconsistent with the wisdom of the law, it may not be annulled unless palpably in excess of legislative power.

The law-making bodies have in the past endeavored to promote free competition by laws aimed at trusts and monopolies. The consequent interference with private property and freedom of contract has not availed with the courts to set these enactments aside as denying due process. Where the public interest was deemed to require the fixing of minimum prices, that expedient has been sustained. If the law-making body within its sphere of government concludes that the conditions or practices in an industry make unrestricted competition an inadequate safeguard of the consumer's interests, produce waste harmful to the public, threaten ultimately to cut off the supply of a commodity needed by the public, or portend the destruction of the industry itself, appropriate statutes passed in an honest effort to correct the threatened consequences may not be set aside because the regulation adopted fixes prices reasonably deemed by the legislature to be fair to those engaged in the industry and to the consuming public. And this is especially so where, as here, the economic maladjustment is one of price, which threatens harm to the producer at one end of the series and the consumer at the other. The Constitution does not secure to anyone liberty to conduct his business in such fashion as to inflict injury upon the public at large, or upon any substantial group of the people. Price control, like any other form of regulation, is unconstitutional only if arbitrary, discriminatory, or demonstrably irrelevant to the policy the legislature is free to adopt, and hence an unnecessary and unwarranted interference with individual liberty.

Tested by these considerations we find no basis in the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment for condemning the provisions of the Agriculture and Markets Law here drawn into question.

The judgment is Affirmed.

EXCERPT FROM BRIEF FOR APPELLEE IN NEBBIA v. PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

LEGISLATIVE FINDINGS OF FACT

This 1933 statute received a great deal of attention from the Legislature during the eight weeks it was pending and before that the entire matter had been carefully investigated and considered by a special legislative committee. This committee, which became known as the Pitcher Committee from the name of its chairman, acted under a joint resolution of March 10, 1932, which instructed it:

“ . . . to investigate the causes of the decline of the price of milk to producers and the resultant effect of the low prices upon the dairy industry and the future supply of milk to the cities of the State . . . ” (Report, 9).

The Report, copies of which will be submitted to the Court, vouches for the intelligence, thoroughness and sincerity with which the Committee conducted its investigation. A preliminary report, consisting of the “Conclusions and Recommendations” (see Report, 13-23) and some other material, was filed February 13, 1933, and printed as N. Y. Legis.Doc. No. 59 of 1933. The final report in mimeographed form was available somewhat later, and is now in print consisting of 473 pages. It is probably the most thorough and best organized report ever presented of the actual functioning of a great milk market. The following findings are main headings among its Conclusions and Recommendations:

“1. The production and distribution of milk in this state as a paramount industry and affects in a large measure the health and prosperity of the people of the state. It is the duty of the state to take such measures as are necessary and reasonable to preserve this vital industry.”

“2. The financial situation of dairy farmers in the state is desperate and has grown increasingly critical during the period of the Committee's investigation.”

“3. The principal causes of the extremely low prices paid to producers for milk are: The unprecedented decline in the general level of prices; a periodic increase in the number of cows and in milk production; the prevalence of unfair and destructive trade practices in the distribution of milk leading to a demoralization of prices in the metropolitan area and other markets and the failure of charges for transportation and distribution to be reduced in proportion to the reduction in retail prices of milk and cream.”

“4. The fluid milk industry is affected by factors of instability peculiar to itself which call for special methods of control.”

“5. Among the remedies which might be applied to mitigate the evil of price-cutting are: Universal application of the classified price plan with uniform prices to all milk dealers for milk utilized in each classification; the fixing of minimum prices to be charged by milk dealers for milk and cream sold to consumers and other customers;

the imposition of a graduated tax to be paid by milk dealers on their sales of milk and cream in excess of the normal or average proportion of the milk supply of the entire milk shed which is sold by the dealers in fluid form."

"6. Universal application of the classified price plan and control of surplus milk by the producers through effective cooperative organization appears to offer the best prospect for permanent stabilization of the dairy industry in the New York milk shed."

"7. As an emergency measure, a temporary milk control board should be created, with broad powers to regulate and stabilize the milk industry as well as may be done under the circumstances. This board should also foster and promote the more complete organization of the producers as outlined above."

Each one of those seven conclusions is supported by subheadings indicating the reasoning and data which justify it. The remainder of the printed Report is a careful analysis of the evidence (2350 type-written pages besides the exhibits) which was before the Pitcher Committee. This leads up to the Bill (Report, 367-379) which became the statute now involved. The opening section of that statute is as follows:

"Section 300. Legislative finding; statement of policy. This article is enacted in the exercise of the police power of the state, and its purposes generally are to protect the public health and public welfare. It is hereby declared that unhealthful, unfair, unjust, destructive, demoralizing and uneconomic trade practices have been and are now carried on in the production sale and distribution of milk and milk products in this state, whereby the dairy industry in the state and the constant supply of pure milk to inhabitants of the state are imperiled. That such conditions constitute a menace to the health, welfare and reasonable comfort of the inhabitants of the state. That in order to protect the well-being of our citizens and promote the public welfare, and in order to preserve the strength and vigor of the race, the production, transportation, manufacture, storage, distribution and sale of milk in the state of New York is hereby declared to be a business affecting the public health and interest. That the production and distribution of milk is a paramount industry upon which the prosperity of the state in large measure depends. That the present acute economic emergency, being in part the consequence of a severe and increasing disparity between the prices of milk and other commodities, which disparity has largely destroyed the purchasing power of milk producers for industrial products, has broken down the orderly production and marketing of milk and has seriously impaired the agricultural assets supporting the credit structure of the state and its local governmental subdivisions. That the danger to the public health and welfare is immediate and impending, the necessity urgent and such as will not admit of delay in public supervision and control in accord with proper standards of production, sanitation and marketing. The foregoing statements of fact, policy and application of this article are hereby declared as a matter of legislative determination."

For present purposes a legislative finding is not unlike the verdict of a jury. It is entitled to respect, and will stand if it is bottomed upon evidence and not clearly against the weight of it.

We submit that the New York Legislature was justified in enacting the particular statutory provision now involved, the minimum-price-to-the-consumer provision, if it had before it evidence which established the probability of three things. First, that a serious condition existed affecting the production and distribution of milk, and amounting to a public emergency. Second, that the milk business is affected by conditions peculiar to itself so that it could not be cured by operation of the law of supply and demand. Third, that price-cutting in the sale of milk from stores to consumers was a substantial contributing factor to the serious situation in the milk business.

MCGRAIN v. DAUGHERTY

Supreme Court of the United States, 1926.

This is an appeal from the final order in a proceeding in habeas corpus discharging a recusant witness held in custody under process of attachment issued from the United States Senate in the course of an investigation which it was making of the administration of the Department of Justice. A full statement of the case is necessary.

The Department of Justice is one of the great executive departments established by congressional enactment and has charge, among other things, of the initiation and prosecution of all suits, civil and criminal, which may be brought in the right and name of the United States to compel obedience or punish disobedience to its laws, to recover property obtained from it by unlawful or fraudulent means, or to safeguard its rights in other respects; and also of the assertion and protection of its interests when it or its officers are sued by others. The Attorney General is the head of the department, and its functions are all to be exercised under his supervision and direction.

Harry M. Daugherty became the Attorney General March 5, 1921, and held that office until March 28, 1924, when he resigned. Late in that period various charges of misfeasance and nonfeasance in the Department of Justice after he became its supervising head were brought to the attention of the Senate by individual senators and made the basis of an insistent demand that the department be investigated to the end that the practices and deficiencies which, according to the charges, were operating to prevent or impair its right administration might be definitely ascertained and that appropriate and effective measures might be taken to remedy or eliminate the evil. The Senate regarded the charges as grave and requiring legislative attention and action. Accordingly it formulated, passed and invited the House of Representatives to pass (and that body did pass) two measures taking important litigation then in immediate contemplation out of the control of the Department of Justice and placing the same in charge of special counsel to be appointed by the President; and also adopted a resolution authorizing and directing a select committee of five senators—"to investigate circumstances and facts, and report the same to the Senate, concerning the alleged failure of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, to prosecute properly violators of the Sherman Anti-trust Act and the Clayton Act against monopolies and unlawful restraint of trade; the alleged neglect and failure of the said Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, to arrest and prosecute Albert B. Fall, Harry F. Sinclair, E. L. Doheny, C. R. Forbes, and their co-conspirators in defrauding the Government, as well as the alleged neglect and failure of the said Attorney General to arrest and prosecute many others for violations of Federal statutes and his alleged failure to prosecute properly, efficiently, and promptly, and to defend, all manner of civil and criminal actions wherein the Government of the United States is interested as a party plaintiff or defendant. And said committee is further directed to inquire into, investigate and report to the Senate the activities of the said Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General, and any of his assistants in the Department of Justice which would in any manner tend to impair their efficiency or influence as representatives of the Government of the United States."

The resolution also authorized the committee to send for books and papers, to subpoena witnesses, to administer oaths, and to sit at such times and places as it might deem advisable.

In the course of the investigation the committee issued and caused to be duly served on Mally S. Daugherty—who was a brother of Harry M. Daugherty and president of the Midland National Bank of Washington Court House, Ohio,—a subpoena commanding him to appear before the committee for the purpose of giving testimony bearing on the subject under investigation, and to bring with him the "deposit ledgers of the Midland National Bank since November 1, 1920; also note files and transcript of owners of every safety vault; also records of income drafts; also records of any individual account or accounts showing withdrawals of amounts of $25,000 or over during above period." The witness failed to appear.

A little later in the course of the investigation the committee issued and caused to be duly served on the same witness another subpoena commanding him to appear before it for the purpose of giving testimony relating to the subject under consideration—nothing being said in this subpoena about bringing records, books or papers. The witness again failed to appear; and no excuse was offered by him for either failure.

The committee then made a report to the Senate stating that the subpoenas had been issued, that according to the officer's returns—copies of which accompanied the report—the witness was personally served; and that he had failed and refused to appear. After a reading of the report, the Senate adopted a resolution reciting these facts and proceeding as follows:

"Whereas the appearance and testimony of the said M. S. Daugherty is material and necessary in order that the committee may properly execute the functions imposed upon it and may obtain information necessary as a basis for such legislative and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the President of the Senate pro tempore issue his warrant commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy to take into custody the body of the said M. S. Daugherty wherever found, and to bring the said M. S. Daugherty before the bar of the Senate, then and there to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as the Senate may order the President of the Senate pro tempore to propound; and to keep the said M. S. Daugherty in custody to await the further order of the Senate."

It will be observed from the terms of the resolution that the warrant was to be issued in furtherance of the effort to obtain the personal testimony of the witness, and, like the second subpoena, was not intended to exact from him the production of the various records, books and papers named in the first subpoena.

The warrant was issued agreeable to the resolution and was addressed simply to the Sergeant at Arms. That officer on receiving the warrant endorsed thereon a direction that it be executed by John J. McGrain, already his deputy, and delivered it to him for execution.

The deputy, proceeding under the warrant, took the witness into custody at Cincinnati, Ohio with the purpose of bringing him before the bar of the Senate as commanded; whereupon the witness petitioned the federal district court in Cincinnati for a writ of habeas corpus. The writ was granted and the deputy made due return setting forth the warrant and the cause of the detention. After a hearing the court held the attachment and detention unlawful and discharged the witness, the decision being put on the ground that the Senate in directing the investigation and in ordering the attachment exceeded its powers under the Constitution, 299 F. 620. The deputy prayed and was allowed a direct appeal to this Court under sec. 238 of the Judicial Code as then existing.

We have given the case earnest and prolonged consideration because the principal questions involved are of unusual importance and delicacy. They are (a) whether the Senate—or the House of Representatives, both being on the same plane in this regard—has power, through its own process, to compel a private individual to appear before it or one of its committees and give testimony needed to enable it efficiently to exercise a legislative function belonging to it under the Constitution, and (b) whether it sufficiently appears that the process was being employed in this instance to obtain testimony for that purpose.

The first of the principal questions—the one which the witness particularly presses on our attention—is, as before shown, whether the Senate—or the House of Representatives, both being on the same plane in this regard—has power, through its own process, to compel a private individual to appear before it or one of its committees and give testimony needed to enable it efficiently to exercise a legislative function belonging to it under the Constitution.

The Constitution provides for a Congress consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives and invests it with "all legislative laws which shall be necessary and proper" for carrying into execution these powers and "all other powers" vested by the Constitution in the United States or in any department or officer thereof. Art. I, secs. 1, 8. Other provisions show that, while bills can become laws only after being considered and passed by both houses of Congress, each house is to be distinct from the other, to have its own officers and rules, and to exercise its legislative function independently. Art. I, secs. 2, 3, 5, 7. But there is no provision expressly investing either house with power to make investigations and exact testimony to the end that it may exercise its legislative function advisedly and effectively. So the question arises whether this power is so far incidental to the legislative function as to be implied.

In actual legislative practice power to secure needed information by such means has long been treated as an attribute of the power to legislate. It was so regarded in the British Parliament and in the Colonial legislatures before the American Revolution; and a like view has prevailed and has been carried into effect in both houses of Congress and in most of the state legislatures. . . .

We are of opinion that the power of inquiry—with process to enforce it—is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function. It was so regarded and employed in American legislatures before the Constitution was framed and ratified. Both houses of Congress took this view of it early in their history—the House of Representatives with the approving votes of Mr. Madison and other members whose service in the convention which framed the Constitution gives special significance to their action—and both houses have employed the power accordingly up to the present time. The acts of 1798 and 1857, judged by their comprehensive terms, were intended to recognize the existence of this power in both houses and to enable them to employ it "more effectually" than before. So, when their practice in the matter is appraised according to the circumstances in which it was begun and to those in which it has been continued, it falls nothing short of a practical construction, long continued, of the constitutional provisions respecting their powers, and therefore should be taken as fixing the meaning of those provisions, if otherwise doubtful.

We are further of opinion that the provisions are not of doubtful meaning, but, as was held by this Court in the cases we have reviewed, are intended to be effectively exercised, and therefore to carry with them such auxiliary powers as are necessary and appropriate to that end. . . . A legislative body cannot legislate wisely or effectively in the absence of information respecting the conditions which the legislation is intended to affect or change; and where the legislative body does not itself possess the requisite information—which not infrequently is true—recourse must be had to others who do possess it. Experi-once has taught that mere requests for such information often are unavailing, and also that information which is volunteered is not always accurate or complete; so some means of compulsion are essential to obtain what is needed. All this was true before and when the Constitution was framed and adopted. In that period the power of inquiry—with enforcing process—was regarded and employed as a necessary and appropriate attribute of the power to legislate—indeed, was treated as inhering in it. Thus there is ample warrant for thinking, as we do, that the constitutional provisions which commit the legislative function to the two houses are intended to include this attribute to the end that the function may be effectively exercised. . . .

The only legitimate object the Senate could have in ordering the investigation was to aid it in legislating; and we think the subject-matter was such that the presumption should be indulged that this was the real object. An express avowal of the object would have been better; but in view of the particular subject-matter was not indispensable. In the Chapman case, where the resolution contained no avowal, this Court pointed out that it plainly related to a subject-matter of which the Senate had jurisdiction, and said "We cannot assume on this record that the action of the Senate was without a legitimate object"; and also that "it was certainly not necessary that the resolutions should declare in advance what the Senate meditated doing when the investigation was concluded." 166 U.S. 669–670, 17 S.Ct. 681. In People v. Keller, 99 N.Y. 463, 2 N.E. 615, 52 Am.Rep. 49, where the Court of Appeals of New York sustained an investigation ordered by the Senate of that state where the resolution contained no avowal, but disclosed that it definitely related to the administration of a public office the duties of which were subject to legislative regulation, the court said (pp. 485–487 [2 N.E. 627]): "Where public institutions under the control of the State are ordered to be investigated it is generally with the view of some legislative action respecting them, and the same may be said in respect of public officers." And again: "We are bound to presume that the action of the legislative body was with a legitimate object if it is capable of being so construed, and we have no right to assume that the contrary was intended." . . .

We think the resolution and proceedings give no warrant for thinking the Senate was attempting or intending to try the Attorney General at its bar or before its committee for any crime or wrongdoing. Nor do we think it a valid objection to the investigation that it might possibly disclose crime or wrong-doing on his part.

The second resolution—the one directing that the witness be attached—declares that his testimony is sought with the purpose of obtaining "information necessary as a basis for such legislative and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper." This avowal of contemplated legislation is in accord with what we think is the right interpretation of the earlier resolution directing the investigation. The suggested possibility of "other action" if deemed "necessary or proper" is of course open to criticism in that there is no other action in the matter which would be within the power of the Senate. But we do not assent to the view that this indefinite and untenable suggestion invalidates the entire proceeding. The right view in our opinion is that it takes nothing from the lawful object avowed in the same resolution and rightly inferable from the earlier one. It is not as if an inadmissible or unlawful object were affirmatively and definitely avowed.

We conclude that the investigation was ordered for a legitimate object; that the witness wrongfully refused to appear and testify before the committee and was lawfully attached; that the Senate is entitled to have him give testimony pertinent to the inquiry, either at its bar or before the committee; and that the district court erred in discharging him from custody under the attachment.

Another question has arisen which should be noticed. It is whether the case has become moot. The investigation was ordered and the committee appointed during the Sixty-eighth Congress. That Congress expired March 4, 1925. The resolution ordering the investigation in terms limited the committee's authority to the period of the Sixty-eighth Congress; but this apparently was changed by a later and amendatory resolution authorizing the committee to sit at such times and places as it might deem advisable or necessary. It is said in Jefferson's Manual: "Neither House can continue any portion of itself in any parliamentary function beyond the end of the session without the consent of the other two branches. When done, it is by a bill constituting them commissioners for the particular purpose." But the context shows that the reference is to the two houses of Parliament when adjourned by prorogation or dissolution by the King. The rule may be the same with the House of Representatives whose members are all elected for the period of a single Congress; but it cannot well be the same with the Senate, which is a continuing body whose members are elected for a term of six years and so divided into classes that the seats of one-third only become vacant at the end of each Congress, two-thirds always continuing into the next Congress, save as vacancies may occur through death or resignation.

Mr. Hinds in his collection of precedents says: "The Senate, as a continuing body, may continue its committees through the recess following the expiration of a Congress"; and, after quoting the above statement from Jefferson's Manual, he says: "The Senate, however, being a continuing body, gives authority to its committees during the recess after the expiration of a Congress." So far as we are advised the select committee having this investigation in charge has neither made a final report nor been discharged; nor has it been continued by an affirmative order. Apparently its activities have been suspended pending the decision of this case. But, be this as it may, it is certain that the committee may be continued or revived now by motion to that effect, and, if continued or revived, will have all its original powers. This being so, and the Senate being a continuing body, the case cannot be said to have become moot in the ordinary sense. . . .

Final order reversed.

DOYLE v. HOFSTADER

Court of Appeals of New York, 1931.

CARDOZO, C. J. By a joint resolution of the Senate and the Assembly of the state of New York, adopted March 23, 1931, it was resolved that a joint legislative committee be constituted to investigate the administration and conduct of the various departments of the city of New York.

The appellant, William F. Doyle, was subpoenaed to attend before the committee, and, upon appearing, was directed to answer a series of questions relating to his practice before the board of standards and appeals. There had been preliminary testimony from the lips of other witnesses that fees of extraordinary magnitude had been paid for his services during a period of years. The questions put to the appellant were designed to inform the committee whether he had divided these fees with a political leader, or with some one else, in furtherance of a concerted plan of bribery and corruption, and whether he had paid any part of them as a bribe to any public officer.

The appellant has been adjudged in contempt, first by a majority of the joint legislative committee, and then by the Supreme Court, for his refusal to answer the questions propounded. Typical questions are these:

"Question: When you practiced before this board, did you split your fees? Answer: Do you mean with the Board of Standards and Appeals?"

"Question: I mean did you split them with anybody? Answer: I never split a nickel with the Board of Standards and Appeals."

"Question: I asked you whether you split them with anybody, whether they were on the Board of Standards and Appeals or whether they were not? Answer: I refuse to answer on the ground that it might tend to incriminate me."

Again: "Question: Dr. Doyle, did you, in reference to cases pending before the Board of Standards and Appeals, bribe any public official? Answer: You are alluding to the Board of Standards and Appeals? No."

"Question: Now you did not bribe any member of the Board of Standards and Appeals? Answer: No."

"Question: Did you bribe any other public official? Answer: I refuse to answer on the ground that it might tend to incriminate me."

"Question: Did you give any of the proceeds of those fees to any political leader in the County of New York? Answer: I refuse to answer that question on the ground that answering might tend to incriminate me."

We are to determine whether the refusal was contumacious or privileged.

The Constitution of the state provides that no person shall "be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." Const. art. 1, § 6. . . .

By the terms of the joint resolution creating the legislative committee, the Legislature has said: "Whenever in its judgment the public interest demands, the committee may determine that a person shall not be excused from attending and testifying before said committee . . . on the ground that the testimony . . . required of him may tend to incriminate him or to subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no person so attending and testifying . . . who has duly claimed excuse or privilege, which would be sufficient except for this provision of this resolution and which said excuse or privilege has been expressly denied by the committee, shall be subject to prosecution or to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of the transaction, matter or thing concerning which he may as aforesaid testify . . . in obedience to its subpoena."

This resolution, if valid, is in effect an act of amnesty. It wipes out as to the witness whose claim of privilege has been denied the criminal statutes of the state with all their pains and penalties, and, like a pardon, makes him a new man. A pardon may be granted by the Governor after conviction of the crime. Const. art. 4, § 5. An act of amnesty may be passed, like any other bill, by the Legislature, acting separately in its two houses (article 3, § 15), with the approval of the Governor, or, in the event of his veto, by a two-thirds vote thereafter (article 4, § 9). "Every bill which shall have passed the Senate and Assembly shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it shall have originated." Const. art. 4, § 9. This resolution was never presented to the Governor. It never received his approval or his veto. It is not an act of amnesty; it is not an "act" at all. People ex rel. Argus Co. v. Palmer, 12 Misc. 392, 33 N.Y.S. 1088; Id., 146 N.Y. 406, 42 N.E. 543.

There are precedents in the books for what is sometimes styled a legislative pardon. If they are scrutinized, they will be found in every instance to have been statutes in the usual form. They were acts of amnesty or indemnity adopted by the Legislature with the Governor's approval. United States v. Hughes (D.C.) 175 F. 238; United States v. Hall (D.C.) 53 F. 352; State ex rel. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Ass'n v. Eby, 170 Mo. 497, 71 S.W. 52; State v. Applewhite, 75 N.C. 229; cf. Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591, 601, 16 S.Ct. 644, 40 L.Ed. 819; Matter of Garland, 4 Wall. 333, 18 L.Ed. 366; 4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2281, and statutes and cases there collated. Never has it been held that a Legislature alone may suspend the criminal law as to a person or a class of persons. In the Constitution of that country from whose polity our own institutions derive to a large extent their origin and meaning, the rule is said to be that a resolution of the House of Commons is invalid and of no effect if in conflict with existing law. Anson, Law and Custom of the Con- stitution, vol. 1, pp. 182, 185, 186, 192. We cannot bring ourselves to believe that the efficacy of resolutions is any greater in New York.

The argument is made that a legislative body has inherent power to conduct an investigation for the discovery of abuses in the operations of government (People ex rel. Karlin v. Culkin, 248 N.Y. 465, 478, 162 N.E. 487, 60 A.L.R. 851; People ex rel. McDonald v. Keeler, 99 N.Y. 463, 2 N.E. 615, 52 Am.Rep. 49; McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135, 47 S.Ct. 319, 71 L.Ed. 580, 50 A.L.R. 1; Sinclair v. United States, 279 U.S. 263, 49 S.Ct. 268, 73 L.Ed. 692; Landis, Constitutional Limitations on the Congressional Power of Investigation, 40 Harvard Law Review 153), and that the power to give immunity to witnesses, and to suspend to that extent the general laws of the state, must be deemed to be a necessary incident of the power to investigate. But it is not such an incident. It may at times be a useful incident, but it is not a necessary one, necessary, that is to say, in the sense of being a power so indispensable to the ordinary exercise of the investigating function that it must be taken as implied. . . . It may be necessary for fruitful results in a particular instance, but it is not so generally indispensable as to attach itself automatically to the mere power to inquire. Whether the good to be attained by procuring the testimony of criminals is greater or less than the evil to be wrought by exempting them forever from prosecution for their crimes is a question of high policy as to which the lawmaking department of the government is entitled to be heard. In the state of New York that department is not the Legislature alone, but the Legislature and the Governor, the one as much as the other an essential factor in the process. People v. Bowen, 21 N.Y. 517, 519, 521; Matter of City of Long Beach v. Public Service Commission, 249 N.Y. 480, 489, 490, 164 N.E. 553. We beg the question when we argue that the Legislature may give immunity because the Legislature is the sole custodian of the legislative power. It is not the sole custodian of that power. The power is divided between the Legislature and the Governor. Cf. Ohio ex rel. Davis v. Hildebrant, 241 U.S. 565, 36 S.Ct. 708, 60 L.Ed. 1172; Hawke v. Smith, 253 U.S. 221, 40 S.Ct. 495, 64 L.Ed. 871, 10 A.L.R. 1504. Article 3, § 1, of the Constitution, must be read in conjunction with article 4, § 9. People v. Bowen, supra; Matter of City of Long Beach v. Public Service Commission, supra. The Legislature can initiate, but without the action of the Governor it is powerless to complete. Not only do we beg the question when we infer the validity of the immunity from the possession by the Legislature of the full legislative power; we concede by implication that, unless the legislative power has been thus committed without division, the immunity must fail. The argument, reduced to that basis, is seen to be self-destructive. The grant of an immunity is in very truth the assumption of a legislative power, and that is why the Legislature, acting alone, is incompetent to declare it. It is the assumption of a power to annul as to individuals or classes the statutory law of crimes, to stem the course of justice, to absolve the grand jurors of the county from the performance of their duties, and the prosecuting officer from his. All these changes may be wrought through the enactment of a statute. They may be wrought in no other way while the legislative structure of our government continues what it is.

The argument is made that the jurisdiction to grant immunity is an incident of the jurisdiction to punish for contempt. It is no more such an incident for a committee of the Legislature (Legislative Law [Consol.Laws, c. 32], § 4, subd. 5; Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168, 26 L.Ed. 377; People ex rel. McDonald v. Keeler, 99 N.Y. 463, 2 N.E. 615, 52 Am.Rep. 49; Matter of Barnes, 204 N.Y. 108, 97 N.E. 508; Sinclair v. United States, 279 U.S. 263, 49 S.Ct. 268, 73 L.Ed. 692; Landis, op. cit., pp. 153, 219) than it is for a court or judge. The punishment for contempt may be imposed for disobedience of a lawful mandate. The power thus to punish may not be used as an excuse for the issue of an unlawful mandate and the remission of the pains and penalties of crimes in consideration of obedience. . . . The subject is not clarified by reference to the practice of the Congress, whatever it may be. Under the Federal Constitution, "every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment)" must be submitted to the President for approval or veto in the same manner as a bill. Const.U.S. art. 1, § 7, subd. 3; cf. Hinds, Precedents of the House of Representatives, vol. 4, §§ 3483, 3484. A resolution so approved has all the authority of a statute. . . .

The way to compel disclosure as to conspiracies and attempts is not obscure or devious. A grant of immunity similar to the one contained in the resolution may be embodied in a statute. The Legislature, when it convenes, may pass an act of amnesty with the approval of the Governor, an act of amnesty coextensive with the privilege destroyed. The appellant as well as other witnesses will then be under a duty to declare the whole truth, irrespective of the number or the nature of the crimes exposed to view. Even if we were able to read a different meaning into the statutes now existing, the time in all likelihood would not be distant when there would be need of supplemental legislation to give immunity for other crimes, for crimes not covered by the sections dealing with conspiracy and bribery. A witness exposed to prosecution for larceny or extortion would be wholly without the pale of the immunity provisions in any statutes now existing, however liberally construed.

We are not unmindful of the public interests, of the insistent hope and need that the ways of bribers and corruptionists shall be exposed to an indignant world. Commanding as those interests are, they do not supply us with a license to palter with the truth or to twist what has been written in the statutes into something else that we should like to see. Historic liberties and privileges are not to bend from day to day "because of some accident of immediate overwhelming interest which appeals to the feelings and distorts the judgment" (Holmes, J., in Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U.S.

197, 400, 24 S.Ct. 436, 468, 48 L.Ed. 679), are not to change their form and content in response to the "hydraulic pressure" (Holmes, J., supra) exerted by great causes. A community whose judges would be willing to give it whatever law might gratify the impulse of the moment would find in the end that it had paid too high a price for relieving itself of the bother of awaiting a session of the Legislature and the enactment of a statute in accordance with established forms.

The order of the Appellate Division and that of the Special Term should be modified by directing that the appellant stand committed until he answers the question whether he has bribed any public officer, such imprisonment not to exceed the period of thirty days, and as so modified affirmed.

NOTES

1. In United States v. Barsky, (D.C.D.C.) 72 F.Supp. 165 (1947), Keech, D.J., construed the federal statute (28 U.S.C.A., sec. 634), which prohibits the use against him in a criminal proceeding of testimony given by a witness before a Congressional committee, as not barring the use of that testimony in a prosecution for contempt of Congress or conspiracy leading to such contempt.

2. Legislatures have attempted by statute to secure uncolored testimony before legislative committees. The following are illustrations:

OATH TO WITNESSES—2 U.S.C.A. § 191. Oaths to witnesses. The President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or a chairman of the Committee of the Whole, or of any committee of either House of Congress, is empowered to administer oaths to witnesses in any case under their examination. Any member of either House of Congress may administer oaths to witnesses in any matter depending in either House of Congress of which he is a Member, or an committee thereof.

LOBBYISTS' OATHS—Florida Statutes (1927), § 96. Oath by lobbyist.—Whenever any person or persons shall appear before any committee of the Legislature of the State of Florida for the purpose of advocating or opposing, proposing changes or amendments, or in any wise discussing, a measure or matter being considered by such committee, such committee, or any member thereof, may require such person or persons to state upon oath in writing whether or not he appears in his own individual interest or in the interest of some other person or persons, firm, corporation or corporations, and if so, the name or names of such person or persons, firm, corporation or corporations, and if he has been or is to be paid a fee or any compensation, directly or indirectly, for such service, or as expenses or otherwise to so appear before such committee, and when such oath is required by a committee or any member thereof it shall be the duty of the chairman of the committee to file the written oath with the secretary of the Senate and the chief clerk of the House, and said oath shall be at once spread upon the journal of each House for the information of the members of the Legislature.

NOTE—LEGISLATION—LEGISLATIVE INQUIRIES—VALIDITY OF SUBPENA ISSUED BY SENATE COMMITTEE FOR ALL TELEGRAPHIC CORRESPONDENCE OVER NAMED PERIOD

Prompted by disclosures that members of Congress had been bombarded by faked telegrams,¹ and that various utilities companies had spent tremendous sums of money² in an effort to defeat the so-called public utilities company "death sentence" clause of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, on July 11, 1935, the Senate adopted a resolution³ providing for a committee of five senators to conduct an inquiry into lobbying activities and to make recommendations to the Senate. Pursuant to the power therein vested in it "To require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers and documents . . . as it deems advisable," the committee issued a subpoena ordering the Western Union Telegraph Company to produce before it all telegrams charged to the account of Winston, Strawn and Shaw, a Chicago law firm, during the eleven month period from Feb. 1 to Dec. 1, 1935. In a suit to enjoin the telegraph company from turning over the telegrams, held, injunction granted. The subpoena amounts to an unlawful search and seizure and is violative of the Fourth Amendment. Strawn v. Western Union Tel. Co., N.Y. Herald Tribune, March 12, 1936 at 1 (Sup.Ct.D. C.).⁴

In the absence of any adjudication of the permissible scope of a Congressional fact-finding inquiry for admittedly legislative purposes, the editorial indignation⁵ expressed at the means used by the Black committee to acquire information is based, at least ostensibly, upon the unwarranted lay conclusion that the general subpoena used is unconstitutional. Even on the doubtful assumption that the Fourth Amendment imposes the same limitation on Congress as it does on law-enforcing agencies, there is precedent for the committee's actions in a number of cases where the Supreme Court upheld extremely broad subpoenas for papers and correspondence, although issued by federal grand juries.⁶ But the practical necessity for an adequate fact basis

Herald-Tribune, March 13, 1936 at 1. The injunction which Hearst sought against the Black committee was denied on the grounds that freedom of the press was not involved, the Bill of Rights not infringed since the subpoena was sufficiently specific, and the court has no jurisdiction to issue process against a Senate committee. Hence a number of cases have recognized an "inherent" legislative power to investigate with the aid of compulsory process;⁸ the limiting requirement imposed has been that a proper legislative purpose be served by the investigation.⁹ The need for the further presumption that a valid legislative purpose does exist¹⁰ is obviated in the instant case by the introduction of two bills regulating lobbying activities.¹¹ The nature of the practices which the Black committee is investigating, carried on in secluded conferences and through a long chain of correspondence between groups who frequently are not revealed to be the sponsors of the activities, makes it impossible to acquire the necessary information without the use of fairly broad subpoenas. Any requirement of a particularized identification of the documents desired may completely tie the hands of Congress.¹² The opprobrious connotation of "fishing expedition," as used in cases condemning administrative inquiries, derives from their quality of having no permissible end in mind¹³ but the Senate having, in aid of a definite legislative purpose, made the not unreasonable determination that investigation of plaintiff's papers will reveal the nature of lobbying activities carried on by it and its clients, the search no longer has the objectionable meddlesome quality which might invalidate it. The claim that the restrictions established by the commission cases protect against revelation of possibly incriminating material for the use of law-enforcing agencies, and are circumvented by the Black committee's practices, is answered by the statement in

That Congress should be able to ascertain the public sentiment on controversial matters is supported by cases holding lobbying contracts void as against public policy. *Oscanyan v. McGrain v. Daugherty that it is no valid objection to the investigation that it might possibly disclose crime or wrongdoing which would be punishable by the courts.¹⁴ Although it has been suggested in dicta that the Congressional power in this respect is not all-embracing, the Supreme Court has made no mention of the Fourth Amendment;¹⁵ the exclusively fact-finding nature of the inquiry by the Senate body might even exempt it from requirements imposed to prevent inquisitorial or tyrannical administration and enforcement of the law.¹⁶ It is submitted that the two requirements of a possible legislative purpose, and rational connection with the subject matter of the inquiry¹⁷ should be the only limitation on Congressional investigations. Any possible invasion of a constitutional "right of privacy" erected by the Supreme Court dicta would seem to be outweighed by considerations of social interest in making possible such legislation.¹⁸ An additional consideration is a long line of legislative precedent¹⁹ for this broad type of inquiry; the "practical construction" of the legislature was regarded as significant in the judicial recognition of the power to investigate.²⁰ Further, the present federal rule which may be invoked to deny admission in court of evidence obtained in contravention of the Fourth Amendment,²¹ and which has been used to prevent the otherwise valid subpoena by the Attorney General of papers of which he had gained knowledge through an unlawful search and seizure,²² might be extended to prevent the use in a criminal action of any information gathered by means not available to the Attorney General under the Amendment, so that the use of the information so gathered would be restricted to purely legislative purposes.

D. The Conference Committee

GEORGE W. NORRIS, ONE HOUSE LEGISLATURES

17 Philippine L J 356-358 (1938).

There is no more reason for a government to have two branches of its legislature than there is for a wagon to have five wheels, or for a bank to have two boards of directors or a State two Governors. The two-house or bicameral legislature is leftover from medieval times, a vestigial member of the body politic which can be as well dispensed with as can the vermiform appendix from the human body.

Let us look about the world. Great Britain, for all practical purposes, is operating under a unicameral or one-house legislature. The little country of Finland, noteworthy for its financial stability, has had a unicameral legislature for 17 years. Eight of nine Canadian Provinces operate with the unicameral system. The Philippines, upon the advice of students of government, chose a one-house legislature. Alaska has asked and gained Congressional consent to hold a referendum in 1938 on changing to the unicameral plan. And the one-year-old one-house legislature of the State of Nebraska is working out successfully.

What are the advantages of such a law-making body over the two-house type?

To begin with, the two-house legislature is a magnificent example of what is called in America "passing the buck." Because in effect it becomes a three-house legislature, with the Conference Committee as the third house. Let us see how this works in the United States.

When a bill passes one branch of the legislature and passes the other branch in a different form, the matter is referred to the Conference Committee consisting usually of three men from each house. This Conference Committee, arbitrarily selected by the presiding officers of the different branches, arbitrates the dispute and drafts a law. It then reports to the House and to the Senate. The Conference Committee report cannot be amended by either branch. It must be voted up or voted down, as a whole. Members must take what they believe to be bad in order to get what they believe to be good. If it is rejected entirely, it may mean, and often does mean, the entire defeat of the legislation. If the Conference Committee does not agree upon a bill, then it must necessarily fail in its entirety. As a practical proposition, we have legislation then, not by the voice of the members of the Senate, not by the members of the House of Representatives, but by the voice of six men, two of whom, the majority from either branch, can defeat any legislation they oppose.

If we are to have a legislature composed of two branches, the Conference Committee is an absolute necessity. No man has ever suggested a plan, so far as I know, which would do away with this third branch of the legislature. Yet this third branch, meeting in secret, with no record of its proceedings, no roll call, and, for practical purposes, not answerable to the electorate for what it does, is undemocratic.

It would be much better to provide by a constitutional amendment that the people themselves should elect a third branch of the legislature to perform the duties of the Conference Committee, but no one has proposed this. Such a plan would add greatly to the expense and the delay now existing.

It is necessary that the people of a State make it impossible for any member of a legislature to shift responsibility. I can point to an instance in recent history in the United States when a majority of both branches were pledged in writing to vote for a bill embodying a particular principle of legislation. Notwithstanding the pledge, the legislature adjourned without enacting any such law. It does not follow from this that any member of this legislature was necessarily dishonest in making this pledge. But whether he was honest about it or not, he could go back to his people and tell them truthfully that he voted for a bill embodying this particular item of legislation.

The difficulty in such cases is that when the upper house passes a bill on a subject, and the lower house passes a different bill on the same subject, if the Conference Committee fails to agree upon a report the legislation is dead. The bill has died the death that many bills must die in this third branch of the legislature.

A one-house legislature makes this impossible. It often occurs in the two-house legislature that the Senate bill and the House bill are intentionally made different. They die the death in the Conference Committee that special interests desire them to die. The lobby, composed of experts hired by machine politicians and special interests, is successful in killing legislation before these five or six men who hold their deliberations in secret, and who make no record of their proceedings. The bicameral system affords an opportunity to a dishonest legislator which he cannot possess in a one-house legislature. It is, therefore, an open invitation to the disreputable man to seek office in the legislature. Such a legislator sometimes introduces bills which he expects to be killed; he wants to be paid for helping to kill them; and he kills them by getting them into a parliamentary tangle where his own record may appear on the surface as perfect. His constituents will therefore perhaps reelect him, without knowing his real record.

Nebraska's unicameral Legislature, which met for the first time in January, 1937, was composed of 43 members. The old House alone had 100 members and the old Senate, 33. I believe most people will agree that these 43 men served the State more efficiently than the 133 were ever able to do.

Compare the 1937 session with that of 1935. Although this was the only unicameral legislature in the United States and several weeks were devoted to working out new legislative procedures, the session was 12 days shorter than in 1935. Only about half as many bills were introduced, but more were passed in 1937.

There was no Conference Committee to thwart the majority's will. Committees were small and meetings were arranged so that no Senator had more than one committee meeting a day. Public hearings were held on all bills before committees, with notice of the hearing posted five days in advance. Any member could demand and get a roll call on any measure before the Legislature.

NOTE

See Buidette, "Legislative Conference Committees", 11 State Govt. 103 (1938), discussing lessons learned from Nebraska's experience with a bicameral legislature.

E. The Legislative Research Committee or Council

AN ACT CREATING A LEGISLATIVE RESEARCH COMMITTEE, PRESCRIBING ITS POWERS AND DUTIES, AND APPROPRIATING MONEY THEREFOR

Minn Laws, 1947, c. 306; M.S.A. Secs. 3.31-3.38, 3.42.

3.31 Legislative research committee created; selection of members; vacancies

There is hereby created a legislative committee, which is hereinafter referred to as the "Legislative Research Committee" or the "Committee". The committee shall consist of one senator and one representative from each of the Congressional Districts in the State to be chosen before the close of each regular session of the Legislature to serve until the opening day of the next succeeding regular session of the Legislature. The House members shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Senate members shall be selected at a caucus by a majority of the Senators from the several Congressional Districts. In case of failure to make such selection at the time and manner herein provided for or upon a vacancy occurring after the selection has been made, the vacancy shall be filled by the selection of another member from the Congressional District in which the vacancy occurred, such selection to be made by the remaining Senate or House members of the committee, depending upon which body has the vacancy. c. 306, § 1.

3.32 Policy; powers; restrictions; rights of legislators

In addition to the other applicable provisions of this act,¹ the committee shall have the power and right to study, consider, accumulate, compile and assemble information on any subject upon which the Legislature may legislate, and upon such subjects as the Legislature may by concurrent or joint resolution authorize or direct, or upon any subject requested by a member of the Legislature; to collect information concerning the government and general welfare of the

¹ Sections 3.31-3.42.

State and of its political subdivisions; to study and consider important issues of public policy and questions of general interest. The prime motive of the committee shall be to gather information and provide material to be used by the Legislature in its work while in session. The director and his assistants shall neither oppose nor urge legislation. The committee may as it deems advisable call to its assistance other members of the Legislature and it may create committees consisting of its own members, or one or more of its own members and one or more members of the Legislature and delegate by written resolution to such committees such of its powers and rights as it may deem advisable. Any member of the Legislature shall have the right to attend any meeting of the committee, and may present his views on any subject which the committee may at any particular time be considering. Any member shall have the right to attend and participate in the discussion but shall not have a vote, and upon request any member of the Legislature shall be notified of the dates and places of meetings. c. 306, § 2.

3.33 Assign subjects for research

The committee may assign the research director and staff to the various standing committees during each regular legislative session for the purpose of explaining the work of the committee and developing additional data with reference thereto. Each department, board, commission, agency, officer, and employee, in the state government, and those in local governments, shall furnish such information and render such assistance to the committee as it may from time to time request. c. 306, § 3.

3.34 Meetings; quorum

The committee, or any sub-committee appointed by it, may sit at such time and place as it may deem advisable, but the committee shall meet at least once in each quarter year and shall meet at any time upon the call of the chairman or a call signed by nine members of the committee. At any meeting of the committee ten members shall constitute a quorum and a majority of such quorum shall have authority to act in any matter falling within the jurisdiction of the committee. c. 306, § 4.

3.35 Officers; research director; employees; budget

The committee shall select a chairman and a vice-chairman from its own members and may prescribe its own rules of procedure. It may appoint a secretary who need not be a member, and shall appoint a research director who shall be paid such salary as the committee may determine. The committee may employ such other persons and obtain the assistance of such research agencies as it may deem necessary. The secretary, the director and all employees of the Legislative Research Committee shall be deemed to be legislative employees and shall be in the unclassified service of the state civil service. For the purpose of budgeting, expenses of the Legislative Research Committee shall be deemed to be legislative expense. Expenditures of funds made available to the committee by legislative appropriation shall be made only upon the authority of resolutions duly passed by the committee. c. 306, § 5.

3.36 Minutes of meetings; periodic and biennial reports

The committee shall keep minutes of its meetings, which shall be open to the public. It shall make periodic reports to all members of the legislature and shall keep them fully informed of all matters which may come before it, the action taken thereon, and the progress made in relation thereto. At least 30 days prior to each biennial legislative session the committee shall make a written report summarizing its activities, investigations, surveys, and findings of facts to the members of the Legislature, to the Governor, and to the public. c. 306, § 6.

3.37 Certain subjects presented 60 days in advance of regular session

The committee may require that any suggested legislation that is to be presented by any department, board, commission, agency, officer, official or employee of the State, except the Governor, desiring the consideration of the committee, be presented to it at least 60 days in advance of any regular session. c. 306, § 7.

3.38 Expense of members

The members of the committee and the members of any sub-committee of the committee, shall be compensated for their actual expenses necessarily incurred in attending said meetings and in the performance of their official duties. c. 306, § 8.

3.42 Termination of act

The provisions of this act¹ shall terminate as of July 1, 1951. c. 306, § 12.

NOTES

1. In Weeks, "Recent Developments in the State Legislative Process", 16 State Govt. 162, 164 (1943), the author states: "The present year marks the tenth anniversary of the legislative council movement, the first purely legislative council having been created in Kansas in 1933. The idea was first suggested by the Committee on State Government of the National Municipal League and is embodied in the Model State Constitution. Twelve states in all have created councils and only two have abandoned them. . . . From the standpoint of results, legislative councils have proved to be the most important innovation in legislative machinery in many years.

"In most states the personnel of the council is entirely legislative with equal representation given to each house. All councils are employed in collecting information and in preparing programs for the legislature through the aid of research staffs, and thus have served to make legislation more of a continuous operation.

They have subjected the administration to observation, and yet they have not attempted to interfere; rather, they have succeeded in bringing the administration and the legislature closer together. Most of them make use of other state agencies and have been given full powers to summon witnesses and acquire information. Four meet on call; three quarterly; the rest more or less frequently. . . . The trend has been to increase their appropriation allowances. While different councils have been successful in varying degrees, it is generally conceded that they all have provided much needed legislative leadership by way of preparing legislative programs in advance of sessions. Their success depends upon the adequacy of their research facilities."

2. Kennedy, "The Legislative Process, With Particular Reference to Minnesota," 30 Minn.L.Rev. 653, 672, (1946), states, with reference to legislative research committees:

"The over-all functions of a permanent fact-finding agency might be summarized as follows:

"(1) Upon the request of legislators or of legislative standing and special committees, to prepare factual objective reports without recommendations on important issues of public policy and on questions of state-wide interest.

"(2) Upon the request of legislators or standing committees, to analyze and appraise objectively legislative proposals pending before either house, or any data or memoranda submitted in support of or in opposition to these proposals, without making recommendations as to legislative action.

"(3) To collect systematically data and information concerning the government and general welfare of the state.

"(4) Upon request of a member or committee of the legislature, to make impartial reports on any problem or question raising from the operation or administration of the laws or constitution of the state.

"(5) Upon request, to assist standing and special committees in acquiring and analyzing data, preparing reports, and summarizing public hearings.

"(6) To receive, classify, file and preserve for future use the published and unpublished research materials of joint legislative committees and temporary commissions.

"(7) Upon request, to assist the clerk of each house or any other legislative officer in the preparation of manuals, reports, directories and other legislative publications.

"(8) To abstract and analyze for legislators the reports of state departments and other administrative agencies.

"(9) At the request of the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House to cooperate with administrative agencies in gathering and evaluating data as a basis for legislation."

SECTION 4. CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS ON LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE

BOARD OF SUPERVISORS v. HEENAN

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1858. 2 Minn. 330, 2 Gil. 281.

FLANDRAU, J. The defendant is the register of deeds of Ramsey county, and this is an application for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel him to deliver to the board of supervisors certain books and papers relating to the taxes of the county. The application is made under § 9 of the act of August 13, 1858, p. 206, Laws 1858. Against the issuing of the writ, it is urged that the act of August 13, 1858, is unconstitutional, in not having been read on three different days in each house of the legislature, and twice at length; in not having been voted for by a majority of all the members elected to each house; . . . (Sections 13, 20, of art. 4, State Constitution.) The question is for the first time presented for judicial determination as to the force and effect of section 13 and section 20 of art. 4 of the constitution. Section 13 provides that "No law shall be passed unless voted for by a majority of all the members elected to each branch of the legislature, and the vote entered upon the journal of each house." Section 20 provides that "Every bill shall be read on three different days in each separate house, unless, in case of urgency, two-thirds of the house where each bill is depending shall deem it expedient to dispense with this rule; and no bill shall be passed by either house until it shall have been read twice at length." The subject is one of great importance in its effect upon the state, and I approach it with the sole aim of faithfully ascertaining the intention of the framers of the instrument; the consequences of their action are with them, and not with the courts. There are many provisions in constitutions and statutes which, though explicit in terms, are construed to be only directory; but this results from the nature of the particular provision, being confined to the regulation of the time or manner in which an act is to be performed, and where it is apparent that it was not designed to be operative as a condition, limitation or restriction upon the performance of the act enjoined or permitted, and must be generally governed by the nature of the subject treated of, more than by the language of the law. Clauses which are directory merely, must, in the nature of things, be much more frequent in statutes than in constitutions; because, to the former is committed the modus operandi, in minute detail, of the whole working system of the government, while the latter is confined to the more general establishment of the fundamental principles upon which, and the conditions and limitations under which, the system is to operate. Statutes command acts to be done, impose duties and obligations, and point out the road to their performance; to insure certainty and regularity throughout the country, the time when, the place where, and the manner in which the command is to be obeyed are generally particularized; but as the execution of the mandate is the principal object and aim of the law, a departure from the mode provided is often, where the public good demands it, and private rights are not interfered with in consequence of it, held not to invalidate the act, or, in other words, the provisions are declared to be directory only.

There is a very material difference between provisions of apparently similar import in statutes and constitutions, and their meaning must be determined by the application of different rules and reasons. A constitution, and especially the legislative branch of our constitution, is not a creative instrument. Beyond the establishment of the legislature, it is but a system of limitations and restrictions upon the power of that body. It commands the performance of no act by the legislature, but declares that if they do act, that action shall be in a certain manner, and within prescribed boundaries.

The general power to legislate upon all subjects within the proper province of such a body is presumed by the constitution, and it is only such matters as are designed to be withdrawn from their jurisdiction that the constitution takes especial care of. It will be conceded at once, that should a law violate any of the restrictions in the constitution pertaining to the subject matter, as by restraining the liberty of the press, denying the right of trial by jury, introducing slavery, or otherwise, it would be void; this result would, however, be solely because the legislature had exceeded its jurisdiction; if, therefore, there is no instance in which the legislature can transcend the constitutional boundaries in regard to the subject matter of a law, it can only be permitted to do so in relation to the prescribed mode of its enactment, on the supposition that the same reasons did not exist for limiting its action in this respect as obtained in the other.

I will examine whether the framers of the constitution intended the provisions of sections 13, 20, . . . of art. 4, or any of them above cited, to be merely directory upon the legislature. This investigation will lead me to a review of the legislation as practiced previously in the territory. Such changes as are instituted by the constitution, and departures from established practices when we were acting without any constitution but that of the United States and the Organic Act, must be considered as providing for some deficiency or intended to check some abuse which existed previously in the legislative department. The courts may have recourse to legislative proceedings, rules, journals and statutes, also to contemporaneous debates and undisputed history, to enlighten themselves on these points. Previous to the constitution, a majority of either house of the legislature was a quorum to transact business; and laws could be passed by a single member voting in the affirmative, if no one voted against him; however objectionable this may have been, it was less liable to abuse in bodies composed of a small number of members than in more numerous assemblies. Each house made its own rules, and could alter them at pleasure by such vote as they should by rule provide. The power to determine the rules of proceeding in the separate houses is continued by sec. 4, art. 4, but with exceptions which are specially enumerated, among which is that "no law shall be passed unless voted for by a majority of all the members elected to each branch of the legislature, and the vote entered upon the journal of each house." Sec. 13, art. 4. This is particularly directed at the practice under the former system which would be more liable to abuse by the contemplated increase of the number of the legislators, and its observance is essential to the validity of a law. If an act fails to receive the requisite number of affirmative votes, to be evidenced by the journal, it is as fatally defective as if it had failed to receive the sanction of the executive. The effect of the provision is to count every member of the body that does not vote affirmatively as voting against the passage of the act.

The next exception to the general power to pass rules is by sec. 20, of art. 4. "Every bill shall be read on three different days in each separate house, unless in case of urgency two-thirds of the house where such bill is depending shall deem it expedient to dispense with such rule. And no bill shall be passed by either house until it shall have been previously read twice at length."

The requirement to read in each house on three different days is not imperative, but is qualified by the permission granted to change the rule by a two-third vote in cases of urgency. The houses are left free to change their rules by such vote as they may adopt on other matters, but in this respect a two-third vote is required; it is clear, therefore, that the makers of the constitution attached great importance to the provision, and greater force is given to this view from the latter clause of the section which permits no bill to pass unless read twice at length, and no power is given to the legislature to change this rule under any circumstances; we would be led to the conclusion, by these provisions standing alone, that although a case of urgency might allow a departure from the former by a two-third vote, yet no circumstances could justify a failure to read the bill twice at length, and that to give effect to a law it must be done. Secs. 21 and 11, of art. 4, place it beyond doubt that a compliance with these rules is essential to the passage of a law, and not merely directory. Sec. 21 declares that every bill shall be signed by the presiding officer of each house, and provides a punishment for refusing so to sign; and then to prevent a failure of the law in consequence of an officer not signing, which would have been the effect of the provision standing alone, it provides that "in case of such refusal, each house shall by rule provide the manner in which such bill shall be properly certified for presentation to the governor." Sec. 11, in harmony with the other provisions, declares that "every bill which shall have passed the senate and house of representatives, in conformity to the rules of each house, and the joint rules of the two houses, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the governor," &c. It would seem by this recognition, that the rules of the houses were designed to be placed upon the same footing with the rules incorporated in the constitution; but we will not decide anything but what is strictly within the case at bar.

From the constitution alone, I think sufficient can be gathered to show that these provisions were intended to be absolute, and that the validity of legislation should depend upon a compliance with them, as much as upon that of any other limitation or restriction contained in the instrument. Experience has proved the necessity, from the loose and dangerous manner in which legislation had been conducted, of imposing some checks upon it, and although I may be of opinion that the constitution has erred on the other extreme, still, being satisfied that such was the intention of the framers of the instrument, I have but to expound, and not change or question that intention. The debates of the convention, presided over by Governor Sibley, show an energetic effort on the part of several members to defeat the passage of several of the provisions which we have been discussing, for the reason that the effect of them would be to make the validity of laws dependent upon their fulfillment, which resulted in the convention rejecting all amendments and adopting them substantially as reported from the committee, except in the case of section 21, of art. 4, where the qualifying clause at the end of the section was adopted, or the presiding officer of each house would in effect have possessed a veto power superior to that of the executive, as there would have been no possible relief except in expulsion, and that would have been, in most cases, ineffectual to prevent the mischief. No member, in the debate, took the ground that the effect of these provisions would be only directory, but all regarded them as intended to impose an unqualified obligation upon the legislature. Debates, pp. 231-271.

In the convention presided over by Mr. Balcombe, the report from the legislative committee contained only the provision that a majority should vote for each bill, in order to pass it—§ 22, p. 86 of Report of Debates. In the debate, this provision was considered as imperative, and was stricken out for that reason—Debates, pp. 201, 202, one member only taking a different view. There can be no doubt that the convention meant these provisions to be more than directory, and we must so decide.

A knowledge of the character of the legislation which preceded the forming of a state constitution, will show that a very vicious system prevailed of inserting matter in acts which was entirely foreign to that expressed in the title, and by this means securing the passage of laws which would never have received the sanction of the legislature, had the members known the contents of the act; it was to prevent frauds of this nature that section 27 of article 4 was passed, and it has, and was intended to have, the effect of defeating the action of the legislature, even if the members are so inattentive as to overlook such extraneous matter after the bill has been read twice at length, under section 20. The system is thorough, and means to secure to the people fair and intelligible legislation, free from all the tricks and finesse which have heretofore disgraced it. A similar provision is in the constitution of California, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, and perhaps other states; in some, it has been held to be directory, in others, essential. If it is only directory, it is senseless, but if held to mean what it imports, it is an advance in the science of government worthy of imitation by all states and countries whose legislatures are not absolute. . . .

If my solution of the difficulty presented by the journal entries is the correct one, then the bill which was passed in the house was read a sufficient number of times and passed that body by a constitutional majority; and in the senate it was read three times on the same day under a suspension of the rules, and received a sufficient number of votes to pass it. Where journals are kept as loosely as these seem to be, the court will endeavor to sustain a law, if its constitutional passage can be spelled out of them; but in this case the difficulty seems susceptible of explanation quite satisfactorily. . . .

The writ of mandamus should issue.

NOTES

(1) People v. Supervisors of Chenango, 8 N.Y. 317 (1853): A further provision of present Article 3, § 14 of the Constitution of New York, that "upon the last reading of a bill . . . the question upon its final passage shall be taken immediately thereafter, and the ayes and nays entered on the journal" was construed, so far as it requires the entering of ayes and nays on the journal, to be directory and not mandatory. But see Rumsey v. N. Y. & N. E. R. R. Co., 130 N.Y. 88, 28 N.E. 763 (1891).

(2) Frazier v. Board of Com'rs, Guilford County, 194 N.C. 49, 52, 138 S.E. 433, 435 (1927): "The signatures of the presiding officers of both houses of the General Assembly, affixed to said bill, certifying that same was duly ratified in each house, is conclusive, not only of its ratification, but also of its passage by the General Assembly of North Carolina, in accordance with the provisions of article 2, § 23 of the Constitution of North Carolina; i.e., that the bill . . . was read three times in each house and duly passed and ratified by both houses." The court held further, however, that such certificate is not sufficient to show that the bill was passed in accordance with other constitutional requirements which it described as mandatory.

STATE ex rel. KOHLMAN v. WAGNER

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1915. 130 Minn. 424, 153 N.W. 749.

HALLAM, J. Petitioner was prosecuted in the St. Paul municipal court for selling intoxicating liquors without a license, on May 10, 1915, at a place outside of any city, village or borough. He justified under a license issued by the board of county commissioners of Ramsey county, May 3, 1915. The state invokes chapter 147, Laws 1915, which forbids the issuance of any license to sell intoxicating liquors except in cities, villages and boroughs. The municipal court held petitioner to the grand jury and committed him to the custody of defendant sheriff. Petitioner procured a writ of habeas corpus to test the legality of the commitment. The trial court discharged him, and the state appealed. The case turns on the validity of chapter 147, Laws 1915. If that statute is valid, petitioner was properly committed. It is conceded that the statute was within the power of the Legislature to enact. The contention is that it was not properly enacted. It is conceded that the statute was passed by a majority of both houses of the Legislature and signed by the Governor. It is claimed that it was not read before its passage in the House of Representatives at the times required by the state Constitution.

1. Article 4, § 20, of the Constitution provides that:

"Every bill shall be read on three different days in each separate house, unless, in case of urgency, two-thirds of the house where such bill is depending shall deem it expedient to dispense with this rule."

We are of the opinion that the constitutional requirement as to reading on different days is mandatory and must be complied with unless dispensed with as therein provided. It was so held in Supervisors Ramsey County v. Heenan, 2 Minn. 330 (Gil. 281). We believe the reasons given in the Heenan Case for this construction are sound, and we follow the rule of that case.

2. We are also of the opinion that "two-thirds of the house," as used in section 20, means two-thirds of the whole membership of the house, and not two-thirds of a quorum of the house. Otherwise this constitutional rule might in some cases be suspended by less than the number required to pass a bill. We cannot think that this was intended. The construction given to similar provisions in other parts of the Constitution has always been in accordance with the construction which we here adopt. State v. Gould, 31 Minn. 189, 17 N.W. 276; Palmer v. Bank of Zumbrota, 72 Minn. 266, 75 N.W. 380.

3. In the house this bill was read the first time on March 31st, and the second time on April 10th. These two readings were on different days and were in strict accordance with the constitutional rule. The third reading alone is in question. The bill was read the third time on April 10th, that is, on the same day as the second reading. The third reading was irregular unless two-thirds of the house did as it had power to do, "dispense with this rule." We approach consideration of this question with the fact before us that this bill was duly enrolled, authenticated by the presiding officer of each house, signed by the Governor of the state, and filed with the Secretary of State, all in compliance with the Constitution of the state.

It is the rule of many courts that this is conclusive of the regular passage of the bill, and the tendency of recent judicial opinion is against the right of the courts to go back of the enrolled act to determine by extrinsic evidence whether the bill was regularly enacted into law. Sutherland, Stat.Const., p. 72; 2 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1350; Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. State, 28 Okl. 94, 113 Pac. 921, 40 L.R.A.N.S., 1; State ex rel. Hoover v. Chester, 39 S.C. 307, 17 S.E. 752; Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 12 Sup.Ct. 495, 36 L.Ed. 294; 24 Harv. Law Rev. 49. See, also, Webster v. City of Little Rock, 44 Ark. 536, and State v. Frank, 60 Neb. 327, 83 N.W. 74.

This court, however, in accord with the greater number of decisions, at an early date held that the courts have power to go back of the enrolled bill and look to the legislative journals to ascertain the manner in which the bill was passed, and if it appears from the journal that some requirement of the Constitution was violated in the manner of its passage, then to declare that the bill never became a law. Supervisors Ramsey County v. Heenan, 2 Minn. 330 (Gil. 281); State v. City of Hastings, 24 Minn. 78; Burt v. Winona & St. Peter R. Co., 31 Minn. 472, 18 N.W. 285, 289; State v. Peterson, 38 Minn. 143, 36 N.W. 443; Lincoln v. Haugan, 45 Minn. 451, 48 N.W. 196. See In re Drainage District No. 1, 26 Idaho, 311, 143 Pac. 299, L.R.A. 1915A, 1210. The authority of these decisions may have been shaken by Miesen v. Canfield, 64 Minn. 513, 67 N.W. 632, but we are not disposed at this time to overrule them.

4. This much, however, is clear: There is a presumption that an enrolled bill, duly authenticated, was passed in a constitutional manner, this presumption is very strong; the evidence to overcome this presumption must be very strong and clear. It is not too much to say that the presumption in favor of regular enactment of a law is as great as the presumption in favor of the constitutionality of the subject-matter of a law, and the rule in such cases is that the law is to be upheld unless its unconstitutionality is made to appear beyond a reasonable doubt. Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 270, 6 L. Ed. 606; Curryer v. Merrill, 25 Minn. 1, 4, 33 Am.Rep. 450; Lommen v. Minneapolis Gaslight Co., 65 Minn. 196, 208, 68 N.W. 53, 33 L.R.A. 437, 60 Am.St.Rep. 450. This presumption of regularity in the passage of an act is not overcome by the failure of the legislative journals to show that the constitutional requirements as to procedure were followed. The enrolled bill stands as law unless it affirmatively appears on the face of the journal that some constitutional requirement was not followed. Mere silence of the journal will not "convict the Legislature of having violated the Constitution." State v. Frank, 60 Neb. 327, 333, 83 N.W. 74, 75; State v. City of Hastings, 24 Minn. 78; State v. Peterson, 38 Minn. 143, 36 N.W. 443; In re Ellis' Estate, 55 Minn. 401, 56 N.W. 1056, 23 L.R.A. 287, 43 Am.St.Rep. 514; Miesen v. Canfield, 64 Minn. 513, 67 N.W. 632; In re Drainage Dist. No. 1, 26 Idaho, 311, 143 Pac. 299, L.R.A.1915A, 1210; Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) p. 195.

5. The next question then is, Does it affirmatively appear on the face of the journal that the house acted without dispensing with this rule? We think it does not. Unfortunately it is with some difficulty that we are able to determine what journal the house really made. G.S.1913, § 41, provides that:

"A journal of the daily proceedings in each house shall be printed and laid before each member at the beginning of the next day's session. After it has been publicly read and corrected, a copy of such journal, kept by the secretary and chief clerk, respectively, and a transcript thereof as approved, shall be certified by such secretary or clerk to the printer, who shall print the corrected sheets for the permanent journal."

The statute thus provides for a printed daily journal, and a permanent journal, complete, for the whole session, compiled from the daily journal. Another statute in terms makes both "the printed journals of said houses, respectively, published by authority of law," and the "journals of the Senate and House of Representatives kept by the respective clerks thereof as provided by law, and deposited in the office of the Secretary of State" evidence thereof in all cases whatsoever. G.S.1913, § 8414. This plainly makes both the daily printed journal and the permanent journal evidence in any court. See Lincoln v. Haugan, 45 Minn. 451, 48 N.W. 196.

The bill which resulted in the act in question was introduced in the Senate as house file No. 719. The printed daily journal and the permanent journal of the house for April 10th, the sixty-seventh legislative day, are both before us, and they are in conflict. The permanent journal shows:

S. F. 719 reported by a majority of the temperance committee with the recommendation that it be amended, and that when so amended it be reported without recommendation. A minority report recommended that the bill pass without amendment.

The minority report was adopted.

"Mr. Bjornson moved the rule be suspended and that S. F. No. 719 * * * be read the second and third times and placed upon its final passage. . . ."

"The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and the roll being called, there were yeas 77 and nays 29."

The journal then reads, "So the motion prevailed," but in fact it did not receive the affirmative vote of two-thirds of the entire membership of the house and it did not prevail.

"S. F. No. 719 was read the second time."

Some amendments were offered and voted down.

"Mr. Bjornson moved the previous question. Which motion prevailed."

"S. F. 719 . . . was read the third time and placed upon its final passage."

"The question being taken on the passage of the bill, and the roll being called, there were yeas 94 and nays 10."

There is much more than this in the journal, but nothing more that is important here.

The printed daily journal differs from the permanent journal in this: In the place where appears the motion to suspend the rules the language in the daily journal is as follows:

"Mr. Bjornson moved the rule be suspended, and that H. F. 719 [an entirely different bill, relating to the subject of intoxicating liquors] . . . be read the second and third times and placed upon its final passage."

This condition of the house records emphasizes the necessity of the exercise of great caution in setting aside a law passed by a majority of both houses and signed by the Governor on the evidence of legislative journals.

We are of the opinion that this law must be sustained, whichever may be the authorized journal of the house.

6. We have this situation: The printed daily journal is wholly silent as to what motions were made dispensing with the constitutional rule against a third reading of the bill on this day. If we accept this as the authorized journal of the house we are compelled, by giving force to the presumption of regularity, to sustain the law.

7. If we accept the permanent journal as the authorized journal of the house, the same result must be reached. The contention of the petitioner is that the failure of the motion that the rules be suspended and the bill "be read the second and third times and placed upon its final passage" to receive the requisite two-thirds vote is an affirmative showing that the house did not dispense with the constitutional rule as to two readings in one day. We cannot so hold. If a vote had been taken upon the question of dispensing with the constitutional rule, and upon that question alone, and the vote had been adverse, we should consider that such a vote was an affirmative showing that the house refused to dispense with the rule, for it would not be presumed in such a case that the house took action contrary to that affirmatively shown upon the journal. But this is not the situation here. At the time the vote to suspend the rules was taken the bill had not been read a second time. There was nothing in the constitutional rule that forbade a second reading at once. A house rule did forbid a second reading of the bill until another order of business was reached. Another house rule required that after the second reading the bill go to the committee of the whole. It was the apparent purpose of the motion to suspend both these rules. A motion to suspend these rules would have presented no constitutional question. But it was desired also that the bill be read a third time after its second reading and during that day. So in order to accomplish the double purpose of suspending the house rules as to order of business, and the constitutional rule as to time of reading of bills, the motion was put in the form above given, a form in common use in such cases. But it is quite manifest that an adverse vote upon the question of suspending the house rules prescribing order of business would not be tantamount to an adverse vote upon the question of dispensing with the constitutional rule prescribing the time for the reading of bills. A member might be of a mind to suspend either but not the other. Equally certain is it that when a motion to suspend the constitutional rule as to reading of bills is combined with a motion to suspend the house rules as to order of business, and such combined motion is made and voted on before the occasion for suspension of the constitutional rule has yet arisen, no presumption arises that members voting against such combined motion are opposed to two readings of the bill on the same day, nor is there any presumption that they did not at a proper time dispense with the constitutional rule.

8. There was affirmative action by the house of still greater force as evidence than these presumptions. It appears to us that both the permanent and the daily journals show affirmatively a manifest purpose on the part of the house to dispense with the constitutional rule. We must not lose sight of the fact that the constitutional rule against the second and third readings of a bill on the same day is one which two-thirds of the house might dispense with at pleasure. It was not necessary to dispense with this rule in any formal manner. All that is required is that the house in some unequivocal manner manifest its purpose to dispense with the rule. A motion that the bill be read a third time on the same day as its second reading, or a motion that the bill be placed upon its final passage on the day of its second reading, would unquestionably operate as a suspension of the rule against third reading on the same day. State v. Peterson, 38 Minn. 143, 36 N.W. 443, illustrates this. In that case the question arose as to whether this same constitutional rule was suspended. The journal showed that the bill "was read the first time, and on motion of Mr. Potter the bill was read the second time." The court said:

"It will be presumed, in support of the action of the Legislature, that the motion for the second reading was adopted by the requisite two-thirds vote, and that the house deemed it a proper case to dispense with the rule, and to proceed with the second reading out of its regular order. The rule must therefore necessarily have been suspended, and the procedure regular."

See Worthen v. Badgett, 32 Ark. 496, 516. In the case at bar, after the bill had been read the second time, and after all proposed amendments had been disposed of, "Mr. Bjornson moved the previous question, which motion prevailed." The previous question was then the third reading of the bill and the passage of the bill. The effect of an affirmative vote upon this motion was to order a third reading and to bring the house to a direct vote upon the bill. The number voting upon the motion for the previous question does not appear. It is presumed the vote was sufficient for all purposes. As far as appears it may have been unanimous. The question being then taken upon the passage of the bill, there were yeas 94 and nays 10. There can be no doubt upon this record that the house intended to dispense with the rule which would forbid a third reading of the bill or a vote upon the bill upon the sixty-seventh legislative day, and that it manifested such intent. It would be difficult to give reasons which would convince a mind unaccustomed to legal quiddities, that those who in effect voted to put this bill upon its final passage on the sixty-seventh legislative day, and who, when the bill was put upon its final passage, voted for the bill, could all the time have been withholding their consent to the indispensable third reading of the bill on that day. We are of the opinion that when the house on the sixty-seventh day, by a vote sufficient for all purposes, adopted a motion, the necessary effect of which was to order a third reading of the bill and to place the bill upon its final passage, and then passed the bill by a vote of 72 per cent. of all the members of the house, it must be said that two-thirds of the membership of the house manifested a purpose to dispense with the constitutional rule forbidding the third reading of the bill on that day.

9. In view of these considerations, it is not of vital importance whether the daily printed journal or the permanent journal was the authorized journal of the house. We are of the opinion, however, that the only authorized journal of the house was the daily printed journal. On the sixty-eighth day, upon convening of the house, the reading of the journal of the preceding day was dispensed with and the journal "approved as corrected." What, if any, corrections had been made do not appear. Thereupon the Speaker made an oral statement that he had been in error in ruling on the preceding day that the motion to suspend the rules had been carried, and expressed the opinion that the action of the house in passing the bill was not in accordance with the Constitution. Thereupon motion was made for the approval "of the journal of the sixty-seventh day as printed." This motion prevailed. The action of the house clearly made the daily printed journal of the proceedings of the sixty-seventh day the only authorized journal of that day's proceedings. No officer of the house, nor any other person, had thereafter any authority to change the printed journal. The Speaker doubtless took this view when he later affixed his signature to the bill and transmitted it to the Governor as a bill passed by the house.

Judgment reversed.

38 Rep.Pa.B.A. 381, 414-417 (1932).

The question is often asked by laymen and uninformed lawyers, as well, why are three readings of bills required? What purpose is thereby served? Does not the practice unduly delay the procedure of the Legislature? A word concerning the history of the practice will at once be informative and responsive to the questions. The constitutional provision that every bill must be given three readings before it is considered for final passage is not singular with us. When the practice took its present form is not known, but evidently it had been established at the time when the journals of House of Lords began in the time of Henry VIII and those of the House of Commons with Edward VI in 1547. It may be safely inferred that at this time the practice prevailed. In Sir Thomas More's "Utopia" published in 1615 we find the following language suggestive of the three reading custom: "One rule observed in their council, is, never to debate a thing on the same day on which it is first proposed; for that is always referred to the next meeting, that so men may not rashly and in the heat of discourse engage themselves too soon, which might bias themselves so much that they might rather study to support their first opinions than by perverse and preposterous sort of shame hazard their country rather than endanger their own reputation or venture the being suspected to have wanted foresight in the expedients that they at first proposed, and therefore to prevent this they take care that they may be deliberate rather than sudden in their motions."

In William Penn's "Charter of Liberty to Pennsylvania" in 1682, provision was made as follows: "Unless on suddain and indispensable occasions no business in Provincial Council or its respective Committees shall be finally determined the same day it is moved." The Continental Congress in Philadelphia in 1774 adopted this rule: "No question shall be determined the day on which it is agitated and debated.

if anyone of the colonies desires the determination to be postponed to another day." Notice should be taken that William Penn foresaw the necessity of dispensing with the rigidity of the rule in case of emergency; that the Continental Congress did not absolutely require that the question be determined on a separate day. The constitutions of thirty states now require three readings of bills on separate days. Four permit two readings on the same days. Twenty of these states, not including Pennsylvania have made it possible to dispense with the three readings required in cases of emergency.

Article III Section 4 of the Constitution of Pennsylvania not only provides that every bill must be read on three "different" days in each House but that each bill must be read "at length." The purpose of such a provision can be no other than to secure adequate information to the members. When printing was unknown, or little used, and members of legislative bodies were illiterate, the reading of bills may have been necessary. But surely this is not the case today. Nor is the constitutional mandate in practice complied with by the Reading Clerk, whose duty it is to make known the contents of a bill when reached on the calendar. First readings are disposed of by a rapid, mumbled reading of the title, second readings are disposed of by a reading, in like manner, of the title and of the first few lines of each section of bill. Often only a few of the early sections of a lengthy bill are read. On the third reading a like course is pursued. No beneficial purpose is served by this constitutional requirement. First of all it is not observed. If it were, the legislative session would thereby be lengthened to at least the extent of four and probably six months. Secondly, members pay little or no attention to the reading by the clerks. Daily calendars are furnished each member. Files containing the printed bills are on the desk of each member. The rules of the Assembly provide that copies of a bill must be in the members' files before the measure may be called for consideration. The Speaker with scrupulous care calls the bill for consideration. Each bill is clearly identified by its bill number, calendar number and page position on the calendar. An attentive and interested legislator finds no difficulty in following the proceedings. The reading of the bills, at length, would be a tremendous waste of time. Even so much of the reading as is now pursued is a waste of time. Members are not benefited. No man able to read would try to understand the bill as read by the clerk so long as printed copies of the bill are available. The printing press has taken from the reading "at length" rule every purpose for which it was intended. Experience proves the requirement wholly useless. In the Constitutional Convention of 1919, an effort to this end failed although strongly recommended. The late Judge Mayer Sulzberger, a delegate at that convention, thus expressed his thought on this matter: "Might it not mean that it shall be read at length by the legislator who has it before him and has not the legislative practice established that as the true meaning. You cannot read without reading, and if you read it, you read it at length." He thought that cutting out the words "at length" would not relieve the situation. The debate at that convention disclosed that the failure resulted from the lack of familiarity with the legislative procedure and the real issues involved. Let us hope for success in the next Constitutional Convention when the State Bar Association should make concentrated effort in these respects, at least, to simplify the legislative procedure. For my part such a subject should be a matter for control by rules of the Legislature and not by constitutional provision.

SECTION 5. THE LEGISLATURE AS AN ENTITY: CONTINUATION OF ITS POWERS AFTER ADJOURNMENT

PEOPLE v. REARDON

Court of Appeals of New York, 1906. 184 N.Y. 431, 77 N.E. 970.

Appeal from Supreme Court, Appellate Division, First Department.

Habeas corpus proceedings by the people, on relation of Albert J. Hatch, against Edward Reardon, a peace officer of the county of New York. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (97 N.Y.S. 535, 110 App.Div. 821) affirming an order dismissing the writ and remanding relator to custody, relator appeals. Affirmed.

On the 8th of June, 1905, the relator was arrested under a warrant issued by a justice of the Court of Special Sessions of the city of New York, charging him with the commission of a misdemeanor in that on the 7th of June, 1905, at the city of New York, he violated chapter 241, p. 474, of the Laws of 1905 "by the sale and delivery of certain shares of stock of certain railroad corporations without making any bill or memorandum of such sale, or affixing any stamp or stamps to such a bill or memorandum, or in any way paying the tax as required by said act." . . . A writ of habeas corpus issued to test the validity of said statute was dismissed by the justice of the Supreme Court before whom it was returnable, and the usual order remanding to custody was made. Upon appeal to the Appellate Division, the order was affirmed, one of the justices dissenting, and the relator appealed to this court.

VANN, J. (after stating the facts). The issue of law joined by the petition, return and reply is whether the Legislature had power to enact, and did in fact enact, chapter 241, p. 474, of the Laws of 1905, which provides for a tax on the sale and transfer of stock certificates. That act is part of the tax law, which it amends by adding a new article known as No. 15. It imposes a tax "on all sales, or agreements to sell, or memoranda of sales or deliveries or transfers of shares or certificates of stock in any domestic or foreign association, company or corporation, made after the first day of June, 1905," of two cents "on each hundred dollars of face value or fraction thereof." Payment of the tax must be denoted by an adhesive stamp or stamps affixed in a manner adapted to the circumstances of the sale. A violation of the act by a transfer without payment of the tax is made a misdemeanor and may be punished by fine, or imprisonment, or both, and the offender is also subject to "a civil penalty of five hundred dollars for each violation," to be recovered by the state comptroller in any court of competent jurisdiction. The statute further provides that no transfer of stock without payment of the tax "shall be made the basis of any action or legal proceedings, nor shall proof thereof be offered or received in evidence in any court in this state." The taxes thus imposed "and the revenues thereof shall be paid by the state comptroller into the state treasury and be applicable to the general fund, and to the payment of all claims and demands which are a lawful charge thereon." The act is attacked as invalid on the ground that it was prematurely passed before it had been on the desks of the members of the Legislature in its final form for at least three calendar legislative days prior to its final passage, as required by section 15, article 3 of the Constitution; that it makes an improper classification; that the tax is imposed on a wrong basis; that it is imposed upon property without the state, and that the act violates the commerce clause of the federal Constitution. After carefully considering these objections, we have reached the conclusion that they are not well founded, and the following are our reasons, so far as we have found time to express them:

First. The statute in question originated, as a bill, in the Senate, where it was amended from time to time and reprinted as often as it was amended. Printed copies thereof, as it was when introduced and as it was each time after it was amended, were promptly placed on the desks of the members of both houses when it was introduced and after each amendment. This was not required by any written rule of the Legislature but was in accordance with the general practice that has prevailed since the Constitution of 1894 was adopted. The bill was passed by the Senate on the 3d of April, 1905, was sent to the Assembly for its concurrence on the 4th, and was finally passed by that body on the 5th, neither the Governor nor the acting Governor having certified to the necessity of its immediate passage. The journal of the Assembly states that the bill was "printed and on the desks of the members in its final form at least three calendar legislative days prior to its final passage." These are, in substance, the facts relating to the subject as alleged in the petition for the writ and not denied in the return. The Constitution provides that "No bill shall be passed or become a law unless it shall have been printed and upon the desks of the members, in its final form, at least three calendar legislative days prior to its final passage, unless the Governor, or the acting Governor, shall have certified to the necessity of its immediate passage, under his hand and the seal of the state." Const. art. 3, § 15. The object of this provision, which first appeared in the Constitution of 1894, is to prevent hasty and careless legislation, to prohibit amendments at the last moment and to secure more publicity than had been required before. Care was taken to provide for emergencies by a certificate of necessity from the Governor, which authorizes immediate action. The requirement is not directory, but mandatory, as is obvious from the form of the command, which prohibits a bill from becoming a law without compliance therewith. The question is, who are meant by "the members" upon whose desks the printed bill is to be placed? Does the provision mean that the members of the Legislature are to have the bill on their desks for three days prior to its final passage, which was the fact in instance before us; or that the members of the house in which it originated must first have it on their desks for three days, and after they have passed it the members of the other house must have it on their desks for three days more before they can pass it? If the latter is the true meaning of the requirement, it was not obeyed, for the bill was passed by the Assembly on the second day after it was passed by the Senate.

The Constitution created the Legislature as an entity, consisting of two houses, the Senate and Assembly. In every article, except the last, which relates only to the date of operation, and in almost every section it recognizes the existence of the Legislature, as such. Grants of power are made to the Legislature and restrictions upon the exercise of power are directed to the Legislature, not to the Senate and Assembly. Both senators and assemblymen are members of the Legislature, and as such are required to take an oath of office. Article 13, § 1. The command of the people is addressed to the Legislature continuously throughout the fundamental law. Thus it provides that "no member of the Legislature shall receive any civil appointment within this State . . . during the time for which he shall have been elected," and that "no person shall be eligible to the Legislature" under certain circumstances (article 3, §§ 7, 8); directs that "the members" shall not be questioned "for any speech or debate in either house of the Legislature" (Id. & 12); that senators and members of Assembly shall be elected on a day named "unless otherwise directed by the Legislature" (Id. § 9); that "no private or local bill, which may be passed by the Legislature, shall embrace more than one subject" (Id. § 16); that "the Legislature shall not pass a private or local bill" in certain cases (Id. § 18); that "the Legislature shall neither audit nor allow any private claim or account against the state" (Id. § 19); that the Governor may "convene the Legislature, or the Senate only, on extraordinary occasions," and shall "communicate by message to the Legislature" (article 4, § 4); speaks of "the final adjournment of the Legislature" (Id. § 9); "the Legislature at its next meeting" (Id. § 5), and the "next session of the Legislature" (article 5, § 7); authorizes the Legislature to alter judicial districts and create judicial departments (article 6, §§ 1, 2); prohibits "the Legislature" from selling certain canals (article 7, § 8), and from suspending specie payments (article 8, § 5); requires it to provide a system of free common schools (article 9, § 1); to provide for filling vacancies in office (article 10, § 5); to organize the militia (article 11, § 3); to incorporate cities and villages (article 12, §§ 1, 2); and to submit proposed amendments to the people (article 14, § 1).

Many other sections, containing similar provisions, might be cited but the foregoing are sufficient to show that while the Senate and Assembly are separate bodies, they constitute the Legislature; that their united action becomes the act of the Legislature and that the members of both houses are members of the Legislature. A bill is the draf of a proposed statute submitted to the Legislature for enactment. It cannot become a law by the action of the Senate alone, or of the Assembly alone, but only by the action of both, when it becomes an act of the Legislature, subject to the approval of the Governor. It may originate in either house and when introduced in either it is before the Legislature, or else no bill can ever get before it, for each house is part of the Legislature. When, therefore, the Constitution provides that no bill shall be passed unless it shall have been printed and upon the desks of "the members" in its final form for a certain period, it means the members of the Legislature, not the members of the Senate and Assembly, merely as such. This is emphasized by the contrast in the form of the command when action is required by the members of each house separately, as in section 20 of article 3 relating to the requirement of "a two-third vote" upon a bill "appropriating the public moneys or property for local or private purposes." There the command is addressed "to the members elected to each branch of the Legislature," separately, instead of to the members of the Legislature, collectively, which is the usual form. When the Constitution speaks of three calendar legislative days it means three calendar days of the Legislature, or days when the Legislature is in session. It does not mean six days, which the construction contended for would involve. The bill in its final form, that is in the form in which it becomes a law, must be on the desks of all members of both houses for three days before it is passed by either. But one occasion for placing it on the desks is named, not two separate occasions, the first confined to one house and the second to the other. All members of the Legislature are thus given notice of every bill when introduced into either house and when amended by either house. No reprinting is required as the bill goes from one house to the other unless it has been amended, and whenever amended it must be reprinted. Every member is informed at once of bills pending in either house, so that he can promptly study the proposed legislation, communicate with his constituents, note the comments of the press, observe the state of public opinion and appear before the committee to which the bill is referred in the house of its origin for the purpose of making suggestions before he is called upon to vote in his own house. It prevents artful and dangerous amendments just before the final vote, which was formerly a great evil. It has the same effect, so far as publicity and opportunity for deliberate consideration are concerned, as if every bill were introduced into each house at the same time. The construction thus indicated is reasonable and proper, for it follows the Constitution as written, complies with its spirit and fulfills its purpose. It is in accordance with the practical construction of every Legislature that has been in session since the provision was adopted, and the constitutional debates show that this was the construction of the convention which adopted it. Revised Records, 887, 917. We can give no heed to the criticism of counsel that there is no statute or written rule requiring bills to be placed on the desks of members, for it is not the province of the courts to direct the Legislature how to do its work. It is sufficient for us that the Constitution requires each house "to keep a journal of its proceedings" and that the journal of the Assembly, which may be consulted to support a statute, shows that the constitutional provision in question was complied with when the act before us was passed. Article 3, § 11. . . .

[The court then held, with regard to several contentions of relator-appellant, that the Legislature had the constitutional power to enact the statute in question.]

The order appealed from should be affirmed.

NOTES.

1. In Orfield, "The Unicameral Legislature in Nebraska", 34 Mich.L.Rev. 26 (1935), the author concludes: "The adoption of a unicameral legislative system recommends itself for many reasons. It is more democratic, the bicameral system being based on a division of persons into classes. It is not wholly untried, having been once used in three states, and now existing in eight out of nine Canadian provinces, in the Swiss cantons, in Norway, in several of the countries created since the World War, in our city governments, and in our constitutional conventions; the unicameral principle is applied to the executive and judicial branches of our government, and to the management of business corporations. The function of legislating is made simpler by the unicameral system. The legislature is made a more responsible organ. The possibility of corruption is reduced. More capable legislators are secured. The rapid passage of legislation is secured, though a sufficient degree of deliberation is retained. Expenses of legislative operation are reduced. The planning of comprehensive legislative programs is facilitated.

"The history of other governmental innovations induces the belief that the unicameral legislature is not to be viewed as a universal panacea. Much good can be expected, however, when the unicameral idea is coupled up with other reforms, such as a small number of legislators, adequate salaries, long terms of office, the advice of experts, sound methods of legislative procedure, possibly (as in Nebraska) a non-partisan basis of election, and a parliamentary cabinet executive."

IN RE HAGUE

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1929. 105 N.J.Eq. 134, 147 A. 220.

FALLON, V. C. The record in this case has not been submitted to me. My decision in Ex parte Hague, 104 N.J.Eq. 31, 144 A. 546, of which the present case is a sequence, is dispositive as to this court of the matters in controversy herein other than the questions—(1) whether the joint resolution No. 13, adopted by the legislature of the year 1929 had any vitality after the final adjournment of said body other than to enable the committee appointed thereunder to report; (2) whether the legislature of the year 1929 was authorized to amend and supplement the aforesaid resolution; (3) whether the petitioner herein may be compelled to answer questions propounded to him, which he declined to answer, relating to his private affairs and property. I do of the opinion that each of the aforesaid questions must be answered in the negative. The legislative power vests in a senate and general assembly. State Const., art. 4, Sec. 1 (1. Said bodies meet separately on the second Tuesday in January, at which time of meeting the legislative year commences. State Const., art. 4, Sec. 1) 3. Neither of said bodies are continuous; they expire annually. State v. Rogers, 56 N.J.L. 480, at p. 631, 28 A. 726, 29 A. 173. Although the senate—providing an always-existent membership—may be considered as having a permanent existence, it does not have continuous vitality. State v. Rogers, supra (at p. 622). It is only when the senate and general assembly are lawfully assembled that they constitute the legislature—the law-making body of the state. Each of said bodies are subject, in their action, to constitutional limitations and laws, in common with all other bodies, officers and tribunals within the state. In re Gunn, 50 Kan. 155, 32 P. 470, 19 L.R.A. 519; Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168, 26 L.Ed. 377; Burnham v. Morrissey, 80 Mass. 226, 74 Am.Dec. 676. All powers of the legislature, as such, cease upon the final adjournment of said body. All powers delegated to a committee appointed by a joint resolution of the senate and general assembly also cease. Fergus v. Russel, 270 Ill. 304, 343, 344, 110 N.E. 130, Ann.Cas.1916B, 1120; Bank v. Worth, 117 N.C. 146, 23 S.E. 160. The legislative committee appointed under the aforesaid joint resolution had no authority after the final adjournment of the 1928 legislative session, except to make a report. Bank v. Worth, supra. The legislature constituted for the year 1929 was without power to amend or supplement the aforesaid joint resolution. The power of the legislature is distinguishable, in this respect, from its conceded authority to amend or supplement a law. A joint resolution adopted by a state legislature is not a law. It is of less solemnity than a law, and clearly distinguishable therefrom.

NOTES

(1) In Harpending v. Haight, 39 Cal. 189, 2 Am.Rep. 432 (1870), the governor's messenger took a bill with a veto message to the senate, the house in which the bill originated. Upon finding that the senate had adjourned temporarily, the messenger returned the bill and message to the governor. Held, (1) that this was not a proper return of the bill to the senate, (2) that the senate could not, however, defeat the return by a temporary adjournment which included the last day for the governor to return the bill, and (3) that a proper return could have been made by leaving the bill with an officer or employee of the senate.

" . . . The Executive may return a bill to the Senate, though it be not, at the moment of the return, in actual session. If it has adjourned for the day, or for three days, it still has an organized existence as a legislative body, with its President, Secretary and other officers, to whom, under such circumstances, a substitutional delivery of the bill and message might be made, . . ."

(2) In Edwards v. United States, 286 U.S. 482, 52 S.Ct. 627, 76 L.Ed. 1239 (1932), a question certified by the Court of Claims, i.e., whether a bill approved by the President within ten days after it was presented to him, but after the final adjournment of the Congress which passed it, became law, was answered in the affirmative. The Court quoted from its opinion in La Abra Silver Mining Co. v. U. S., 175 U.S. 423, 20 S.Ct. 168, 44 L.Ed. 223 (1899), where it had held that the President may approve bills during a recess of the Congress: "It is said that the approval by the President of a bill passed by Congress is not strictly an executive function, but is legislative in its nature; and this view, it is argued, conclusively shows that his approval can legally occur only on a day when both Houses are actually sitting in the performance of legislative functions. Undoubtedly the President when approving bills passed by Congress may be said to participate in the enactment of laws which the Constitution requires him to execute. But that consideration does not determine the question before us. As the Constitution while authorizing the President to perform certain functions of a limited number that are legislative in their general nature does not restrict the exercise of those functions to the particular days on which the two Houses of Congress are actually sitting in the transaction of public business, the court cannot impose such a restriction upon the Executive."

BURNS v. SEWELL

GILFILLAN, C. J. Action to enforce a mechanic's lien under Laws 1889, c. 200. The appellants object that, under the constitutional provisions with respect to the passage and approval of bills, that chapter did not become a law. It originated in and passed the house, and going to the senate was amended and passed, and returned to the house, where, as amended, it was passed April 19th. April 22d it was reported enrolled, and sent to the governor. April 23d the legislature adjourned. April 24th the governor approved it. The objection is that, the bill not having passed during the last three days of the session, the governor had no constitutional power to approve it, and, its return to the house being prevented by the adjournment, it failed to become a law. In the ordinary course of enacting and approving laws, as prescribed in the constitution, art. 4, § 11, after passing both houses a bill is to be presented to the governor. If he approve, he shall sign and deposit it in the office of the secretary of state, and notify the house where it originated. It is then a law. If he do not approve, he is to return it, with his objections, to the house where it originated. Then if, upon a reconsideration, it is approved by a two-thirds vote of each house, it becomes a law, notwithstanding the governor's objections. But as the governor might, by omitting to return the bill, deprive the houses of the opportunity to reconsider and pass it over his objections, the section referred to provides: "If any bill shall not be returned by the governor within three days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the legislature, by adjournment within that time, prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law." Under a provision similar to the foregoing in the constitution of New York, it has been held that the adjournment of the legislature within the three days does not prevent a bill becoming a law, if it be signed by the governor, and that the only effect of such adjournment is to prevent it becoming a law merely by failure of the governor to return it, (People v. Bowen, 30 Barb. 24, 21 N.Y. 517;) and also a like provision in the constitution of Illinois, (Seven Hickory v. Ellery, 103 U.S. 423.) This is upon a proper rule of construction. The part of the sentence following the word "unless" relates to and qualifies the preceding part of the sentence, and does not affect the power and duty of the governor to sign the bill if it meets his approval. Immediately following the above-quoted part of the section is: "The governor may approve, sign, and file in the office of the secretary of state, within three days after the adjournment of the legislature, any act passed during the last three days of the session, and the same shall become a law." This does not confer on the governor power to approve bills after the adjournment, for he would have it without the clause, but it is a limitation upon his power, restricting its exercise to the period of three days after the legislature shall adjourn. What in this clause is the meaning of the word "passed?" Ordinarily a bill is said to have passed one of the houses when the final vote in its favor in that house has been taken and announced. Is that the sense in which the constitution is to be understood when speaking of the passage of bills, not by one house, but by the legislature, with reference to action upon them by the governor? For that purpose, is a bill deemed to be passed so long as the house in which it is has control over it, and may reconsider its action upon it? We think not. Section 21 of the article provides: "Every bill passed both houses shall be carefully enrolled, and shall be signed by the presiding officer of each house." When that is done the bill is in condition to be sent to the governor for his action upon it. It is then to be deemed as passed for that purpose. That the word "passed," as used in the constitution, may sometimes include the enrollment and signature by the presiding officers and sending to the governor, is apparent from section 22 of the article, which provides that no bills shall be "passed" on the day of adjournment; and continues: "But this section shall not be so construed as to preclude the enrollment of a bill, or the signature and passage from one house to the other, or the reports thereon from committees, or its transmission to the executive for his signature,"—provisions wholly unnecessary if the word could not include those things. The inconvenient consequences that might arise from using the word in section 11 to indicate merely the final vote upon a bill are so manifest as to furnish a strong presumption that it is not used in that limited sense. It must happen at every session that the final vote on many bills is taken more than three days before the day of adjournment, but which bills it will be impossible to have enrolled and signed, so that they may be sent to the governor, until less than three days remain. In such cases, if the time of passing them is to be computed from the vote, many of them must be lost for want of time on the part of the governor to examine them while the legislature is in session. We think that bills enrolled during the last three days of the session are within the meaning of the clause authorizing the governor to sign them within three days after the adjournment. . . .

NOTE

In State ex rel. Smith v. Ryan, 123 Kan. 767, 256 P. 811 (1927), a similar constitutional provision was held not to confer power on the governor to sign a bill after the adjournment of the legislature, apparently because the adjournment of the legislature prevents the governor from returning the bill with objections. The contention that the governor has such power in the absence of a contrary provision, a proposition assumed in the principal case, was unsuccessful here.

SECTION 6. PROOF OF PROCEDURAL AND TEXTUAL IRREGULARITY: THE SO-CALLED ENROLLED BILL AND JOURNAL ENTRY RULES

WOODWARD v. PEARSON

Supreme Court of Oregon, 1940. 165 Or. 40, 103 P.2d 737.

KELLY, JUSTICE. By this suit, plaintiff, a citizen, property owner and taxpayer of Oregon, challenges the constitutionality of chapter 460, Oregon Laws 1939, p. 907 et seq. This measure is entitled, "An Act To provide for the codification, publication and distribution of the codes and statutes of the state of Oregon; making an appropriation therefor; and declaring an emergency." From an order sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint and dismissing it, plaintiff appeals.

Five grounds are given in support of plaintiff's contention that the act in question is invalid.

The first of these grounds is that chapter 460, supra, was not legally passed or adopted by the legislature; and the mandatory provisions of the Constitution have not been observed in the enactment.

In plaintiff's complaint it is alleged:

"III. That the Senate and the House of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, in its 1939 Session, passed alleged H. B. 494, as amended, appropriated $65,000 for publication of a Code, and as such it was signed by the President of the Senate, Speaker of the House, and on the 21st of March 1939, it was approved and signed by the Governor of the State of Oregon, and is alleged Act, Chapter 460, of Oregon Laws 1939, however, in fact, no such Bill had been introduced in the Senate or House.

"IV. That prior to the passage of said purported H. B. 494, the Senate and House appointed conferees on said alleged House Bill, and thereafter the Senate and House adopted an alleged conferees report, which provided, among other amendments, the following: to strike out the figures $65.00, in the two separate places in paragraph (3) of said H. B. 494, and insert in lieu thereof the figures $62.50; to strike out the figures $35,000 in paragraph (5) thereof, and insert in lieu thereof the figures $31,250; and to strike out the figures $65,000 in paragraph (5) thereof and insert in lieu thereof the figures $62,500.

"V. That when said House and Senate passed said purported H. B. 494, as amended, it omitted therefrom the amendments of the said conferees report as above mentioned, but included all the other amendments in said conferees report, and it was so enrolled, passed and adopted as aforesaid, and by reason thereof said alleged Act, Chapter 460 of the Oregon Laws of 1939, is void, invalid, and of no force and effect."

In the case of a house bill, which has been amended by the house, the original bill and its amendments are delivered to the chairman of the house committee on engrossed bills for engrossment. The engrossed bill, which is merely a redaction of the original bill and its amendments, is sent to the senate. If amendments are made in the senate, the engrossed bill, together with the endorsements thereon showing the course taken and the senate amendments, is sent to the house; if the senate amendments are adopted by the house and the measure passed as thus amended, the house committee on enrolled bills receives the engrossed bill and amendments and makes a redaction therefrom which is the enrolled bill. This enrolled bill is signed by the speaker of the house and the president of the senate and transmitted to the governor. The amendments omitted from the enrolled bill in suit were those recommended by the third joint conference committee appointed after failure of the two houses to agree upon amendments theretofore recommended. The question here presented is whether, in the absence of any record in explanation of this omission, the act is invalid. The question is not a new one in this jurisdiction. In an opinion by Mr. Justice Harris, exhaustively treating the authorities upon the question, the rule is stated thus: "Every reasonable presumption is to be made in favor of the regularity of legislative proceedings. If the Constitution does not require a given proceeding to be entered in the journal, the absence of a record in the journal will not invalidate a law. It will not be presumed from the mere silence of the journal that either house has exceeded its authority or disregarded constitutional requirements in the passage of legislative acts. . . .

In an earlier case, this court, speaking through the late Mr. Justice Robert S. Bean in reference to a similar record, said: "Mere silence of the journal is not sufficient. Within this rule, we think the act in question must be regarded as valid. It nowhere appears in the journal that it did not pass in the form as actually signed by the presiding officers, and now on file in the office of the secretary of state. It is true, the journals show that in its progress through the legislature an amendment was adopted which is not included in the enrolled act; but the vote by which such amendment was adopted may have been reconsidered, and the amendment defeated. At least, the courts are bound to presume such to have been the case. The enrolled act, as filed by the secretary of state, is signed by the officers of the house and senate required by the constitution to sign all bills and joint resolutions passed by their respective bodies, and is therefore officially attested in the manner required by the organic law as one that has regularly and duly passed the legislature, and this attestation must prevail unless the contrary conclusively appears by the journals of their proceedings. State v. Francis, 26 Kan. 724. The constitution requires all bills and joint resolutions to be signed by the presiding officers of the respective houses. Article 4, § 25. And their signatures must be given full force and effect, and import absolute verity, unless affirmatively contradicted by the journals which the constitution requires to be kept." McKinnon v. Cotner, 30 Or. 588, 592, 49 P. 956, 957.

The contention that the act in question is invalid because of the omission mentioned is not tenable. . . .

[The court then discussed several other contentions of the plaintiff, holding against him.]

The judgment and decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

CARLTON v. GRIMES

Supreme Court of Iowa, 1946. 237 Iowa 912, 23 N.W.2d 883.

BLISS, JUSTICE. Chapter 136 of the 51st G.A. (General Assembly) of Iowa, known as S.F. (Senate File) 229 of that Assembly amended section 4644.11, Code 1939, section 309.11, Code 1946, by increasing the tax millage on taxable property leviable annually by county boards of supervisors for secondary road maintenance, and amended section 5093.03, Code 1939, section 324.2, Code 1946, to increase the license fee or tax on motor vehicle gasoline fuel from three cents per gallon to four cents per gallon, and amended section 5093.35, Code 1939, section 324.63, Code 1946, to provide that one cent of the four-cent gasoline tax should be apportioned so that three-fifths thereof would be credited to the secondary road construction fund of the various counties according to the area of each, and that two-fifths of said one cent tax would be credited to the street construction fund of the several incorporated cities and towns of the state in the ratio of their respective populations to the total population of all such cities and towns according to the last Federal census.

The suit was begun May 24, 1945. The statute became effective July 4, 1945. On July 3, 1945, Judge H. D. Evans, of the Eighth Judicial District of Iowa, entered an order in the District Court of Johnson County, Iowa, directing the Treasurer of the State to collect the additional one cent tax and to segregate it and deposit it in banks designated by said court to await its further order on the final determination of this suit. The amount collected approximates $6, 000,000.

Briefly stated the chief contentions of the appellant and ground relied upon for reversal are: first, that S.F. 229 was not passed as required by the Constitution of Iowa in that said Act was amended after being voted upon in both Houses of the Legislature, and was not voted upon or passed in the final form as signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, and approved and signed by the Governor and filed in the office of the Secretary of State. . . .

Taking up first the contention of the appellant that the Legislature violated the requirements of the Constitution of Iowa in the mechanics of the enactment of S.F. 229, we set out the pertinent sections of that instrument.

Sect. 9, Art. III. "Each house shall . . . keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish the same; determine its rules of proceedings . . . ; and shall have all other powers necessary for a branch of the General Assembly of a free and independent state."

In section 9, supra, is the mandate that each house of the Assembly shall keep a journal of its proceedings. There is no constitutional mandate as to just how, or in what manner, the journal of the proceedings shall be kept. "In the absence of a statutory or constitutional requirement regulating the keeping of journals the entries may be of a most cursory nature." (Citing authorities.) Crawford, The Construction of Statutes (1940), sect. 46, pp. 75, 76. A constitutional provision directing each house to keep journals of its own proceedings does not require entries to be made of every action taken on proposed amendments to pending bills. State ex rel. Lane Drug Stores v. Simpson, 122 Fla. 670, 166 So. 262; Id., 122 Fla. 582, 166 So. 227. The only absolute command as to any specific part of the proceedings which must be entered on the journal is the one in section 17 that "the question upon the final passage shall be taken immediately upon its [the bill] last reading, and the yeas and nays entered on the journal." It is only the yeas and nays on the "final passage" of a "bill" which must be entered on the journal. This mandate must always be complied with whether demanded or not demanded. The entry on the journal of the yea and nay vote is not required on an amendment to a bill, or on any other matter or question in the course of the bill's enactment, except as stated in section 10. In that section it is provided that a member of the Assembly may have his protest or dissent, respecting any act or resolution, entered on the journal, and the "yeas and nays of the members of either house, on any question, shall, at the desire of any two members present, be entered on the journals."

There is no requirement in the Iowa Constitution that any bill proposed, engrossed, enrolled, or enacted, or any amendment thereto, or substitute therefor, must be entered on any journal. Therefore the best, and the only recorded legislative evidence of the text and content of any bill enacted, is the enrolled bill authenticated by the signatures of the presiding officers, signed and approved by the Governor, and deposited in the office of the secretary of state.

The practice of reading any proposed bill to legislative bodies has been followed since their inception. It has been a practice quite uniformly recognized that every bill should be read three times, usually on different days. The Constitutions of some of the states require this. There is no such provision in the Iowa Constitution. There is no express requirement that a bill be read any specified number of times before its enactment. The words "its last reading" in section 17, supra, may imply previous reading or readings, and yet a "last reading" may be a first, second, third, or other reading. The purpose of any provisions for reading a bill is to inform the Legislature concerning the nature of the proposed enactment and to prevent hasty legislation. Since all bills are promptly printed and copies are given to each member, and a file thereof is kept on his desk, the matter of reading bills to each assembly has become of less importance and is not so much stressed in Constitutions or assembly rules. See sections 259, 260 and 261, Code 1939, sections 17.15, 17.16 and 17.17, Code 1946, for provisions relative to printing legislative journals and proceedings. In the Legislature of Iowa and in many Legislatures a reading of the title is considered sufficient except for the last reading. Senate rule 17 of the 51st General Assembly provided that "every bill . . . shall have received three several readings previous to its passage; but no bill . . . shall have its second and third readings on the same day, without a suspension of this rule, except on the last legislative day; . . ." Rule 44, of the House rules of the 51st G.A., states: "Every bill shall receive two readings but no bill shall receive its first and last readings on the same day." There is no mandate in the Constitution that the fact of any readings shall be entered on the journal. As said in Luce on Legislative Procedure (1922) p. 210: "Iowa legislators are not hampered by any constitutional obstacles in the matter."

With the exception of the few mandatory provisions noted the Constitution of Iowa has given the General Assembly a free hand in determining its rules of procedure. Whether either chamber strictly observes these rules or waives or suspends them is a matter entirely within its own control or discretion, so long as it observes the mandatory requirements of the Constitution. If any of these requirements are covered by its rules, such rules must be obeyed, but the observance or nonobservance of its remaining rules is not subject to review by the courts. Miller v. City of Oelwein, 155 Iowa 706, 711, 136 N.W. 1045.

There is no controversy in the evidential record and it is short. The appellant offered in evidence the House and Senate journals, and photostats of portions of each pertaining to S.F. 229, a photostatic copy of the original bill S.F. 229 (Ex. "G") and within the folder was a photostatic copy of the House amendment to the bill though the latter was not referred to in the verbal offer of the exhibit. Appellant also offered copies of H.F. 364 and S.F. 292, companion bills offered for an increase in the gasoline tax from three cents to four cents, but these bills were never enacted.

To these Exhibits the appellees offered three-fold objections, substantially as follows: 1. incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, in the best evidence, surplusage and an attempt to impeach the verity of a duly enrolled, signed, approved and filed enactment known

S.F. 229; 2. the enrolled and filed bill constitutes conclusive and exclusive proof of the text of S.F. 229 . . . and no other evidence is material or competent; 3. object to every part of journal records except record of final reading, vote and passage as shown on pages 834, 835 of House journal, as surplusage and an attempt to impeach the verity of said enactment as enrolled, signed, approved and filed. Exhibit "K" a photostatic copy of S.F. 229, as deposited in the office of the secretary of state, was offered by all parties.

In brief the contentions of appellees are that Exhibit "K" is conclusive and exclusive proof of its verity, not only as to its text, but to the regularity and constitutionality of its enactment. . . .

The appellant insists that not only the journal proceedings in the legislative course of S.F. 229 are admissible, but that Ex. "G", which is outside of that record and Exhibits H.1 and I.1 (copies of H.F. 364 and S.F. 292) are also admissible, and impeach the enrolled bill. He puts much reliance upon the rule of Smith v. Thompson, 219 Iowa 888, 258 N.W. 190, while appellees urge that the rule therein stated is unsound and should be overruled. . . .

The common law rule is that the enrolled bill, nothing to the contrary appearing on its face, is an absolute verity, is conclusive of its textual content and of its lawful enactment, and cannot be impeached by the legislative journals or evidence extrinsic of the journals. This is the rule of the English courts, the Federal courts, and of many of the state courts. Crawford, The Construction of Statutes, supra, § 139; 1 Sutherland, supra, footnote, pages 227-229.

Other courts apply the rule that the enrolled bill imports absolute verity, in a modified form. They hold that the enrolled bill is a verity and conclusively proves that the General Assembly complied with all constitutional provisions, excepting those provisions of the Constitution compliance with which is expressly required to be shown on the journals.

There are other courts which hold what is sometimes designated as the journal entry rule which is that the enrolled bill is not a verity but is prima facie evidence that the Legislature met all constitutional requirements, but the journals are admissible to rebut the prima facie presumption. Under this rule the failure of the journals to show that proceedings required by the Constitution to be entered on the journal were had rebuts the presumption that the proceedings were taken, and impeaches the bill. But if the silence of the journal is with respect to a matter which the Constitution does not require to be shown on the journals it is not sufficient to rebut the presumption of the enrolled bill. In such case the journals must go further and affirmatively show non-compliance with the requirement.

Even the courts, which do not subscribe to the conclusiveness of the enrolled bill, agree that all impeaching evidence is restricted to the enrolled bill itself and the legislative journals. Crawford, The Construction of Statutes, supra, § 143; 1 Sutherland, Statutory Construction, 3d Ed. supra, § 1408. The latter authority in the same section states that even the original bill (Exhibit "G" on this appeal) or the engrossed bill are inadmissible to impeach the enrolled bill or contradict the journal. Citing State ex rel. McKinley v. Martin, 160 Ala. 181, 48 So. 846, 848; In re Granger, 56 Neb. 260, 76 N.W. 588; State v. Abbott, 59 Neb. 106, 80 N.W. 499; State v. Jones, 1900, 22 Ohio Cir.Ct.R. 682.

The power to determine the regularity of the passage of a legislative enactment is vested in the courts. Portland Gold Mining Co. v. Duke, 8 Cir., 191 F. 692; Standard Underground Cable Co. v. Attorney General, 46 N.J.Eq. 270, 19 A. 733, 19 Am.St.Rep. 394; Lyons v. Woods, 153 U.S. 649, 14 S.Ct. 959, 38 L.Ed. 854; Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, 89 Am.Dec. 93; Sims v. Weldon, 165 Ark. 13, 263 S.W. 42. But there are limits to which they may go in such proceedings. Inquiry may not be made into the qualification of the members of the Legislature. Matters of parliamentary law and the failure of the Legislature to observe its rules of procedure, insofar as they are not required by the Constitution, must not be considered. The courts will determine only whether the Legislature complied with the requirements of the Constitution in enacting the challenged bill. But there is a presumption that such provisions of the Constitution have been complied with by the Legislature both as to substance as well as to form and enactment. Crawford, The Construction of Statutes, supra, sect. 138 and decisions cited.

What we have said in this division of the opinion fully answers the contention of the appellant that S.F. 229, involved in the Appeal before us, was not lawfully enacted in compliance with said section 17 of the Constitution. . . .

Affirmed and remanded.

2. New York Legislative Law, § 40, reads: "No bills shall be deemed to have so passed unless certified by the presiding officer, which certificate to such effect shall be conclusive evidence thereof." It has been held that where the certificate of the presiding officer of the house or senate is defective in failing to show that the requisite number of members was present or that the requisite number voted for the bill, recourse may be had to the journals of the respective houses to support the validity of the amendment. Matter of New York & Long Island Bridge Co. v. Smith, 148 N.Y. 540, 42 N.E. 1088 (1896).

FREEMAN v. GOFF

JULIUS J. OLSON, JUSTICE. This suit was brought under our uniform declaratory judgments act, Laws 1933, c. 286, to determine "the validity and construction" of L.1939, c. 444, "and to determine and obtain a declaration of plaintiff's status and rights thereunder," his contention being that the act as passed by the legislature is not the same as the enrolled bill approved by the governor and for that reason violates Minn.Const. art. 4, § 11, which provides that "every bill . . . passed . . . shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the governor" for approval (italics supplied), and, further, that the act is constitutionally objectionable because it subjects plaintiff to penalties which are not uniformly enforced under the act against all persons similarly situated. The court held with plaintiff and made findings and ordered judgment to that effect. Judgment was entered accordingly, and defendants have appealed.

The facts are not in dispute and may be thus summarized: Plaintiff is a duly licensed "on sale" liquor dealer in Minneapolis and operates a cafe and bar there. Attached to the exterior of his premises is a large neon illuminated sign suspended from the corner of the building advertising the sale of beer. The court found the cost thereof to be "approximately $400." Within his place of business is another sign 20 by 28 inches advertising the sale of intoxicating liquors. These signs when placed in their respective positions, and as since maintained, are not violative of any local ordinance or state law unless the mentioned act makes them such. So the case hinges upon the validity of that enactment. The material portions of the purported act, as signed by the governor, read:

"Section 1. No sign of any kind, printed, painted, electric or illuminated, advertising intoxicating liquors or non-intoxicating malt liquor containing not more than 3.2 per cent of alcohol by weight, shall be permitted on the exterior of, or immediately adjacent to, any premises licensed to sell said beverages, or any or all of them at retail nor shall any such exterior signs be permitted upon or adjacent to the public streets and highways of this state or in a position where such sign will be visible to travelers upon such streets or highways.

"Section 2. Any such sign now or hereafter placed upon premises, or immediately adjacent thereto, licensed to sell said beverages, or any or all of them [at retail], shall be removed on or before the expiration of a period of 90 days next following the passage of this act. Provided, however, that any sign, costing in excess of $1,000.00 and constructed of such shape and design as to fit a particular location, need not be removed.

"Section 3. No sign of any kind, printed, painted, electric or illuminated, advertising intoxicating liquor or non-intoxicating malt liquor containing not more than 3.2 per cent of alcohol by weight, shall be permitted in or upon the interior of any premises licensed to sell said beverages, or any or all of them [at retail], which sign shall exceed 18 inches by 27 inches, or 486 square inches in size."

(The words in italics of § 1 were not in the bill passed by the legislature. The words "at retail" quoted within brackets in §§ 2 and 3 were not present in the enrolled act approved by the governor but were a part of the original bill passed by the legislature.)

The court was of opinion that the "discrepancies which appear between the enrolled bill [the one receiving the governor's approval] and the bill passed by the legislature . . . constitute material variance rather than clerical errors," and as such rendered the enactment void. It was of the view that the entire act fell because the variance between the two bills is a material one and that as such the rule of severability does not apply. Defendants' claim is that the italicized portion of § 1, while constituting a "spurious portion" of the act, does not preclude the court from applying the rule of severability. They say that the presence of an unconstitutional provision does not authorize the court to declare the remainder void unless all the provisions of the act are so essentially and inseparably connected and so interdependent that it cannot be assumed the legislature would have passed the valid provisions without the invalid portions.

1. This court is firmly committed to the so-called "journal entry rule," under which "the regularity of the enactment of a law may be inquired into and the legislative journals may be examined to ascertain whether the law has been passed in accordance with constitutional requirements." Bull v. King, 205 Minn. 427, 286 N.W. 311, 312. Applying that rule to the facts here appearing leaves no doubt that the enrolled bill receiving the governor's approval is essentially a different act from the one passed by the legislature.

2. In Bull v. King, supra, we also said (205 Minn. 427, 286 N.W. at page 313): "The bill presented to the governor for his approval must be the same bill which was passed by the legislature. This requirement is mandatory. If there is a material variance between them, the bill presented to the governor cannot be said to be the same bill which was passed by the legislature. In that situation he approves not a bill passed by the legislature, but another. A material variance between the bill passed by the legislature and that approved by the governor invalidates the entire enactment." (Citing many cases.)

3. Clearly, then, the decisive question is whether the bill passed by the legislative body is (205 Minn. 427, 286 N.W. at page 313) in "substance and legal effect" the same as the one receiving the governor's approval, "for on the answer of this question depends the validity of the enactment." As we have seen, the italicized portion of § 1 of the enrolled bill contains not only a prohibition against certain signs on the "exterior" of the licensed premises, but also a prohibition against such signs being "permitted upon or adjacent to the public streets and highways of this state or in a position where such signs will be visible to travelers upon such streets or highways." No argument is needed to demonstrate that this portion of the enrolled bill is not only a material, but, we think, a vital, variance between the bill passed and the one signed by the governor.

The argument that a variation is not different from an unconstitutional provision which may be stricken from a statute and yet leave the remainder intact falls because it ignores the fact that the unconstitutional provision exists in a state validly enacted, while a material variance prevents any part of the act from ever becoming a statute. The subdivisions of an act are but parts of the whole. Under our constitution (art. 4, § 11), "every bill . . . passed . . . shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the governor" for approval.

(Italics supplied.) Here it is apparent that the bill as passed by the legislature has never been presented to the governor nor approved by him. Without such presentation and approval it cannot become a valid law. And the variance being a material one, the rule announced in Bull v. King, supra, and the cases cited to sustain that view is that, "a material variance between the bill passed by the legislature and that approved by the governor invalidates the entire enactment."

It therefore necessarily follows that the result reached by the trial court is right, and its judgment is affirmed.

1. See Sutherland, Statutory Construction (3d ed. 1943) vol. 1, § 1406, for a different definition of the "journal entry rule."

2. In McClellan v. Judge of Recorders Court of Detroit, 229 Mich. 203, 211, 201 N.W. 209, 212 (1924), the Court said: "It is true that in some jurisdictions decisions go far in holding that where the legislative records are silent as to various requirements being observed they will presume the legislature has done what it should do To follow such rule of presumption to its logical conclusion, in practical effect leaves it optional with the legislature to follow the course expressly commanded by the Constitution in passing a bill, and makes the journal a bulwark behind which constitutional mandates must be ignored. If silence upon the subject is sufficient and a statute must be presumed valid unless it affirmatively appears by the legislative journal that some constitutional requirement was disregarded, all the legislature need do is to record in its journal the final vote showing the bill passed, and presumptions do the rest. It is safe to suggest that the legislature would seldom affirmatively record in its journal that it had failed to comply with any constitutional requirement."

3. In Post v. Supervisors, 105 U.S. 667, 26 L.Ed. 599 (1881), in holding that an Illinois statute was validly enacted, the Supreme Court of the United States followed the decision of the Illinois supreme court; journals are competent evidence of proceedings in the legislature. If journals fail to show that an act has been passed in the mode described by the constitution, the presumption of validity arising from the signatures of the presiding officers and of the executive is overthrown and the act is void.

4. Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 12 S.Ct. 495, 36 L.Ed. 294 (1892), an enrolled bill, authenticated by the signatures of the presiding officers of both houses of Congress, signed by the President, and received by the Secretary of State, was held conclusive evidence that the bill was passed by Congress. The journals, committee reports or other printed documents are not available as evidence to show that a bill, as passed, contained a section which did not appear in the enrolled act.

5. In Bull v. King, 205 Minn. 427, 286 N.W. 311, 313 (1939), the court said: "The 'enrolled bill rule' permits bills to become laws which have not been actually passed by the legislature. The rule has been said to be conducive to fraud, forgery, corruption and other wrongdoings in connection with legislation. Courts applying such a rule are bound to hold statutes valid which they and everybody know were never legally enacted."

See Minnesota Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 212 Minn. 571, 4 N.W.2d 625 (1942), holding that failure of the engrossing staff of the senate to delete from a bill the words stricken by an amendment shown in the senate journal was a clerical error vitiating the statute as enrolled.

6. In People ex rel. Purdy v. The Com'rs of Highways of Marlborough, 54 N.Y. 276, 13 Am.Rep. 581 (1873), an act resulting from a bill which required a two-third vote was held void, since "the law in question does not appear either upon the printed statute book or upon the original act to have been passed by a two-third vote, and consequently it never had the effect of law."

HARBAGE v. TRACY

Court of Appeals of Ohio, 1939. 64 Ohio App. 151, 28 N.E.2d 520.

GEIGER, JUDGE. . . . It is alleged that the plaintiff is a taxpayer and the defendant is the Acting Auditor of State, sued in that capacity. The plaintiff petitions the court for a temporary and permanent injunction restraining defendant from paying to the members of the General Assembly of the state of Ohio any money whatsoever for mileage between July 27, 1936, and December 8, 1936, during which period no session of the General Assembly was held and no actual expenses for mileage were incurred.

Plaintiff states that he had reason to believe that unless restrained the auditor will pay the members of the General Assembly allowance aggregating $21,507 for such mileage. A temporary restraining order was allowed as prayed for. . . .

The court . . . found that on the 22nd of July, 1936, the 91st General Assembly of Ohio was in session; that on that date each house separately voted to take a five-minute recess and thereupon disbanded to their respective homes; that on the 8th day of December the members returned and each house convened in actual legislative session; that neither house convened in actual session between July 22 and December 8, 1936, and that in such interval there was no actual session or actual meeting of the General Assembly on account of which any member would have been entitled to any mileage from the treasury of the state; that entries were made in the journals of each house to show the convening of each house twice or more a week, from July 22, 1936, to December 8, 1936; that such entries were in fact incorporated in the House and Senate journals so that it would appear that forty sessions of each house of the General Assembly had been held when in truth and in fact no such sessions had been held; that thereafter the clerk of the House and President of the Senate certified to the auditor mileage allowances for the members of the House and Senate authorizing the payment of mileage not incurred and for mileage for each of the sixteen weeks within which forty fictitious sessions were purported to have been held which did not in fact occur, and that the amount of payments vouchered on account of the members of the House was $21,430.32, which has been appropriated to and is now in the fund known as traveling expenses; that $5,363.09 for mileage for the members of the Senate have in fact been paid and were paid before the final adjournment of the General Assembly, contrary to Section 50, General Code; that the threatened payments to the members of the House and further payments to the members of the Senate would be and are legally a fraudulent perversion of public funds, and that by reason of the premises plaintiff is without adequate relief.

On February 17, 1939, the Auditor of State gave notice of appeal to this court on the question of law and fact.

Counsel for the defendant takes the position that the journal of the respective houses may not be impeached to show that the facts recited did not as a matter of fact occur. Counsel in their brief state in substance that in spite of the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, the rule as to the unimpeachability of legislative journals is of universal application; that it is a positive rule of constitutional law resulting from the doctrine of the separation of the power of government which precludes the interference by the judiciary with any of the acts and proceedings of either house of the Legislature, in this instance, the keeping of the journal which is an act of the whole house and that any distinction sought to be shown between "legislative acts" and "ministerial acts" does not in fact exist.

We can not support counsel in this claim. If entries have been made in the journal of each house in compliance with a long-established custom, which entries do not in fact tell the truth in reference to the matter here in question, but show that there were forty legislative sessions between July 22nd and December 8th, which did not as a matter of fact occur, we are of the opinion that such a manifest misstatement of facts can not be shielded from scrutiny which would develop the truth by the claim that the journals of the two houses may not be impeached. We have considered the cases in which this proposition has been sustained and we find none in which such palpable misrepresentation has been journalized which have been protected by the court, on either the theory that the journal could not be impeached or that the judicial branch could not interfere with the legislative branch of the government.

Taking the broad view of the Constitution and the statutes, we are of the opinion, first, that the journal of the two houses do not import absolute verity, and that the rule that they may not be impeached has no reference to the matter now in controversy; second, that the members of the Legislature are not entitled to mileage unless the Legislature be in actual session during the time for which the mileage is paid.

We therefore arrive at the conclusion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

NOTES

1. Appeal in the principal case to the Supreme Court of Ohio was dismissed, 136 Ohio St. 534, 27 N.E.2d 141 (1940). For a commentary on the principal case see 25 Minn.L.Rev. 528 (1941).

2. Cox v. Mignery, 126 Mo.App. 669, 103 S.W. 675 (1907):

The common council of the city of St. Joseph passed an ordinance which required a concurring vote of two-thirds of the council by a vote of six to two. A journal entry was made showing a vote of six to two. A handwritten alteration was made in the typed journal showing a vote of five to three and the entry as altered was printed in a newspaper. At a subsequent meeting of the council, the minutes as printed were approved, with no apparent knowledge on the part of the council of the change. The court held that the ordinances of common councils are entitled to the presumptions indulged with respect to statutes; that an enrolled statute is presumed to be validly enacted if it shows on its face no ground of invalidity; and that this strong presumption may be overcome only by legislative records which clearly show the fact to be otherwise. The attested ordinance was held not to be upset by the altered record, for the general rule that an interlineation is presumed to be bona fide and to have been made before the record was approved was held to be inapplicable "where the interlineation is, in itself, suspicious."

3. Article 4, Section 1 of the Constitution of Minnesota provides that "no session (of the Legislature) shall exceed the term of ninety legislative days." In the 1941 session of the legislature, the ninetieth legislative day was on April 24, according to an opinion of the attorney general recorded in the journal of the House of Representatives for February 26. Article 4, Section 22 of the Constitution is in part as follows: "No bill shall be passed by either house of the legislature upon the day prescribed for the adjournment of the two houses." On April 23, before midnight, the clocks in the legislative chambers were covered, and the legislature remained in session for five days thereafter, during which time many bills were passed. Proceedings on these bills are recorded in the journals of the houses dated April 23. In the Senate journal for April 24 appears the following entry: "Mr. Lommen offered a statement. Mr. Orr moved that the statement be rejected. Which motion prevailed. Which statement was rejected." The proffered statement, not recorded in the journal, was to the effect that the Senate had remained in session after the ninetieth legislative day, and that certain acts were passed during that time and were therefore unconstitutional. What would be the probable result of an attack on the constitutionality of the above mentioned acts as having been passed in violation of the above quoted sections of the Constitution?

4. "Legislative Overtime [From the Minneapolis Star.]

To the Editor: We in the St. Louis Park high school social science class think that action must be taken to amend our state constitution so that our law makers will have adequate time to pass necessary legislation without mistakes.

In a legal sense how can time stop just because the clock is covered in our legislative chamber? Covering the clock would never excuse us when we have a social science assignment due.

Can bills passed after the 90-day session be declared unconstitutional?

What possible objections can our lawmakers have for not submitting an amendment to the people of our state for ratification?

Committee, St. Louis Park High School Social Science Class.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Validity of laws passed by the legislature after the last day midnight deadline has not been tested in the Minnesota courts. In other states, however, the courts have ruled that such laws are valid, accepting the records of the legislature at face value. The last day's journal of the legislature is printed to include all legislative actions, even though they may have taken place after the deadline. The Minnesota attorney general has given an opinion that the date of the legislative journal of the "closing day" governs the time limit within which the governor must sign bills after the legislature adjourns. As to what good extending the legislative session would do, your guess is as good as ours, human nature and procrastination being what they are."

STATE v. KIESEWETTER

Supreme Court of Ohio, 1887. 45 Ohio St. 254, 12 N.E. 807.

SPEAR, J. The burden is on the relators to show that the bill became a law. It is not claimed that the bill was signed by the presiding officer of either house, or was enrolled or filed in the office of the secretary of state in the regular course of proceeding. It is not to be found among the printed laws in the current volume of Ohio Laws. Following the laws and resolutions, and immediately after the certificate of the secretary of state, an addendum is found printed (by what authority does not appear) on pages 454 and 455, containing what is claimed to be a copy of the bill as passed, and with it a certificate of the clerk of each house, of date some 20 days subsequent to the adjournment of the general assembly, giving a recital of the action taken in each house in regard to the bill; that of the clerk of the senate, in addition, to the effect that the foregoing is a true copy of the bill as it passed. This cannot aid the relators. The proceedings, as shown by the journals, the court may take judicial notice of, and the certificate of the identity of the printed bill, by the clerk of the senate, is not of consequence, because not authorized by statute. Not so, however, with the certificate of the secretary of state, on page 453. That is required by section 129, Rev.St., and effect is given to it by virtue of that section. The certificate shows that the foregoing acts and joint resolutions are true copies, copied from the original rolls on file in his office, and negatives the idea that that which follows is copied from such rolls. Hence the contents of pages 454 and 455 of the volume referred to have no legal significance, and the volume, (84 Ohio Laws,) in legal effect, indicates that this bill was not one of the laws enacted by the Sixty-seventh general assembly. No copy or record of the bill appears on the journal of either house. The bill presented does not, therefore, in the light of what the court may take judicial notice of, purport to be a law, and, in order to declare it such, the court must ascertain its contents by resort to sources of information other than those referred to.

The questions then, are whether, for this purpose, resort may be had to evidence dehors the journals and the roll of duly certified laws in the office of the secretary of state, and whether, notwithstanding the bill was not signed by the presiding officer of either house, and was not enrolled in the office of the secretary of state as a law, it nevertheless has the force of law. Unquestionably, the legislature intended that this bill should become a law, and, unless this court can answer the questions proposed in the affirmative, this purpose will be, at least for the present, defeated. The publication provided for by the bill would tend to the advancement of science, and to the enlightenment of the people upon a subject of general interest, and one which is constantly growing in importance. So that there is strong inclination on the part of the court to determine the question involved in such way as will give expression to the will of the law-making power. Nevertheless, if, upon due consideration, it is manifest that the bill cannot be maintained as a law of the land, it is the imperative duty of the court to so declare, however much we may regret the result. Impressed with the importance of the question, we have given to the case careful consideration.

Section 17, art. 2, Const., is as follows: "The presiding officer of each house shall sign, publicly in the presence of the house over which he presides, while the same is in session and capable of transacting business, all bills and joint resolutions passed by the general assembly." No judicial interpretation has been given to this section, so far as we are informed. The preceding section, which provides that every bill shall be fully and distinctly read on three different days, and that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, etc., has been considered by this court, and the views of the court upon it are well stated by Swan, J., in Pim v. Nicholson, 6 Ohio St. 177, as follows: "This court held, in the case of Miller v. State, 3 Ohio St. 475, that the provisions of the above section, relating to the distinctness required in reading a bill, and a number of times a bill shall be read, were, as they in fact import, intended as permanent rules for the proceeding of the houses. They are directory only, and are to be enforced by the houses, and not by judicial interposition. The further provision, in the same section, that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, is also made a permanent rule in the introduction and passage of bills through the houses. The subject of the bill is required to be clearly expressed in the title, for the purpose of advising members of its subject, when voting, in cases in which the reading has been dispensed with by a two-thirds vote. The provision that a bill shall contain but one subject was to prevent combinations, by which various and distinct matters of legislation should gain a support which they could not if presented separately. As a rule of proceeding in the general assembly it was manifestly an important one. But if it was intended to effect any practical object for the benefit of the people in the examination, construction, or operation of acts passed and published, we are unable to perceive it. The title of an act may indicate to the reader its subject, and under the rule each act would contain one subject. To suppose that for such a purpose the constitutional convention adopted the rule under consideration would impute to them a most minute provision for a very imperfect heading of the chapters of laws and their subdivision. This provision being intended to operate upon bills in their progress through the general assembly, it must be held to be directory only."

It is entirely clear that section 17 cannot be treated as a mere guide to the action of the general assembly in order to the more full enlightenment of the members in the performance of their duties, or as a check upon them, as the signing of a bill by the presiding officer in no substantial way affects the action of the members, or relates to the passage of the bill through either body. The members, as such, have performed every duty regarding a bill prior to the time when the duty of signing by the presiding officers may be performed. This signing in open session may, incidentally, serve to fix the attention of members to the bill being signed, but it has a much more important purpose. It authenticates a bill, and affords a sure means of identification. No official copy is required of a bill introduced, nor is it required to be copied on the journal, and a legal standard of comparison is wanting. The signatures of the presiding officers, therefore, furnish the evidence that that which the journals show, by title and number, passed the general assembly, is this identical measure. The act thus authenticated is to be given the force of law, is to be treated as such, and to prove itself upon inspection; and this verification by the officers designated by the constitution is the conclusive evidence to the secretary of state that the act so signed is a law, and entitled to be enrolled as such in the office of that officer, and, under his direction, to be published, duly certified by him, for the information and guidance of all the people of the state. The signing is therefore for the benefit of the people in their examination to ascertain what is and what is not law. It is apparent that the reasoning which led this court to declare section 16 to be directory does not apply to section 17, and that the cases referred to are no authority in the case at bar.

Were there a provision requiring that all bills introduced should be spread at length upon the journal, and were this bill to be found copied on the journal of either house, it is probable that, following former holdings of this court, resort might be had to that mode of identification. But no such record exists; and reliance upon title, number, and designation, for identification of contents, would, we think, be inadmissible.

At the trial, the state librarian was offered by the relator as a witness, and it was proposed by the testimony of this witness to identify a copy which it was claimed had been deposited in the state library, in compliance with section 59, Rev.St., and thus supply proof of the contents of the bill. That is to say, the court was asked to take the copy thus proffered from the state library, and, by making in it the changes which the journals of the two houses show were made while the bill was pending, make up a completed bill, and declare it law. The testimony is believed not to be competent. It was an effort to introduce parol proof, and, in effect, to try the validity of a law upon the testimony of witnesses. The section referred to requires that the clerk of each house shall deliver to the printer, for his use in printing, all of the papers and documents laid before the branch of which he is clerk, which are ordered by such branch to be printed; and the printer shall immediately print 240 copies thereof, of which number each of the executive officers shall receive 1 and the state librarian 5, which he shall preserve. Upon whom devolves the duty of delivering these copies is left to inference. No provision is made for their certification as true copies, nor for special care in their safekeeping, nor for perpetuation of evidence of contents by a record of them. The librarian is required to simply preserve the copies which he receives,—a duty which attaches to all books and pamphlets of which he has the care. He is not required to make copies for use elsewhere, nor is provision made for a certificate of any kind, or for any mode of authenticating them. Yet, if this be competent testimony, the occasion for its introduction may arise as well in any court in the remotest county in the state as in this court. Copies deposited in the library furnish a convenient source of information to any persons interested in pending legislation; but it cannot be that the legislature intended that a copy of a bill found in the state library should be treated as a record of a law, or as taking the place of the signatures of the presiding officers, and it is apparent that the admission in evidence of the testimony proposed would establish a precedent of a loose and most dangerous character. The effect of a resort to parol proof to establish the validity of a law was fully considered in State v. Smith, 44 Ohio St. 348, 7 N.E. 447, and it is not necessary to do more here than refer to that case.

Whether a provision imperative in its terms should be treated as directory or as mandatory has been held to be a matter of expediency, though Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, observes that "courts tread upon very dangerous ground when they venture to apply the rules which distinguish directory and mandatory statutes to the provision of a constitution." Another author says that "the question is in the main governed by considerations of convenience and justice." Giving effect to the more liberal view, it may be said that if no advantage would be lost, or right destroyed, or benefit sacrificed either to the public or to an individual by such a holding, the provision might be regarded as directory; or, if less injury would result by disregarding than by enforcing the provision according to its letter, then it could with propriety be treated as directory merely. But if the lax rule would tend to the injury of the public, or, if applied to the facts of a given case, (though possibly conducive to good results in that special instance,) would introduce a dangerous precedent, then, especially as to constitutional provisions, should a court be reluctant to depart from the letter of the constitution. Cooley, Const.Lim. 93; Maxw.Int.St. 452; State v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 117.

In the light of these considerations, we inquire whether section 17, before quoted, should be regarded, in this case, as merely directory, or as embodying a positive requirement. And this is the practical question: Where a bill has received the sanction of a majority of each house of the general assembly, but has not been signed by the presiding officer of either house, or filed in the office of the secretary of state in the regular course of procedure, or enrolled there, or published among the authorized laws, can it be treated as a law by the courts? We are reluctantly led to the conclusion that it cannot. The advantages to be derived by a recognition of this bill as a law, would, we think, be far outweighed by the perils which might follow the establishment of so dangerous a precedent. As applied to this case, the result of this holding but postpones, in all probability, to the meeting of another assembly, the accomplishment of the object sought. Nor will this view necessarily work irreparable inconvenience, as applied to any class of legislation. In a case where the subject-matter of a bill thus defeated is vital to the public business of the state, the authority of the governor to call together the general assembly, and give opportunity for all needed requirements to be observed, is ample. On the other hand, the importance of furnishing to the people sources of information, certain in their character and convenient of access, as to what is and what is not law, is obvious. All are presumed to know the law, and it is of great interest to each citizen, as well as to the public officer, that there be some authentic record to which he may resort to ascertain certainly and definitely what laws are enacted by the legislature, what control him in the daily transactions of business, and of what, at his peril, he is bound to take notice. Whatever conduces to certainty in this regard, therefore, is of great moment to every person in the state, and no rule of construction would be wise which leaves so important a matter in doubt or confusion.

It is urged that to give controlling effect to section 17 would be to clothe the presiding officers of the general assembly with a veto power, and such a result cannot have been intended by the convention which framed the constitution. Certainly that body did not so intend, but we think the result proved is not likely to follow. Our attention is called to the case of Leavenworth v. Higginbotham, 17 Kan. 62. In that case the bill in question was passed, signed by the governor, and published more than 11 years prior to the decision, and all departments of the state government had held it valid, though it lacked the signature of the presiding officer of the senate. The court decided that "the bill should be held to be valid, although it may not have the signature of the presiding officer of the senate affixed to it." In the opinion, prominence is given to a consideration of the suggested dangers which would follow if the signatures of the presiding officers were deemed essential. Whatever significance should be attached to this consideration in the newer states, we are impressed that, as applied to this state, the danger is more fancied than real. Section 17 has been in force, as a constitutional requirement, since the formation of the state, and this is the first instance, so far as we are advised, in which there has been a failure to observe it. If any has occurred, the learned counsel has omitted to call attention to it. However, the obvious answer to this objection is that confidence must be reposed somewhere. It is not to be presumed that men selected to fill places of such high trust will intentionally violate the constitution, and prove false to their oaths.

Cottrell v. State, 9 Neb. 125, 1 N.W. 1008, is cited. In that case a like provision was held to be directory. Maxwell, C. J., in the opinion says: "The signature of a presiding officer to a bill is a mere certificate to the governor that it has passed the requisite number of readings, and been adopted by the constitutional majority of the house over which he presides. The vote upon the passage of the bill must be determined from the journal of the respective houses. And when it appears from the journals that a bill has passed by the requisite majority, and has been approved by the governor, the failure of the presiding officer to affix his signature thereto will not invalidate the act, as it will be presumed that the governor had sufficient evidence before him of the passage of the bill at the time he approved the same."

It appears that all due formalities had been observed as regards the act, save only the signature of the presiding officer of the senate. It had the governor's signature, was duly enrolled in the office of the secretary of state, and it had been in force for years. The governor's signature apparently served, not only as showing his official assent to the measure, but as authenticating the bill itself. In this state the governor takes no part in the approval or authentication of laws. There are other notable differences between these cases and the case at bar. If a case were presented where a bill, lacking only the signature of the presiding officer of one house, had been enrolled by the secretary of state, published as a law, and recognized as such by all other branches of the state government, and acquiesced in for years, a different question would be before us.

The two cases referred to are the only authorities we have noticed which appear to sustain the relator's claim, and we think, when duly considered, they fail to do so. On the other hand, the positions heretofore assumed are believed to be in consonance with the views of text writers and with many adjudicated cases. . . . Writ refused.

Evansville v. State, 118 Ind. 426, 21 N.E. 267 (1888): While article 4, section 25 of the Indiana constitution requires that all bills passed shall be signed by the presiding officers of both houses, article 5, section 14 provides that after a return of a bill by the governor with objections and after approval by a majority of both houses upon reconsideration, the bill "shall be a law." It was held, therefore, that a bill passed over the objections of the governor need not again be signed by the presiding officers in order to be validly enacted.

SECTION 7. PLACE OF THE EXECUTIVE IN THE LEGISLATIVE PROCESS

LUKENS v. NYE

Supreme Court of California, 1909. 156 Cal. 498, 105 P. 593.

SHAW, J. This is an action in mandamus to compel the Controller to issue a warrant on the State Treasurer to the plaintiffs for the sum of $22,808.15, being the second installment of the amount appropriated to John Mullan by the act of the Legislature approved March 22, 1905 (St.1905, p. 791, c. 592), in satisfaction of his claim against the state. The plaintiffs are his assignees. The act appropriates $45,616.30 in payment of said claim, and declares that "the Controller is hereby authorized and directed to draw his warrant for the said sum and the Treasurer of State is hereby authorized and directed to pay the same, and thereupon the said John Mullan shall make and deliver unto the Controller a full receipt and release of his said claim." One-half is made payable on January 1, 1906, and one-half on January 1, 1907. The installment due on January 1, 1906, has been paid. This action is to compel a warrant for the remaining one-half. The act exempts the claim from the provisions of section 672 of the Political Code, and therefore it is not required to have the sanction of the board of examiners.

The answer of the Controller alleges the following facts in defense: Prior to the passage of the act the claim had been assigned to the plaintiffs. After the bill had been passed in both houses of the Legislature, and before its approval, the Governor informed the plaintiffs that the amount allowed by the bill was excessive, and that he would not approve the same unless the plaintiffs would agree to accept the sum of $25,000 in full satisfaction of the claim. Thereupon plaintiffs and the Governor agreed that $25,000 was the full amount of the claim. An agreement was drawn up providing that, in consideration of the sum of $25,000, to be paid in two installments, the first, of $22,808.15, to be paid January 1, 1906, and the second, of $2,191.85, to be paid on January 1, 1907, the said plaintiffs acknowledged full receipt and satisfaction of the claim, and released the state from further liability, claim, and demand therefor, and that if the payments were not made on said dates, the agreement should be void. For the purpose of inducing the Governor to approve said bill and attach his signature thereto, so that it would become a law, plaintiffs signed the said agreement and delivered it to the Governor for the benefit of the state, and the Governor, relying upon the said agreement, and being thereby induced to do so, signed the said bill, whereby it became a law. The plaintiffs, in pursuance of said agreement, on January 2, 1906, demanded of the Controller a warrant for the sum of $22,808.15, due on that day by the act, and thereupon the Controller, for the purpose of carrying out said agreement, and relying thereon, and also on the representations of the plaintiffs that they would accept the sum of $25,000 in full satisfaction of said claim, issued and delivered the said warrant so demanded, and the plaintiffs collected the same from the Treasurer. The Controller is ready and willing to issue a warrant for the remainder of $2,191.85, due under the agreement, and has offered the same to the plaintiffs, who refuse to accept it.

A demurrer was sustained to the answer, and judgment passed to the plaintiffs as prayed for. The appellant contends, first, that the agreement is valid; second, that the plaintiffs, after thereby inducing the Governor to sign the appropriation bill in question, are estopped to demand any greater sum than the agreement provides; and third, that under the rules applying in mandamus the lower court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, should have refused the writ on the ground that the claim for the excess is unjust and inequitable.

The Governor was without power to take or receive the agreement in question, and he could not make it a valid contract. While engaged in considering bills which have passed both houses of the Legislature, and which are presented to him for approval or disapproval, he is acting in a legislative capacity, and not as an executive. He is for that purpose a part of the legislative department of the state. Fowler v. Peirce, 2 Cal. 172; People v. Bowen, 21 N.Y. 521. As an executive officer, he is forbidden to exercise any legislative power or function except as in the Constitution expressly provided. Article 3. His powers, as a part of the legislative department, are specifically enumerated in the Constitution. When such a bill is presented, "if he approves it he shall sign it; but if not he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it originated." If, while the Legislature is in session, he neglects to return or sign a bill for 10 days, Sundays excepted, it becomes a law without his signature. If the Legislature adjourns within the 10 days, it does not become a law unless, within the designated time after such adjournment, he shall sign and deposit the same in the office of the Secretary of State. Const. art. 4, § 16. When exercising these powers he is a special agent with limited powers, and, as in the case of other special agents, he can act only in the specified mode, and can exercise only the granted powers. If he attempts to exercise them in a different mode, or to exercise powers not given, his act will be wholly ineffectual and void for any and every purpose. When he goes beyond the limits of these powers in the attempt to exercise them, his acts, so far as they transcend the powers, are of no force.

In Ohio the Senate alone attempted to empower a committee to investigate the city officers of Cincinnati, a matter not germane to the powers or business of the Senate. Holding the committee an illegal body the court said: "Whatever inherent power the General Assembly in its entirety may possess by virtue of its being the repository of the whole legislative power of the state, we do not think it follows as a conclusion that one of its constituent parts must likewise possess the same inherent powers. It may be conceded that either branch of the Legislature has all such powers as are necessarily implied in the express grant of powers to it by the Constitution; but, under the system of distribution of powers in the American Constitutions, and especially under the Constitution of Ohio, which is explicit in excluding from the legislative department the exercise of any power which is not delegated in the Constitution (article 1, § 20), the authority of a single branch of the Legislature to act separately must be found in express terms or by necessary implication in the Constitution. It is clear that the 'legislative power' whatever may be the extent of that power which is conferred upon the General Assembly, is not expressly delegated to a part of the General Assembly. Nor is it impliedly so delegated. The Constitution explicitly grants and defines the separate powers of each branch of the General Assembly. . . . The powers of each house are not general and subject only to limitation in the Constitution, as is the legislative power of the entire General Assembly; but they are specific or enumerated powers. . . . We therefore must look to the enumerated powers alone to determine this question; and it were just as sane to claim that either branch of the Legislature might, by itself, enact a law as to claim that by 'inherent power' it could independently exercise any legislative power outside of those specifically designated in the Constitution." State v. Guilbert, 75 Ohio St. 43, 78 N.E. 934.

The same principles apply when the power of the Governor as a legislative instrumentality is involved. He may act only in the prescribed mode, and may exercise only the powers enumerated or necessarily implied. In the case of a bill containing several items of appropriation of money he may approve one or more of them, and object to the others. Article 4, § 16. In no other case is he empowered to modify or change the effect of a proposed law, or to do anything concerning it except to approve or disapprove it as a whole. He cannot participate in the discussions or proceedings of either house, except by sending them a veto message when a bill is disapproved. If he approves a proposed bill, his duty requires him to sign it as evidence of such approval. This approval, except in the single instance stated, must be of the bill as a whole, and without qualification. Any attempt on his part to attach to his approval any qualification, or to withhold his consent to a part of the law and give it to other parts, will either be entirely nugatory and ineffectual, and leave the approval absolute, or it will completely nullify the approval and operate as a veto of the whole bill. Porter v. Hughes, 4 Ariz. 1, 32 Pac. 165; State v. Holder, 76 Miss. 158, 23 South. 643. His approval makes such a bill a part of the statute law, next to the Constitution, the highest manifestation of the will of the people. The Governor cannot qualify or change it by any contemporaneous agreement or contract on behalf of the state with persons who are to be benefitted by the law, whereby they agree to release to the state a part of such benefit. That would be to permit the Governor and the persons concerned to make the law to suit themselves without the concurrence of the legislative houses. His signature, when it is shown to have been attached, is the exclusive and conclusive evidence of his unqualified approval, and, the result being law, no evidence, nor the judgment of any court, can be allowed to modify or change its terms or effect, or prevent or impair its complete operative force. The Constitution makes no distinction between a law appropriating money to satisfy the claim of a private individual and a law declaring the will of the people on any other subject. Its mandate is unalterably fixed by the words of the bill, made a law by the final act of the Governor, and it is unchangeable except by the power which enacted it. "It is a principle in the English law that an act of Parliament, delivered in clear and intelligible terms, cannot be questioned, or its authority controlled, in any court of justice." 1 Kent's Com. 447. And in the United States: "If there be no constitutional objection to a statute, it is with us as absolute and uncontrollable as laws flowing from the sovereign power in any other form of government." Id. 448. . . .

STATE ex rel. MARTIN v. ZIMMERMAN

Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1939. 233 Wis. 16, 288 N.W. 454.

ROSENBERY, CHIEF JUSTICE. Art. VII, sec. 21 of the Wisconsin constitution provides: "The legislature shall provide by law for the speedy publication of all statute laws. . . . And no general law shall be in force until published."

Sec. 14.29, Wisconsin Stats., provides:

"The secretary of state shall:

"(10) Publish proposed constitutional amendments and laws. To publish the laws as provided by section 35.64. . . ."

Sec. 35.64 provides: "Publication of all laws. Every law shall be published in the official state paper immediately after its passage and approval, in type not smaller than six point; and until so published shall not take effect."

Sec. 14.18 provides:

"Deposit of acts; notice. The governor shall cause all legislative acts which have become laws by his approval or otherwise to be deposited in the office of the secretary of state without delay, and shall inform thereof the house in which the respective acts originated."

The position of the Secretary of State is that the act deposited with him by the Governor as alleged in the petition is not a law because it was not constitutionally approved and he is therefore not required to publish it for the reason that its publication will be a futile act. This contention requires us to consider the meaning of the term "law" as used in the constitution and in the statutes with respect to publication of acts of the Legislature approved by the Governor. It is apparent that the word "law" was not used in its broad general sense. When so used it is defined as "the aggregate of those rules and principles of conduct which the governing power in a community recognizes as those which it will enforce or sanction." State v. Lange Canning Co., 1916, 164 Wis. 228, 157 N.W. 777, 780, 160 N.W. 57. In that sense an act of the Legislature can never be a law until it is published as required by the constitution and the statutes. If that argument were sound, the Secretary of State could prevent any act of the Legislature from becoming a law by merely refusing to publish it. Under the constitution and the statute it is clear that an act of the Legislature cannot operate as a law until it has been officially published. Therefore when in Art. VII, sec. 21 of the constitution the Legislature is required to provide for the speedy publication of all statute laws, and it is further declared that no general law shall be enforced until published, the term "law" is used in a narrower sense. It is plain that the term "law" as there used refers to an act of the Legislature which has been deposited in the office of the Secretary of State properly authenticated by the presiding officers of the two houses and approved by the Governor to become effective as a rule of conduct when published.

We do not need to consider in this case acts of the Legislature which become laws otherwise than by the approval of the Governor for the Governor in this case approved the act in part and the part approved thereby became a "law" within the meaning of that term as used in Art. V, sec. 10 of the constitution. When an act so approved reaches the office of the Secretary of State, the Legislature has commanded that he immediately publish it. Upon its publication unless otherwise provided, it then becomes a law in the broad sense of prescribing a rule of conduct. Neither the constitution nor the laws enacted pursuant thereto confer upon the Secretary of State any discretion with respect to what he shall do with an act which reaches his office in the manner prescribed by law and in the form of law. No discretionary power to pass upon the constitutionality of acts so authenticated and deposited with him can be inferred. The statute is mandatory and imposes upon him the duty to publish which is a purely ministerial function.

The constitution prescribes and defines the powers of the legislative and executive departments of the government and all officers in the discharge of their functions are under an obligation to comply with its requirements. The Secretary of State is not vested by virtue of his office with the power of interpreting the constitution for other officers in the discharge of their duties. When the Secretary of State refuses to perform a duty imposed upon him by law on the ground that some other official has not performed his duty in accordance with the provisions of the constitution, he acts judicially and exercises a power not conferred upon him.

The whole governmental process would be thrown into utter confusion if ministerial officers in one department in the absence of legislative authority assumed to exercise the power to pass upon the validity and constitutionality of the acts of officers of co-ordinate departments of government. If one ministerial officer or one officer in the performance of a ministerial duty may constitute himself a tribunal to pass upon the acts of other officers, such power might be assumed by all officers and the governmental process would be brought to a halt.

Upon the oral argument it was ably contended on behalf of the Secretary of State that the power of the Secretary of State was limited to determining whether the procedural steps prescribed by the constitution had been followed and it was not to be supposed that the Secretary of State had power to pass upon the validity of acts because they violated what may be referred to as substantive provisions of the constitution. An act of the Legislature which is not authorized by the constitution is no more a law than an act which has not been properly adopted because the necessary procedural steps have not been followed. In either event no effective law results. This Court has said with respect to an unconstitutional law that the matter stands as if the law had not been passed. Bonnett v. Vallier, 1908, 136 Wis. 193, 116 N.W. 885, 17 L.R.A., N.S., 486, 128 Am.St.Rep. 1061. While the present incumbent of the office disclaims any such power, if the power he does claim is vested in him, his successors in office would have a perfectly logical right to proceed the whole way and assume the power to pass upon validity of the acts of the Legislature upon substantive as well as procedural grounds. Despite the ingenious argument made with respect to limiting the discretionary power of the Secretary of State to procedural matters, we see no logical ground upon which such a distinction may be based. If the act is invalid for any constitutional reason it is no law and the publication of an act which is enacted in violation of the substantive provisions of the constitution is just as futile an act as the publication of one passed in violation of procedural requirements. . . .

WALTER P. ARMSTRONG, UNSOLVED PROBLEMS OF LEADERSHIP AND POWERS.

A Review of Binkley, President and Congress,
33 A.B.A.Jour. 417, 418-419, 420 et seq. (1947).

Seven Presidents Who Tried to Furnish Leadership for Legislation

Throughout our entire history there have been but seven Presidents who attempted with any degree of success to furnish Presidential leadership for Congressional legislation. Of these Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, James K. Polk, Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt were Democrats, and William McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt, Republicans.

Jefferson, not only the leader but the creator of his party, placed his lieutenants in key positions in both Houses, and with their aid and by personal influence (his enemies called it intrigue) directed the course of legislation.

The concept of Andrew Jackson that the Presidential office was a basis for influencing Congress was entirely different from that of Jefferson. Jackson's election had marked the end of an era. His predecessors had been nominated by a Congressional caucus and two had been elected by the House of Representatives. Jackson, however, owed neither his nomination nor election to Congress. His firm conviction was that he was the first popularly elected President and "bore a mandate fresh from the hands of the 'sovereign' people." Satisfied that he alone represented the whole Nation, he abandoned the secret influence of Jefferson and obtained results by appealing to the people over the heads of the Congress.

James K. Polk, Whig and abolitionist historians to the contrary notwithstanding², was another "strong" President. He is placed among presidential leaders of Congress rather because of his publicly expressed belief in the principle³ than because of his own conduct; his usual procedure was to present Congress with a fait accompli.

Woodrow Wilson's Enthusiasm for the British Parliamentary System

Woodrow Wilson was the first President thoroughly to explore all the theoretical implications and empirical advantages of Presidential leadership of Congress. Long before his election he had not only shown his enthusiasm for the British parliamentary system but had indicated his view that the President, like the Prime Minister, was cast for a double role—head of the government and party leader. As he put it, "the President cannot escape being the leader of his party except by incapacity and lack of personal force The whole art of statesmanship is the art of bringing the several parts of government into effective cooperation The President is at liberty, both in law and conscience, to be as big a man as he can." . . .

. . . Dr. Binkley merely comments: "In any case, whatever its merits, a parliamentary system is out of the question in the United States in the foreseeable future." (page 266) Certainly no one can predict when any Constitutional change will come; nor does any seem in immediate prospect.

Indications of Trends for Effective Integration

There are, however, indicia not only that our thinking on this subject has undergone a change but that there is a discernible trend in favor of effective integration of the Executive and Congress. Moreover, the course the change will take, when it does come, is adumbrated. Not only the right but the duty of the President to act as a part of the legislature in recommending measures and using his veto⁴ are clearly established.

² "The impartial verdict of history" is not always impartial. Some historians are like that stout old Tory, Dr. Samuel Johnson, who "took care that the Whig Dogs should not have the best of it". An Essay on Johnson, by Arthur Murphy, page 379.

³ Polk first clearly stated the distinction between the function of a President as Chief Executive and as party leader.

⁴ This view was of slow growth. There was introduced a resolution impeaching John Tyler which had for its basis his veto of a tariff measure when there was no Constitutional objection to it.

Jackson's mandate-from-the-people theory, revived and popularized by the two Roosevelts, has gained general acceptance; indeed, it is likely that any President who in the future fails to take the lead in introducing and forwarding a legislative program will be deemed to have abdicated one of his most important functions.

There has been no comparable development in Congress. While the LaFollette-Monroney Act⁹ has partly reorganized and should strengthen Congress it by no means implements it for national leadership. Indeed, in the House, where localism so frequently determines the membership, it is difficult to see how national leaders, independent of the President, can emerge.

Current Proposals to Make Presidential Leadership Effective

The purpose of recent legislative proposals is to make effective, not to supplant, Presidential leadership. The Kefauver Resolution¹⁰ would take the first step by providing for a question period during which cabinet members would confer with Congress. It is difficult to see how there can be any objection to this save on the part of those intransigents who are opposed to anything—however innocuous—that remotely resembles the parliamentary system.

The Fulbright Amendment¹¹ tentatively offers a solution. Under it the Constitution would provide for concurrent terms of six years

¹¹ Senate Joint Resolution 29 of 80th Congress 1st Session. The Committee on the Judiciary has not yet held hearings on the proposed amendment and therefore there has been no debate on the Floor. Senator J. S. Fulbright in a personal letter to the reviewer writes: "Generally speaking, my thesis has been that in the early days of this country, when we were not playing a part in international affairs of any great importance, it was tolerable to have the rivalry between the Executive and Legislative branches which is inherent in our system and non-action rarely led to any great disaster. However, with the assumption of obligations in the international field, it seems to me that some machinery should be worked out in which there is greater coordination between the Executive and Legislative branches. In other words, there is a pressing necessity that decisions on these problems be made promptly and positively." The Resolution in full is:

"JOINT RESOLUTION

"Proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the election and terms of office of President, Vice President, and Members of Congress.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution:

for the President, Senators and Representatives, with power in the President (by Executive Order) and in Congress (by concurrent Resolution) to terminate all incumbencies by ordering a new Presidential and Congressional election. One obvious objection to this plan seems to be that under it the issue sought to be submitted to the people would not necessarily be decided. So many sectional, local and personal factors enter into the election of Representatives and even Senators that it is conceivable that the people might return the same Congress and the same President. There is at least this possibility so long as the President and Congress depend not upon one another but upon the people for their election.¹²

"Article —

"Section 1. The Congress by concurrent resolution or the President by Executive order shall have power to provide from time to time that an election shall be held in the several States for the purpose of choosing a President and Vice President, Senators, and Representatives in Congress, for the terms hereinafter specified. Such election shall be held on the first Tuesday which occurs more than ninety days after the date of passage of such concurrent resolution or the promulgation of such Executive order.

"Sec. 2. If no election under section 1 shall have been called before the date scheduled for the Presidential election next following the date of the ratification of this article, a President, Vice President, two Senators from each State, and Representatives in Congress shall then be chosen. The terms of the President and Vice President and of all Senators and Representatives in Congress holding office on the date of such election shall end on the fortieth day following such election and the terms of the persons chosen shall then begin and continue for a period of six years unless earlier terminated by an election held as specified in section 1.

"Sec. 3. A new election for the purpose of choosing a President and Vice President, two Senators from each State, and Representatives in Congress shall automatically be held six years after the date of the election last preceding in the event that no call for an earlier election shall have been issued by the President or Congress under section 1."

This plan differs from that of Thomas K. Finletter in Can Representative Government do the Job?, 1945, in that Mr. Finletter proposes that only the President be given the right to dissolve Congress and call a general election.

¹² The failure of Wilson's appeal for a Democratic Congress and of Franklin D. Roosevelt's "purges" are significant. The reaction of the electorates to the attempt to purge indicated not so much opposition to the President's general policy as resentment at what was felt to be his interference in local affairs. Laski (Harper & Brothers, New York, 1940). Chapter 3

TYPES OF STATUTES

SECTION 1. DIRECT LEGISLATION

STATE v. HOWELL.

Supreme Court of Washington, 1919. 107 Wash. 167, 181 P. 920.

CHADWICK, C. J. At the general election held in 1912, the people of the state of Washington adopted as a principle of government the power to initiate laws and to review at the bar of popular opinion all acts, bills, or laws passed by the legislature of the state of Washington.

The right so to do is emphasized as a power reserved, and the terms of the amendment imply in the strongest possible way that the intention of the people was to reserve a right to review every act of the legislature which might affect the people in their civil rights or limit or extend their political liberties; for they wrote an exception, saying that a referendum may be ordered in all cases, "except such laws as may be necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health or safety, support of the state government and its existing public institutions." Amendment 7, art. II, Sec. 1. The writing of an exception specifying the things not reserved is an expression, within sound rules of construction, of a reservation to pass upon all things not so specified.

The court, in passing directly upon the amendment, and in other cases arising under city charters, has held firm to the principle of the referendum and has consistently refused to limit it by construction.

In December, 1917, Congress proposed an amendment (Stats. of U. S., Sixty-Fifth Congress, 1918, Sess. II, Ch. 212, p. 1050) to the Federal constitution, providing that:

"Section 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"Sec. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"Sec. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress." . . .

This amendment was submitted to, and ratified by, the legislature of the state of Washington by joint resolution passed January 13, 1919. On March 20, 1919, relator tendered a petition for a referendum to the respondent secretary of state; he asked that it be filed and a ballot title be supplied. Respondent refused to receive it upon the grounds, (a) that the amendment, having been adopted by a joint resolution and not by an act, bill or law, was not within the terms of the seventh amendment; and (b) that it was not a subject for referendum under article V of the Constitution of the United States.

Addressing ourselves to the first contention of the respondent, Is the resolution an act, bill or law, within the meaning of those terms as employed in our constitution; whether the people intended an act, bill, or law to be statute enacted by the legislature, or whether they meant action by the legislature which affected them as law? . . .

It is well known that the power of the referendum was asserted, not because the people had a willful or perverse desire to exercise the legislative function directly, but because they had become impressed with a profound conviction that the legislature had ceased to be responsive to the popular will. They endeavored to, and did unless we attach ourselves to words and words alone, reject the idea upon which the referendum is founded and blind ourselves to the great political movement that culminated in the seventh amendment—make reservation of the power to refer every act of the legislature with only certain enumerated exceptions.

Guided by these considerations, we are satisfied that the people used the words "act, bill or law" in no restricted sense, but in a sense commensurate with the political evil they sought to cure.

And why should not the amendment be a law within the meaning of the seventh amendment? No reason is assigned other than that "law" as there used is synonymous with "bill" or "act." We may well argue and be within sound rules that, if the people had so intended, they would not have used the word "law" at all, as was done in the state of Oregon. We can conceive of no more sweeping law than the proposed amendment. Certainly no amendment has ever been proposed that goes deeper into the vitals of the American idea of government. It surrenders pro tanto the sovereignty of the state, gives to the Federal government a right to enact laws and to enforce them through the Federal courts, and it will deny the citizen the protection of some of those guarantees that we have written out of the travail of time into our own Bill of Rights. Upon construction, we hold that the amendment to the constitution of the United States is a law within the meaning of the seventh amendment, and is subject to referendum.

But it is contended that, whereas the legislature ratified the amendment by joint resolution instead of by act of bill as it might have done, the resolution being not to nominate an act, bill or law, is not subject to a referendum. This argument defeats itself, for if we are to be literal and exact in terminology and so insistent upon "scholastic interpretation" as to admit this premise, we must hold that the legislature had no power to ratify the amendment except by act or bill, for we find no power granted in the constitution to that body to act in matters legislative other than by act or bill.

This reasoning would lead to two consequences, equally absurd: Either the amendment being ratified by resolution, the act of ratification is void as a thing done in a manner not provided; or, if sustained, would permit the legislature to defeat the power of referendum by acting, in matters purely legislative, by resolution instead of by bill. The latter is the consequence in the instant case, if the argument of the learned Attorney General is to be sustained. But we are not put to the extremity of holding that the legislature may not, in matters of ratification, act by resolution for there is a high road of reason leading down to a true result.

The contention that a resolution, although it may have the force and consequence of a formal legislative enactment and affect the people in their civil and political rights, cannot be referred arises from a misconception of the term. This case sounds in fundamentals, not in definitions. It is not the resolution, but the act of the legislature in adopting it that is to be referred. A resolution, like all acts of the legislature, is to be measured by the end accomplished. It is true that we have no provision in our constitution providing for the passage of resolutions, even in the formal matters in which the legislature has throughout the entire history of our territory and state been wont to act, but it is just as evident that there is no limitation upon the power of the legislature to act by resolution.

The constitutions of some of the states and the constitution of the United States (section 7, article 1) permit or recognize the practice of acting by resolution, and some of them limit its uses. It has been held, if the constitution is silent, as ours is, that legislation cannot be effected by that method. Boyers v. Crane, 1 W.Va. 176; State ex rel. Attorney General v. Kinney, 56 Ohio St. 721, 47 N.E. 569; Barry v. Viall, 12 R.I. 18.

And were we considering a matter involving private right arising in or out of the laws of this state, we could not question the authorities just cited; but they are not applicable for the reason that the authority to act in the matter of a proposed amendment to the constitution of the United States does not arise in or out of the constitution of the state, but arises out of the Federal constitution, and any act, whether it be by resolution or by bill, on the part of the state legislature must be held to be a sufficient expression of the legislative will unless Congress itself challenges the method or manner of its adoption. It is upon this principle that the supreme court of the United States has held that the question whether the referendum does violence to the constitution of the United States is non-justiciable, holding that the question whether it deprives the government of a state of its representative character, thus violating the guarantee of a republican form of government, is a question for Congress and not for the courts. The power to question the manner of adoption being in Congress and not in the courts, the contention that the legislature had no power to act by resolution is non-justiciable; but this holding does not foreclose an inquiry as to the legislative character of the thing done. . . .

The final and, as we believe, the principal ground of opposition is that the amendment, being submitted under article V of the constitution of the United States, is a Federal question in the sense that state laws and state constitutions have no bearing upon or relation to the issue.

It is argued that, inasmuch as article V of the constitution of the United States provides that a proposed amendment "shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof," etc., the people have hitherto fixed the manner and form of ratification, against which the reserved power of the people of a sovereign state may not prevail. If we are to stand upon the word "legislatures," if that word, and that alone, is the Alpha and Omega of our inquiry, it follows that the controversy is at an end, but we are cited to no instances where a great question involving the political rights of a people have been met by such technical recourse—where any court has so exalted the letter or so debased the spirit of the law. . . .

It may be set down as a truism that the Congress of the United States has no concern of the manner in which the people of the several states pass upon the proposed amendment. It is the act of ratification or rejection by the legislative power in a state, and not the manner of doing, that makes for the result to be accomplished.

It may be true that it might have been provided that amendments could be made directly by Congress, and the submission of amendments for ratification or rejection by the legislatures of the several states at all was a matter of grace upon the part of the whole people when the constitution was adopted, but we would incline to the opinion that the right to pass upon proposed amendments should be treated as a reservation in the several states of the right to express their legislative will in the manner in which they had then provided or might thereafter provide and, when so regarded, as a compact between the states and the Federal government.

It is provided in the Federal constitution that proposed amendments shall be ratified by the legislatures of the states or by conventions assembled for the purpose of considering them. It cannot be urged successfully that the framers of the constitution used the words "legislatures" and "conventions" as terms describing then present institutions, for it is well known that, at the time the constitution was adopted, some of the states did not have legislative assemblies.

Article V can mean no more than this: that no amendment shall be adopted unless it is sanctioned by the supreme legislative power of a sufficient number of the commonwealths, whether such ratification be by legislative assembly, convention, or such other method as might thereafter be adopted by the people in the several states.

If we hold that the words "legislatures" and "conventions" do not control the plain purpose and spirit of article V—that is, that the people shall pass upon a proposed amendment by their representatives, if that be the plan provided by them at the time of its submission, or, if not, under such other plan of expressing their will as may not be offensive to the Federal constitution—we are on solid ground. For the framers of the constitution had well in mind—for they had lived in that time when our political system was being fashioned into concrete form—they understood, as we sometimes forget that

“The theory of our political system is that the ultimate sovereignty is in the people, for whom springs all legitimate authority.” Cooley, Constitutional Limitations (6th ed.), p. 39.

Wherefore it may be said that it is the meaning and intent of article V that an amendment to the constitution of the United States shall not become effective until it has been ratified by the legislative authority of a sufficient number of the states, and it should not be held that a ratification or rejection by a popular vote under the referendum clause of a state constitution would be contrary to the provisions of article V, unless it can be said, under sound rules of construction, that the referendum is offensive to the constitution of the United States.

The people of several of the states, having the sovereign right of self-government, excepting only as they may have yielded that right under the constitution of the United States and its amendments, have adopted the referendum as a rule of government, and the only objection that has ever been urged, or that could have been urged against it, is that it violates section 4, article IV of the constitution guaranteeing to every state a republican form of government. The supreme court of the United States has held that it does not so offend. Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Oregon, 223 U.S. 118, 32 S.Ct. 224, 56 L.Ed. 377.

The fault of disassociating a word or correlative words from the text of a written law and premising a judgment without the warmth of spirit of that law may be illustrated. If we are wrong it may well be that a state might, and withal unwittingly, put it beyond its power to pass upon a proposed amendment to the Federal constitution. If the people of this state had, when they adopted the referendum, provided for the abolition of our legislative assembly (as they might have done), and had provided that all laws should thereafter be initiated by and voted upon by direct vote of the people, or that the legislative functions of the state be exercised by a council of three and that all their acts should be subject to a referendum at the next succeeding general election, it would follow, under the theory advanced to defeat a referendum in this case, that a proposed amendment could not be either ratified or rejected in the state of Washington, for there would be no “legislature” or “convention” in the sense in which those terms are employed in the Federal constitution.

Significance is placed on the word “conventions,” it being contended that, if the word “legislatures” had been used alone, our argument might seem plausible, but the added word “conventions” necessarily implies that Congress had in mind a representative body and not legislative authority; but we are inclined to take a broader view.

It was doubtless intended that "legislatures" should mean one thing; that is, the legislative authority of the state; and "conventions" another thing, an extraordinary representative body convened by and in the state for the sole purpose of passing upon the proposed amendment to the Federal constitution. If it had no other intention in adopting the term "legislatures"—in specifying one of the instrumentalities for passing upon the proposed amendment—than to express the idea of legislative power, of whatever that power consists, then it must be deemed to mean all the branches or component parts of that power, which have included the qualified voters also if they so desire. Inasmuch as the constitution was formulated not for a day or a year, but for all time, except as amended, we may consider that it contemplated the same kinds of state legislative bodies then in existence and known to the framers, or any other kinds of legislative bodies that should come into existence in the future.

One of the important ideas governing the framers of the national constitution was that amendments to that instrument should be ratified by the states as units, recognizing and preserving the integrity and sovereignty of the states as parties to the compact creating and continuing that constitution. Doubtless there was no other idea prevailing in providing for adoption of amendments by the "legislatures" or "conventions" of three-fourths of the states than that. Certainly it was, and is, of no concern to the others what sort of legislature any particular state has, so long as it conforms to the scheme of a republican form of government.

We have preferred to meet the question upon the plane of broad reason, having in mind the spirit and policy of the referendum, but we are not without competent authority to prove that the manner or the name attached to the legislative power of the state, whether it be a representative body or the people themselves, is of no concern to the Federal government. . . .

Our attention is called to a decision of the supreme court of Oregon in Herbring v. Brown, 92 Or. 176, 180 P. 328. The premise of the decision is that the reserved power of the people is limited to a review of "any act of the legislative assembly," and that the word "act" was used having in mind the exercise of the legislative function as outlined in the original draft of the state constitution, and that the word "act" did not comprehend a joint resolution.

We have already demonstrated that our constitution is more comprehensive. The decision does not appeal to us for another reason. Its basis is fundamentally unsound in that it proceeds upon the theory that the right of the people to legislate upon the question rests in the antecedent provisions of the state constitution, whereas the right comes from the constitution of the United States.

Other questions were discussed by counsel. We have considered them and are agreed that they are not controlling.

The writ will issue.

NOTES

1. "In the absence of constitutional provisions, however, the courts have generally held invalid the attempts of legislatures to enact statutes the execution of which is made contingent upon statewide popular approval." 41 Yale L.J. 132, 133 (1931). See also supra at p. 222.

2. In Hawke v. Smith No. 1, 253 U.S. 221, 40 S.Ct. 405, 64 L.Ed. 871, 10 A.L.R. 1504 (1919), the question was whether a provision of the Ohio constitution extending the referendum to the ratification by the General Assembly of proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution was in conflict with Art. V of the Constitution of the United States. In deciding in the affirmative, Day, J., said: "What did the framers of the Constitution mean in requiring ratification by 'Legislatures'?" That was not a term of uncertain meaning when incorporated into the Constitution. A legislature was then the representative body which made the laws of the people. . . . The argument to support the power of the State to require the approval by the people of the State of ratification of amendments to the Federal Constitution through the medium of a referendum rests upon the proposition that the Federal Constitution requires ratification by the legislative action of the States through the medium provided at the time of the proposed approval of an amendment. The argument is fallacious in this—ratification by a state of a constitutional amendment is not an act of legislation, within the proper sense of the word. It is but the expression of the assent of the State to a proposed amendment. . . . It is true that the power to legislate in the enactment of the laws of a State is derived from the people of the State. But the power to ratify a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution has its source in the Federal Constitution. The act of ratification by the State derives its authority from the Federal Constitution to which the State and its people have alike assented." For a discussion of the problem involved in this case and the principal case see Taft, "Can Ratification of an Amendment to the Constitution be Made to Depend on a Referendum?" 29 Yale L.J. 821 (1920).

3. See Moulton v. Scully, 111 Me. 428, 89 A. 944 (1914), holding that the power of the state legislature to recommend the removal of a public officer by address is unaffected by a constitutional provision which provides that resolutions of the legislature are subject to referendum.

STATE v. OSBORN

Supreme Court of Arizona, 1914. 16 Ariz. 247, 143 P. 117.

PER CURIAM. This is an action brought to restrain the Secretary of State from certifying and causing to be printed on the official ballot at the election to be held on November 3, 1914, an initiated measure to create and organize Miami county. The complaint alleges:

"That the said proposed initiative bill is legally insufficient in this: That it purports and is intended to provide for the division of Gila county and to create the county of Miami, and that the said bill has no application in any other part of the state, and cannot operate at any other time than as provided in the said proposed bill and that the same can have no application to any other part of the state and cannot operate at any other time, and that it is local and special legislation, and is intended to divide a particular county and to create a particular county, without reference to any other counties, or to any other time, and that each of the matters and things intended, provided, and proposed to be enacted can be done by general law, and that the said proposed initiative bill is in conflict with subdivision 20 of section 19, of article 4 of the Constitution of the state of Arizona, in that it is a special, local law in a case where a general law can be made applicable, and for these reasons the said proposed initiative bill is legally insufficient within the scope and meaning of paragraph 3327 of the Revised Statutes of Arizona."

A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and, the plaintiff refusing to amend, judgment was rendered in favor of defendant. The appeal is from this judgment.

Paragraph 3327, Civil Code of 1913, provides that:

" . . . On a showing that any petition is not legally sufficient, the court may enjoin the Secretary of State and all other officers from certifying or printing on the official ballot for the ensuing election the ballot title and number of the measure or proposed amendment to the Constitution set forth in such petition. . . ."

It is conceded that the petition in this instance is regular in form, and is signed by the requisite number of legal voters, the only objection to the measure going on the official ballot being that it is special legislation, and therefore, when tested by subdivision 20 of section 19, article 4, of the Constitution, is "legally insufficient." It is claimed that the Secretary of State should look beyond the mere form of the petition and into its substance with a view of determining if the proposed law is in conflict with the Constitution; that he should determine if the measure should be enacted whether it would be a valid law or not, and if in his judgment an invalid law, it is his duty to refuse to certify it for a place on the official ballot. The Constitution makes the petition an indispensably necessary thing and step in the process of legislation directly by the people. It is as much so as the drawing and introducing of a bill in the legislature by one of its members. Whether the voters in taking this step are acting ministerially or in their legislative capacity is immaterial. In either event the step is essential, made so by the Constitution and by legislation. Chapter 1, tit. 22, Civ.Code 1913.

The government of the state is divided into three separate departments, the legislative, the executive, and judicial, and it is provided by the Constitution (article 3) that:

"Such departments shall be separate and distinct, and no one of such departments shall exercise the powers properly belonging to either of the others."

In Allen v. State, 14 Ariz. 458, 130 P. 1114, 44 L.R.A.,N.S., 468, we said:

"The people did not commit to the legislature the whole law-making power of the state, but they especially reserved in themselves the power to initiate and defeat legislation by their votes. In this state the legislature and the people constitute the law-making power."

The appellant concedes that the courts are powerless to restrain a member of the legislature from introducing any measure, valid or did, for the reason that the courts cannot interfere with the action of the legislative department. What legal warrant has a court to enjoin the Secretary of State from certifying a measure whether valid or invalid? Is not the initiative petition also a step in the process of legislation? For the Secretary of State, or the courts, to assume to advance the power and right to decide whether the proposed measure was invalid would be tantamount to claiming the power of life and death over every initiated measure by the people. It would limit the right of the people to propose only valid laws, whereas the other law-making body, the legislature, would go untrammelled as to the legal soundness of its measures. Such differentiation of powers is expressly prohibited by section 14, article 22, Constitution, which says:

"Any law which may be enacted by the legislature under this Constitution may be enacted by the people under the initiative. Any law which may not be enacted by the legislature under this Constitution shall not be enacted by the people."

This certainly means that the power of the people to legislate is as great as the power of the legislature to legislate, and for the courts to assume a supervision of one of the law-making bodies, and require that measures proposed by it must first receive judicial sanction before action by that body, while the other may proceed without let or hindrance, is not in accordance with the letter or spirit of the Constitution.

We conclude, following Oklahoma and Oregon, whose Constitutions on the initiative are like ours, that the words "legally sufficient" as used in paragraph 3327, Civil Code of 1913, mean that the petition shall conform with the requirements of the law as to form and signature. It is not a legal petition if not regular in form, and does not contain the signatures of legal voters as required. Of course, this requires that the petition shall be genuine. If it is fraudulent or if the signatures are forged, it is not legally sufficient. As the court said in State v. Olcott, 62 Or. 277, at page 279, 125 P. 303, at page 304:

"We are of the opinion that by the term 'legally sufficient' the legislature meant to describe a valid petition, signed by legal voters, and complying substantially, not necessarily technically, with the requirements of the law."

The petition here attacked is not irregular, but in form conforms with the requirements of the law. In Threadgill v. Cross, 109 P. 558, 26 Okl. 403, 138 Am.St.Rep. 964, the court said that the secretary, in an action like this one, "may not defend against this proceeding by questioning the validity of the proposed amendment." The last court further said:

"In the procedure for amending the Constitution of this state (the same is true as to initiated laws), which can only be effected by an election thereon, it becomes necessary for the people of the state to call into their service certain of their executive officers, and require them to perform certain ministerial duties. If the placing of such duties upon such ministerial officers gives in turn to them the right and power to question the validity of any or all the amendments proposed, and to refuse to act when they decide that any such proposed measure will be invalid, then the most subordinate ministerial officer of the state having any duties to perform in connection with such an election may himself do indirectly that which he could not have, nor any other citizen of the state have the courts do by proceeding instituted for that measure, to wit, pass upon the validity of the proposed measure and stay the election by a judicial decree, if it be determined that the proposed measure is invalid."

In State ex rel. Cranmer v. Thorson, 9 S.D. 149, 68 N.W. 202, 33 L.R.A. 582, it was said:

"Power to amend the Constitution belongs exclusively to the legislature and electors. It is legislation of the most important character. This court has power to determine what such legislation is, what the Constitution contains, but not what it should contain. It has power to determine what statutory laws exist, and whether or not they conflict with the Constitution; but it cannot say what laws shall or shall not be enacted. It has the power, and it is its duty, whenever the question arises in the usual course of litigation, wherein the substantial rights of any actual litigant are involved, to decide whether any statute has been legally enacted, or whether any change in the Constitution has been legally effected, but it will hardly be contended that it can interpose in any case to restrain the enactment of an unconstitutional law."

Whether or not the proposed law if enacted by the people will be a valid exercise of the legislative power reserved by them in their fundamental law is not in this case, and, of course, cannot now be determined by this court. What we do hold is that the appellant is precluded in this proceeding from questioning the constitutionality of such proposed law. If the people do enact such proposed law when submitted to them at the polls, as well said in Threadgill v. Cross, supra:

"That question can and will be determined only when it is presented to this court in the course of litigation by some litigant whose rights are involved."

In deciding this case, we are not concerned with questions of policy, or as to whether it is right and proper that the whole people of the state should be permitted to vote on the question of the division of Gila county and the creation of Miami county. The question of policy in thus allowing the whole people of the state to vote on what is concededly a local matter is one that belongs to another department. It is for us to declare the law as we find it.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTES

1. Cf. State v. Superior Court for Thurston County, 92 Wash. 16, 159 P. 92 (1916), where a restrictive injunction was granted enjoining the defendants (the initiators of a measure and the Secretary of State) from printing and circulating public expense an initiative petition while it contained a "declaration of purposes" which the court held not to be a genuine preamble but a "mere argument and mere statements in support of the proposed measure". The court said:

To establish that the procedure questioned is unfair is not sufficient. Any law proposed may be, and often is, unfair to some. Except when dealing with essential morals or fundamental principles, in the modern complexity of human affairs and relations there is little legislation that can be said to be entirely fair. Legislative bodies, whether delegated or principals in mass, are not to be stopped from exercising the supreme function of making laws by such considerations. The real question now to be determined is, Have they the power? Courts will not concern themselves with any questions of policy or hardship or expediency. Nor will they in any case intervene to hinder or influence the process of legislation in any of its steps. Were it a question of whether a delegated member of legislative body of any kind could introduce to that body a "bill" or law of any kind, no matter how arbitrary, how novel, or how foolish, the answer at the very outset would unhesitatingly be that no other department of our triune form of government could in any wise interpose. We now have a dual system of legislation; one by a delegated, bicameral legislature, deliberative, maker of its own rules of procedure in general; the other by the legal voters of the state in mass. Here we have the question, Is the proponent of an initiative measure in any sense a legislator? And ancillary to that, is the filing of a proposed bill or law a legislative step? A third and vital question then arises, Can the courts interfere?

"As to the first question, we conceive that an initiator of a bill (which means the draft of an act or proposed law) is not, under this system of direct legislation, a legislator. State v. Olcott, 62 Or. 277, 125 P. 303. He is merely given license or privilege to propose and file a proposed measure. This is a preliminary step in the process of legislating. It may be dispensed with, but it is nevertheless provided for in furthering or 'facilitating' the system. He must proceed in conformity with the license. The question then is, Are these proponents exercising this privilege legally? In the first place, it must be considered that we have a step or procedure authorized and granted by law and to be exercised and administered under a general law authorized by the supreme law, the constitution; not a legislator acting in a parliamentary, deliberative body, empowered within certain constitutional limitations to make its own rules of procedure at the moment, and co-equal with any other branch of government. But, it is said, the people in their legislative capacity are superior to all other branches of government, the legislative body in mass, certain legal political rights are conferred upon them to be exercised in a prescribed manner. These rights must be considered as no greater than the rights of other members of the legislative body in mass to oppose the proposed measure. It cannot be assumed that the right of one legal voter to attempt to obtain the enactment of a given measure is greater than the right of other legal voters to attempt to prevent its passage. All are equal before the law. There is no presumption that, because certain legal voters or legislators desire and propose certain legislation upon a certain subject, the same is desired by the voters in mass. In fact, it can be assumed as a safe postulate that other members of the voting mass will oppose it. It is the sole ground of relators here that they are entitled to interfere in the matter because they are voters and do oppose the proposed measure, irrespective of the merits of the measure and regardless of the reasons for their opposition, and that if the proponents of the measure are proceeding in accordance with the positive law, their only recourse is at the polls. This position is sound. This brings us to the precise question as to the legality of the procedure of the proponents.

"The present situation seems in some measure to be an attempt to evade the plain provisions of the statute regarding the publication of arguments and the payment of the expense thereof, and the decision in the last cited case. Ordinarily the reason for an enactment lies wholly in its enactment. The existence of a law ought to be its own reason. While all preambles to initiative legislation would not be subject to criticism as mere arguments by the proponents, but intended to be proper declarations of purpose in a proposed law, we are convinced that the one under consideration is; and that it is not a mere political question nor an exempt legislative process, but is regulated by the law, and is subject to judicial interpretation."

2. In State v. Stewart, 53 Mont. 18, 161 P. 309 (1916), in holding an initiated statute unconstitutional as to subject matter, the court said: "The people of this state, acting as a legislative body, can no more transgress the provisions of the state Constitution than can their representatives in the legislative assembly. The terms of the Constitution can be changed or modified only in the manner indicated in Article XIX of the Constitution."

GREENOUGH v. GREENOUGH

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1849. 11 Pa. 489, 51 Am.Dec. 567.

Error to the District Court of Allegheny.

Sept. 17. This was an action of ejectment by John against Thomas Greenough. It appeared that Elizabeth Greenough died seised of the premises, unmarried, without issue, and leaving three brothers and a sister. The plaintiff and defendant were brothers of Elizabeth. She executed a will on the 17th August, 1840, and died ten days afterwards.

The plaintiff below, relying upon her dying intestate, offered no evidence other than the admission of the foregoing facts; denying, however, the legal execution of the will.

The defendant, claiming under the will, examined the subscribing witnesses to it, whose material testimony was as follows:—

Andrew Nicholson, sworn.—I signed this will as a witness. I went to her bed-side, and was introduced to Elizabeth Greenough. The will was read to her. It is my impression she requested me to sign it as a witness: either before or after it was read. She declared it to be her last will and testament, after it was read to her. M. B. Lowrie also signed it in the presence of the testatrix, and in my presence. I saw her make the mark, with the assistance of Lowrie steadying her hand. She was nervous at the time. The name was written by Lowrie, I think: it was there when she made her mark. She was feeble, and not able to write.

Cross-examined.—She was very nervous; her hand shook very much. I don't recollect her asking Lowrie to write her name. It would not have been possible for her to write her name. No conversation about her mark or signature afterwards. She appeared exhausted—said nothing. She grew worse after the will was signed, till she died. I did not hear her request any person to write her name.

M. B. Lowrie, sworn.—I wrote this will, under Elizabeth's direction, from her dictation. I read it carefully over, and she assented to it, and when I took it to her to sign it, she said she was not able and requested me to sign it for her. I did so. Before she subscribed her mark, I asked her if she acknowledged this to be her last will, and if we, myself and another, should sign it as witnesses. She assented to both, and I then subscribed it as a witness, and Nicholson also in my presence. She made her mark to the will in my presence. She could write before this, I think, but not at this time.

Cross-examined.—I may have steadied her hand, but she made the mark.

This will devised the land in controversy to Thomas, the defendant, for life, and after his death to be divided among the children of John, and others.

The signature of the will and the mark, described by the subscribing witnesses, was in this form.

her Elizabeth X Greenough
mark.

The will was admitted to probate, 19th May, 1842.

The jury was directed pro forma that the will was well proved, and good and valid in law, and that the defendant was entitled to their verdict. The questions of law were reserved. In the opinion subsequently delivered by Hepburn, President, the learned judge held that the proof of the testatrix expressly directing Lowrie to sign her name to the will was insufficient, under the act of 1833, and that the will was of no effect under that act, but that the proof of her mark, under the act of 1848, was sufficient—the law acting upon the remedy and not upon the estate, and so violating no constitutional provision. Judgment on the verdict for the defendant.

GIBSON, C. J. So far as regards wills consummated by the testator's death—and this is one of them—the act of 1848 is founded on no power known to the constitution, but on the assumption of a power appropriated exclusively to the judiciary. Every tyro or sciolist knows that it is the province of the legislature to enact, of the judiciary to expound, and of the executive to enforce. These functions may, if the people will it, be performed by a single organ; but the people of Pennsylvania have not so willed it. They have ordained that the judicial power of the Commonwealth be vested in a Supreme court, in County Courts of Common Pleas, Oyer and Terminer, and Quarter Sessions, in a Register's Court, and an Orphans' Court: and in such other courts as the legislature may from time to time establish. But the judicial power of the Commonwealth is its whole judicial power; and it is so distributed, that the legislature cannot exercise any part of it. Under the constitution, therefore, there is no mixed power—partly legislative and partly judicial—such as was recognized in Bradee v. Brownfield. Did it exist, it could be exercised only in concert or in common; for it would give the judiciary as much right to legislate as it would give the legislature right to adjudicate. Thus blended, I know of no constitutional power, principle, or provision, that would give to either of them, as a co-ordinate branch, an exclusive right to the whole. What then did the legislature propose by the statute of 1848? This court had ruled in Barr v. Strobell, Cavett's Appeal, that a testator's mark to his name, at the foot of a testamentary paper, but without proof that the name was written by his express direction, is not the signature required by the act of 1833; and the legislature has declared, in order to overrule it, that "every last will and testament heretofore made, or hereafter to be made, except such as may have been finally adjudicated prior to the passage of this act, to which the testator's name is subscribed by his direction, or to which the testator has made his mark or cross, shall be deemed and taken to be valid." How this mandate to the courts, to establish a particular interpretation of a particular statute, can be taken for anything else than an exercise of judicial power in settling a question of interpretation, I know not. The judiciary had certainly recognized a legislative interpretation of a statute before it had itself acted, and consequently before a purchaser could be misled by its judgment; but he might have paid for a title on the unmistakable meaning of plain words; and for the legislature subsequently to distort or pervert it, or to enact that white meant black, or that black meant white, would, in the same degree, be an exercise of arbitrary and unconstitutional power. All ex post facto laws are arbitrary; and it is to be regretted that the constitutional prohibition of them has been restricted to laws for penalties and punishments. In a moral or political aspect, an invasion of the right of property is as unjust as an invasion of the right of personal security. But retroactive legislation began and has been continued, because the judiciary has thought itself too weak to withstand; too weak, because it has neither the patronage nor the prestige necessary to sustain it against the antagonism of the legislature and the bar. Yet, had it taken its stand on the rampart of the constitution at the onset, there is some little reason to think it might have held its ground. Instead of that, it pursued a temporizing course till the mischief had become intolerable, and till it was compelled to invalidate certain acts of legislation, or rather to reverse certain legislative decrees. Conceding the right of legislative interpretation in the first instance, because it has prevailed too long to be disputed, we can pronounce the act of 1848 to be exclusively prospective without disturbing titles.

It is destitute of retroactive force, not only because it was an act of judicial power, but because it contravenes the declaration in the ninth section of the ninth article of the constitution, that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. Taking the proof of execution, at this stage of the argument, to be defective under the act of 1833, it would follow that the plaintiff had become the owner of a third of the property in contest, by the only assurance that any man can have for his property—the law. Yet the legislature attempted to divest it, by a general law it is true, but one impinging on particular rights. Still it is argued that the act may be sustained as a confirmation of conveyances by will, as a confirmation of conveyances by deed was sustained in Underwood v. Silly, Mercer v. Watson, 8 Pet. 110, and other cases of the class. It was remarked in Menges v. Wertman, 1 Barr 218, that a party, who has received a benefit from a transaction, is under a moral obligation to convey, and that the legislature may add a legal one to it; and I still think that a distinction between a purchaser and a volunteer, is the only ground left to us to found a practical limitation of special legislation. In this case, the devisee is a volunteer, and the heirs are bound by no obligation which did not bind the legitimate heirs in Norman v. Heist. But the great obstacle in Menges v. Wertman, was the number of titles that depended on legislation of the same stamp. I have doubted whether we ought not to have swept them all away; but we had a choice of evils set before us, and want of steadiness in the judiciary was thought to be the greater one. Decision, however, has not established a rule of property to control us in the present case; for judicial interpretation of the act of 1833 had preceded the act of 1848. The statutes in Hess v. Wertz and Satterlee v. Mathewson, 2 Pet. 380, were enacted, not to create a contract or to confirm one, but to remove a disability; and the protection not of a party, but the public, was certainly within the constitutional range of legislative action.

The defendant's next position is, that the testatrix's name, written by another, without her express direction, but acknowledged by her mark, was within the true intent and meaning of the original act. . . .

As a special case seems to be made for the opinion of the court, and not the jury, I am of opinion that the attestation was prima facie evidence, and sufficient.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTES

1. In Lambertson v. Hogan, 2 Pa. 22 (1845), it was said at p. 25: "Explanatory acts must be construed as operating on future cases alone, except where they are designed to explain a doubtful statute, in which cases they deserve and always will receive the most respectful attention from the judicial branch of the government."

2. Section 2 of an act approved September 17, 1861, amending an act of 1860, provided that "nothing contained in the act incorporating said board, approved January 12, 1860, shall be construed so as to prevent or hinder said board or their successors from removing the seat of their college . . . to any other place" It was claimed that this section was unconstitutional as declaratory of the meaning of the previous act. The court held, however, that the section was not unconstitutional as a declaration of the meaning of the former act and thus in its nature judicial, but that the section merely gave the power of removal where that power was not expressly given by the former act. Bryan et al. v. Board of Education of the Kentucky Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South, 90 Ky. 322, 13 S.W. 276, 277, 12 Ky.Law Rep. 12 (1900).

3. In The Postmaster General v. Early, 12 Wheat. 136, 6 L.Ed. 577 (1827), Marshall C. J., said at pp. 148-9: "The legislature may pass a declaratory act, which, though inoperative on the past, may act in the future."

MERCHANT SHIPPING (Seaman's Allotment) ACT 1911

1 & 2, Geo. V., c. 8.

An Act to remove certain doubts as to the true interpretation of the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 to 1906, in respect of the Payment of Seamen's Allotment Notes. (18th August 1911.)

Whereas doubts have arisen as to the true interpretation of section one hundred and forty-one of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and section sixty-two of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. By agreement with the master an allotment note may be granted to a seaman providing for—

(a) payment of a greater sum than one half of the wages;

(b) payment at a period earlier than one month from the date of the agreement with the crew and at intervals more frequent than one month.

2. This Act may be cited as the Merchant Shipping (Seamen's Allotment) Act, 1911.

HARDING v. COMMISSIONER OF STAMPS FOR QUEENSLAND

Judicial Committee of Privy Council. [1898] A.C. 769

LORD HOBHOUSE. This appeal arises out of a claim made on behalf of the Crown to charge succession duty on the estate of Silas Harding. The appellants are his executors. The respondents are the Stamp Commissioners, who claim duty. The Supreme Court to whom the executors appealed have decided that duty is chargeable. On some disputed points they decided against the commissioners, but there is no appeal on those points. The executors maintain that no duty is payable at all.

Silas Harding died in the year 1894, domiciled in the Colony of Victoria. In September, 1894, his will was proved in Victoria, and in April, 1895, ancillary letters of probate were granted by the Supreme Court of Queensland. He had a large property, and among it were the following particulars: (1) A debt of 102,036£. 2s. 7d. due from a Mr. Doneley; (2) a debt of 20,863£. 0s. 3d. due from the Queensland Brewery; (3) 3,000 shares in the Royal Bank of Queensland. The two debts were secured by mortgages on land, stock, and goods in Queensland. It is on these three items that the Supreme Court has held duty to be chargeable under the terms of the Succession and Probate Duties Act, 1892, as amended in 1895.

From the written reasons of the learned judges their Lordships collect that if the Act of 1892 had stood alone they would have felt constrained by the course of decisions in England, though not fully assenting to them, to hold that no duty was chargeable. Their judgment in effect turns on the application of the Act of 1895, and the first question is what was the law immediately before that Act was passed.

Sect. 4 of the Act of 1892 is in effect, as the learned judges point out, a transcript of s. 2 of the English Succession Duty Act of 1853. The material words are "Every . . . disposition of property by reason of which any person . . . shall become beneficially entitled to any property upon the death of any person . . . shall be deemed . . . to confer on the person entitled by reason of such disposition . . .

a succession"; and on that succession the duties are fastened. The literal force of these expressions includes the estate of Silas Harding. But then it includes a great deal more which nobody can suppose that the Legislature intended to tax: it includes all persons and all property all over the world, and if not confined within reasonable limits would enable the Queensland authorities to levy a tax in respect of foreign property on foreigners when within their power. Abnormal consequences such as these have been avoided by judicial decisions in England.

In Thompson v. Advocate-General the question arose under words of a similar character in the Act of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184. That Act imposed duties on "every legacy given by any will of any person." A gentleman domiciled in Demerara owned money locally situate in Scotland on which the Crown claimed legacy duty. The case was ultimately decided in the House of Lords; the judges were consulted, and their joint opinion delivered by Tindal, C. J. He pointed out the absolute necessity of limiting the sense of the words, and laid it down that such necessary limitation is that the statute does not extend to the will of any person domiciled out of Great Britain, whether the assets are locally situate there or not. That opinion was adopted by the House.

In Wallace v. Attorney-General a similar question arose under s. 2 of the English Succession Duty Act of 1853, which defines a succession in the same way as the Queensland Act of 1892. A gentleman domiciled in France owned personal property in England consisting of a sum of Consols. The Crown claimed succession duty on that property. Lord Cranworth held that the same limitation which had been put on the words "every legacy given by any will of any person" must be put on the words "every disposition whereby any person becomes entitled," and that the person intended is a person who becomes entitled by the laws of this country.

The soundness of this principle of construction has never been impugned, nor has the British Legislature thought fit to put any different limitation upon the generality of the terms in which legacy duty and succession duty are imposed. The matter appears to be well summed up in Mr. Dicey's work on the Conflict of Laws at p. 785, in which he paraphrases Lord Cranworth's application of the principle "Mobilia sequuntur personam" by saying that the law of domicile prevails over that of situation.

It is, of course, a maintainable opinion that the law of situation should prevail, and that a line which brings under the general words of taxation property which is protected by the taxing State, and which in case of dispute is administered by it, would form a more reasonable limitation of such words than the limitation by domicile. The learned judges below inclined to that principle; and the Queensland Legislature has adopted it. But the Court has only to decide what the Legislature meant when it passed the Act of 1892. Now, the decision in Thompson's Case was given in the year 1845; that in Wallace's Case just twenty years later; and it has been taken ever since that the expressions in question do not apply to movable property belonging to persons of foreign domicile. Nearly thirty years after the later decision the Queensland Legislature passed their Succession Duty Act in terms identical with those of the English Act of 1853. It is impossible to suppose that they did not intend those terms to be read in the sense affixed to them by the English tribunals, and in which they would be read by every lawyer and every official conversant with the subject-matter.

It remains to see whether the Act of 1895 alters the incidence of the Act of 1892 upon a will which took effect in 1894, and the probate of which was granted in Queensland several months before the later Act came into force; in other words, whether the Act of 1895 is retrospective.

The Act is entitled "An Act to amend the Succession and Probate Duties Act, 1892"; and s. 1 provides that it may be cited as "The Succession and Probate Duties Act, 1892, Amendment Act of 1895." The important section is the second, which runs thus:—

"2. It is hereby declared that upon the issue of any grant of probate or administration in Queensland, succession duty is chargeable in respect of all property within Queensland, although the testator or intestate may not have had his domicile in Queensland."

That enactment is calculated to meet such cases as the present one, and if retrospective would be conclusive in favour of the respondents. The Supreme Court think that the section is declaratory because of the opening expression, "it is declared"; and then they go on to reason that a declaratory Act is prima facie retrospective, and confine themselves to examining whether it contains anything of a contrary nature so as to neutralize its declaratory and retrospective character.

Their Lordships cannot take such a view of the Act. The use of the expression "it is declared" to introduce new rules of law is not incorrect, and is far from uncommon. The nature of the Act must be determined from its provisions. Now, the Act does not contain any words to shew that it purports to construe the Act of 1892; it does purport to amend it; every other of its provisions is in language prospective, and in s. 2 itself the new rule is to take effect "upon the issue of any grant of probate," which is not fitting language to apply to estates for which probate has already been granted. In fact, the language of the Act points, as their Lordships think, distinctly to future operations. And, inasmuch as it falls under two well-established canons of construction, both requiring that, as against the persons sought to be affected, it should be shewn quite clearly and strictly to effect them—first, that which relates to statutes imposing liabilities, and, secondly, that which relates to retrospective statutes—their Lordships feel no hesitation in deciding that the Act cannot be retrospective.

The result is that, when the will of Silas Harding took effect and when the Queensland letters of probate were granted, the law of 1892 did not subject his movable assets to succession duty, and that the state of things so existing has not been disturbed by subsequent legislation. They will humbly advise Her Majesty to discharge the order appealed from so far as it declares that succession duty is chargeable on all the property of the testator which was in Queensland at the time of his death, and, instead thereof, to declare that no succession duty is payable on the three items of the testator's property which are the subject of this appeal. The respondents must pay the costs of this appeal.

2. In Attorney General v. Theobald, 24 Q.B.D. 537 (1890), the question was whether a stamp duty was due on property passing under a trust made in consideration of marriage, which property passed to the next of kin of the settlor in 1885. The Statute of 1881 provided that a stamp tax should be paid on property passing under a voluntary settlement, and the defendant claimed that as the settlement involved was in consideration of marriage, it was not voluntary. Although the pleadings were closed and the case was ready for argument prior to the Act of 1889 which amended the Act of 1881 by including within the expression "voluntary settlement" "any trust . . . in favor of a volunteer", it was held that although the Act of 1889 states that the Act of 1881 "is hereby amended", the material part shows that the earlier Act must be read as having its meaning declared by the later Act. Hawkins, J., said at p. 561: "The words are of a declaratory character directing that, in all cases where the construction of sub-s. 3 of s. 38 comes in question after the passage of the Act of 1889, the former Act shall be construed as prescribed by the later Act."

3. See also Kimbray v. Draper, L.R. 3 Q.B. 160 (1868), where an Act with regard to costs was given retroactive effect, Blackburn, J., stating at p. 161: "The rule of interpretation in such cases is, that when the enactment changes or takes away rights, it is not to be construed as retrospective unless there are express words to that effect, but when it only changes mode of procedure, it is to be applied to all actions." To the same effect with regard to taxation of costs see Freeman v. Moyes, 1 Ad. & E. 338 (1834).

4. For a statement setting forth when statutes declaratory in form are retroactive in operation and when retroactive operation should not be given to a statute, see Young v. Adams, [1898] A.C. 469. A history of the development of the opposition to retroactive legislation and the present meaning of the principle appears in Smead, "The Rule Against Retroactive Legislation: A Basic Principle of Jurisprudence," 20 Minn.L.Rev. 775 (1936).

5. The constitutional limitations in the United States have been advanced as the reason why declaratory legislation in this country has usually been held to be prospective in operation only, when it is sustained at all, whereas England, with no constitutional restrictions, will give a declaratory statute retroactive effect where the language of the statute clearly so warrants. See Note, "Declaratory Legislation," 49 Harv.L.Rev. 137 (1935).

EXCERPT FROM STUDY "REVISION OF STATUTES IN MATTER OF FORM" *

N. Y. Leg. Doc. (1947) No. 65 (N), 44-45.

Evidence of the intent of the Legislature may also be drawn from subsequent legislation, amending or supplementing the original act and establishing a meaning which was formerly uncertain. Such legislation is fully operative to declare the law for the future, and a change in language, particularly following a judicial decision, will be given great weight in determining the meaning of the amended statute. But while it may sometimes be expressly made retroactive so as to change or settle the law as to cases to which the former law was applicable, it is not conclusive as to the original meaning of the act.¹ Nevertheless, legislation of this kind has been relied on, as a "practical interpretation."² Of course, the presumption that an amendatory act is intended to make a change in the law ordinarily leads to the conclusion that the law prior to the amendment was not as expressed in the amendment.

The following test was stated in People v. Davenport:

"The force which should be given to subsequent, as affecting prior legislation, depends largely upon the circumstances under which it takes place. If it follows immediately after controversies upon the use of doubtful phraseology therein have arisen as to the true construction of the prior law it is entitled to great weight. . . . If it takes place after a considerable lapse of time and the intervention of other sessions of the legislature, a radical change of phraseology would indicate an intention to supply some provisions not embraced in the former statute."³

Apart from this test many amendatory acts appear clearly, or are shown by intrinsic evidence, to be intended as clarifying measures. And when an amendment does not purport to clarify, but adds new matter which is relevant and operative only on the assumption of a particular construction of the statute, or a construction of the

At the same session the mistake was noticed, the repealed act was restored, and acts done under it were confirmed and ratified. STATE v. CANNON

Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1932. 206 Wis. 374, 240 N.W. 441.

OWEN, J. Raymond J. Cannon, a former member of the bar of this court, was ordered suspended from such office for a period of two years on the 5th day of July, 1929. "State v. Cannon, 199 Wis. 401, 226 N.W. 385. The order of suspension, as an additional penalty, required the said Raymond J. Cannon to pay the costs of the original proceeding against him, which were taxed at the sum of $2,699.78. The costs thus taxed were not paid. On the 23th day of May, 1931, under the provisions of said order, he made application for his reinstatement." . . .

The application was argued before the court on the 14th day of November, 1931. Aside from the question of whether the conduct of Mr. Cannon subsequent to his suspension had been such as to merit reinstatement, the court was confronted with the serious question of whether chapter 480, Laws 1931, was constitutional in so far as it purports (1) to reinstate said Raymond J. Cannon as an attorney at law; and (2) in so far as it purports to remit the costs imposed upon Mr. Cannon by the order of suspension. The statute reads as follows: "The license to practice law, duly issued to Raymond J. Cannon on the thirtieth day of April, 1914, and revoked by judgment of the supreme court on July 5, 1929, is hereby restored, and the costs imposed by said judgment are hereby remitted, and the said Raymond J. Cannon is hereby authorized, henceforth, to exercise all the rights and privileges of a duly licensed member of the bar." . . .

Under our Constitution all legislative power is vested in a Senate and Assembly. Section 1, art. 4. In so far as the prescribing of qualifications for admission to the bar are legislative in character, the Legislature is acting within its constitutional authority when it sets up and prescribes such qualifications. That there is a field within which the prescribing of such qualifications constitutes a legislative function cannot be doubted. One of the very important functions of the Legislature is to promote the public welfare and to protect the public from the results of incompetence, imposition, and fraud on the part of those who assume to practice the learned professions and occupations requiring skill and special training. In obedience to its duty in this respect, the Legislature of this state has limited those who may follow such professions and occupations to such as may demonstrate in the manner prescribed by the Legislature their fitness and qualifications for such callings. Realizing that those who assume to practice law without the proper learning and good moral character have it in their power to work great harm upon those who have a right to assume that they are properly qualified to advise them in legal matters and to protect them in their legal rights, the Legislature has very properly prescribed certain qualifications which must be possessed by those who become licensed as attorneys at law (St.1929, § 256.28). The qualifications thus prescribed by the Legislature are presumptively such qualifications as the Legislature has deemed necessary in order to promote the public welfare and to protect the citizens of the state from imposition on the part of those who are licensed to act as attorneys at law. In thus legislating the Legislature has acted within a plain legislative field and has exercised its police power to promote the welfare of the citizens of the state. There can be no challenge to the right of the Legislature to exact of those who desire or assume to practice law such qualifications as in the judgment of the Legislature are necessary to protect the citizens of the state from becoming the unconscious victims of dishonesty or incompetence.

But when the Legislature has prescribed those qualifications which in its judgment will serve the purpose of legitimate legislative solicitude, is the power of the court to impose other and further exactions and qualifications foreclosed or exhausted? In so far as the prescribing of such qualifications constitutes legislative power, that power can be exercised only by the Legislature. There can be no doubt about that. It is apparent, however, that the judiciary may have another and different interest in the talents, qualifications, and character of those who are to become officers of the courts, as attorneys at law in this country are universally conceded to be. . . .

Our conclusions may be epitomized as follows: For more than six centuries prior to the adoption of our Constitution, the courts of England, concededly subordinate to Parliament since the Revolution of 1688, had exercised the right of determining who should be admitted to the practice of the law, which, as was said in Matter of the Serjeants at Law, 6 Bingham's New Cases 235, "constitutes the most solid of all titles." If the courts and the judicial power be regarded as an entity, the power to determine who should be admitted to practice law is a constituent element of that entity. It may be difficult to isolate that element and say with assurance that it is either a part of the inherent power of the court, or an essential element of the judicial power exercised by the court, but that it is a power belonging to the judicial entity cannot be denied. Our people borrowed from England this judicial entity and made of it not only a sovereign institution, but made of it a separate, independent, and co-ordinate branch of the government. They took this institution along with the power traditionally exercised to determine who should constitute its attorneys at law. There is no express provision in the Constitution which indicates an intent that this traditional power of the judicial department should in any manner be subject to legislative control.

Perhaps the dominant thought of the framers of our Constitution was to make the three great departments of government separate and independent of one another. The idea that the Legislature might embarrass the judicial department by prescribing inadequate qualifications for attorneys at law is inconsistent with the dominant purpose of making the judicial independent of the legislative department, and such a purpose should not be inferred in the absence of express constitutional provision. While the Legislature may legislate with respect to the qualifications of attorneys, its power in that respect does not rest upon any power possessed by it to deal exclusively with the subject of the qualifications of attorneys, but is incidental merely to its general and unquestioned power to protect the public interest. When it does legislate fixing a standard of qualifications required of attorneys at law in order that public interests may be protected, such qualifications constitute only a minimum standard and limit the class from which the court must make its selection. Such legislative qualifications do not constitute the ultimate qualifications beyond which the court cannot go in fixing additional qualifications deemed necessary by the courts for the proper administration of judicial functions. There is no legislative power to compel courts to admit to their bars persons deemed by them unfit to exercise the prerogatives of an attorney at law. The power of the court in this respect is limited only to the class which the Legislature has determined is necessary to conserve the public welfare.

But the statute is invalid for another reason. If it be granted that the Legislature has power to prescribe ultimately and definitely the qualifications upon which courts must admit and license those applying as attorneys at law, that power cannot be exercised in the manner here attempted. That power must be exercised through general laws which will apply to all alike and accord equal opportunity to all. Speaking of the right of the Legislature to exact qualifications of those desiring to pursue chosen callings, Mr. Justice Field in the case of Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U.S. 114, 121, 9 S.Ct. 231, 233, 32 L. Ed. 623, said: "It is undoubtedly the right of every citizen of the United States to follow any lawful calling, business, or profession he may choose, subject only to such restrictions as are imposed upon all persons of like age, sex, and condition. This right may in many respects be considered as a distinguishing feature of our republican institutions. Here all vocations are open to every one on like conditions. All may be pursued as sources of livelihood, some requiring years of study and great learning for their successful prosecution. The interest, or, as it is sometimes termed, the 'estate,' acquired in them—that is, the right to continue their prosecution—is often of great value to the possessors, and cannot be arbitrarily taken from them, any more than their real or personal property can be thus taken." It is fundamental under our system of government that all similarly situated and possessing equal qualifications shall enjoy equal opportunities. Even statutes regulating the practice of medicine, requiring examinations to establish the possession on the part of the applicant of his proper qualifications before he may be licensed to practice, have been challenged, and courts have seriously considered whether the exemption from such examinations of those practicing in the state at the time of the enactment of the law rendered such law unconstitutional because of infringement upon this general principle. State v. Thomas Call, 121 N.C. 643, 28 S.E. 517; see, also, The State ex rel. Winkler v. Benzenberg, 101 Wis. 172, 76 N.W. 345; State v. Whitcom, 122 Wis. 110, 99 N.W. 468.

This law singles out Mr. Cannon and assumes to confer upon him the right to practice law and to constitute him an officer of this court as a mere matter of legislative grace or favor. It is not material that he had once established his right to practice law and that at one time he possessed the requisite learning and other qualifications to entitle him to that right. That fact can in no manner affect the power of the Legislature to select from the great body of the public an individual upon whom it would confer its favors. . . .

The act is void for still another reason. Mr. Cannon was suspended from practice by this court in exact conformity to power conferred upon it by the statutes of this state. That act of suspension was a judicial act. Speaking of the power of the Legislature to revise the acts and judgments of the court, it is said in the Federalist (G. P. Putnam's Sons Ed.) at page 504: "It is not true, in the second place, that the Parliament of Great Britain, or the legislatures of the particular states, can rectify the exceptionable decisions of their respective courts, in any other sense than might be done by a future legislature of the United States. The theory, neither of the British, nor the State constitutions, authorizes the reversal of a judicial sentence by a legislative act. . . . A legislature, without exceeding its province, cannot reverse a determination once made in a particular case; though it may prescribe a new rule for future cases."

In 6 R.C.L. § 163, it is said: "Since the legislature does not possess and may not assume the exercise of judicial powers, it cannot interfere in any way with pending judicial controversies. Therefore the legislature cannot annul or set aside the final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, or take particular cases out of a settled course of judicial proceedings."

In City of Janesville v. Carpenter, 77 Wis. 288, 46 N.W. 128, 131, 8 L.R.A. 808, 20 Am.St.Rep. 123, the court considered a statute which made it "presumptively injurious and dangerous to persons and property to drive piles, build piers, cribs, or other structures, . . . in Rock river, within the limits of the county of Rock, and the doing of any such act shall be enjoined at the suit of any resident tax-payer without proof that any injury or danger has been or will be caused by reason of such act." Of this law, the court said, at page 301 of 77 Wis., 46 N.W. 128, 132: "The legislature usurped the judicial power of the courts by the enactment of this statute. It adjudicates an act unlawful and presumptively injurious and dangerous, which is not and cannot be made to be so without a violation of the constitutional rights of the defendant, and imperatively commands the court to enjoin it without proof that any injury or danger has been or will be caused by it. It reverses very many decisions of this court, on the very questions involved in it, and which have the effect of a judicial determination of the defendant's rights of property. It violates section 2 of article 7 of the state constitution, which provides that the judicial power of the state, both as to matters of law and equity, shall be vested in the various courts. It takes away the jurisdiction of the courts to inquire into the facts and determine the necessity and propriety of granting or refusing an injunction in such a case, according to the established rules of a court of equity. Ervine's Appeal, 16 Pa. 256 [55 Am.Dec. 499]. It is said in that case: "That is not legislation which adjudicates in a particular case, prescribes the rule, contrary to the general law, and orders it to be enforced. Such power assimilates itself more closely to despotic rule than to any other attribute of government."

The effect of the act under consideration was to nullify and set aside a judgment of this court. That this was beyond the power of the Legislature is too plain to justify further citation or elucidation. For these various reasons it must be held that the act which purported to reinstate Mr. Cannon as an attorney at law was utterly unconstitutional and void and entirely impotent to accomplish that purpose.

This brings us to a consideration of Mr. Cannon's application for reinstatement upon its merits irrespective of the legislative act. Mr. Cannon was suspended from practice until June 30, 1931, "and for such period thereafter as shall expire before his license to practice law is restored and he is reinstated as a member of the bar by this court, upon the presentation of proof that the expenses of this proceeding have been paid, and upon the further condition that he shall, before being reinstated, satisfy the court both by his conduct from this time forward and by assurances then given the court that he will not, if reinstated, be guilty of such conduct as that involved in the charges made in the complaint in this action."

Although the only evidence of such regeneration is to be found in his verbal assurances that he will henceforth demean himself in accordance with the ethics of the profession, we have concluded, somewhat doubtfully, we must confess, to give him another chance. We have concluded that he may be reinstated and placed in a position where he will have an opportunity to give substantial evidence of his professions, and thus justify the confidence reposed in him by his attorneys, the Legislature, and the Governor. Our action in this respect is accompanied by the hope that he will improve his opportunity to become an honorable and respected member of the bar.

But before he can be reinstated, he must pay the judgment for costs which was assessed against him in the original case. While the act of the Legislature purported to remit those costs, this attempt was also plainly beyond the jurisdiction of the Legislature as an unwarranted interference with the judgment of this court. . . .

We do not think Mr. Cannon should escape the payment of these costs. His conduct has not been such as to merit immunity from any portion of the judgment originally imposed.

Upon the payment of the judgment for costs rendered against Mr. Cannon in the original proceeding resulting in his suspension from practice, an order will be entered reinstating him as a member of the bar of this court.

SECTION 3. CREATIVE LEGISLATION

MORRISON v. SESSION'S ESTATE

Supreme Court of Michigan, 1888.

70 Mich. 297, 38 N.W. 249, 14 Am.St.Rep. 500.

"Adoption" has been defined to be the act by which relations of paternity and affiliation are recognized as legally existing between persons not so related by nature. A proceeding which so materially affects the succession of property and the rights of natural heirs is a very important one. It is not recognized by the common law of England, and exists in the United States only by special statute. . . . But among many of the continental nations it has been practiced from the remotest antiquity. It appears to have been a necessary concomitant of the type of archaic society when the family constituted the unit of the community, and was an important factor in developing society into the broader community called the state. Mr. Maine, in his work on Ancient Law, says:

"We must look on the family as constantly enlarged by the absorption of strangers within its circle, and we must try to regard the fiction of adoption as so closely simulating the reality of kinship that neither law nor opinion makes the slightest difference between the real and adoptive connection."

It flourished and was regulated by laws in both of the classical nations of antiquity.

In Greece, in the interests of the next of kin whose rights were affected by the case of adoption, it was provided that the registration should be attended with certain formalities, and that it should take place at a fixed time, the festival of Thargelia.

In Rome the system was in vogue long before the time of Justinian, and the ceremonies to accomplish the result were cumbered with much formality, but he reduced the system to a code, which simplified the proceedings, and from which modern legislation upon the subject has derived its principles, and adapted them to our civilization and wants.

It either required an imperial rescript or a proceeding before a magistrate to accomplish the purpose. Where resort was not had to an imperial rescript, if the person to be adopted was alieni juris, the parties appeared before a magistrate, and executed a deed in his presence,— “Declaring the fact of adoption; the parties to the adoption—that is, the person giving, the person given, and the person receiving—being personally present to give their consent. But it was sufficient if the consent of the party adopted were expressed by his not declaring his dissent,—non contradicente.” Sanders, Just.Inst. 103 et seq.

The effect of adoption was to cast the succession on the adopted in case the adopting father died intestate. Some other consequences followed on the changed relation, but sufficient has been noticed to show that the real object of such proceedings is to change the succession of property of persons dying intestate, and to create relations of paternity and affiliation not before recognized as legally existing, and that the change of name is more an incident than the object of such proceedings. Our statute has the same object, and no one can fail to see the similarity of the proceedings required by it and the regulations of Justinian above quoted. . . .

J. GILBERT HARDGROVE, FUTILITY OF RESORT TO ROMAN LAW FOR INTERPETATION OF STATUTES ON ADOPTION

9 Marquette L.Rev. 239. (1925).

In a case recently presented to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, it was held that a child adopted under the statutes of Wisconsin would not take by descent from a brother of the adoptive parent. In re Bradley's Estate, 185 Wis. 393, 201 N.W. 973, 38 A.L.R. 1. An argument was made to the effect that adoption, being unknown to the common law, must be presumed to have been taken from the Roman Law, that under the Roman Law adoption carried with it the right of collateral inheritance and that the same result should follow when we provide for adoption. The court, in its opinion, very properly, it is thought, did not discuss this argument, treating the case as turning upon a correct interpretation of the statute involved. However, as the argument is frequently met with and sometimes followed after what seems very superficial study, the writer believes that a discussion of the subject will be found of more than passing interest. . . .

No common law state which enacts a statute providing for adoption stands in such relation to the Roman Law that the statute can be said to have been adopted from that law, and least of all from the ancient Roman Law. Modern statutes dealing with adoption are framed to take care of a social practice, the origin of which in this country was wholly independent of the practice known to the Roman state. There is no historical relation either in the laws or in the practice itself. . . .

The older Roman Law, tied up as it was with the archaic conception of the family was entirely disregarded by the continental European countries as being inapplicable to their social conditions, and the modern codes of those countries merely re-enact those parts of the later Roman law which had already been accepted as part of their general law.

SECTION 4. AMENDMENTS, SUPPLEMENTS AND REPEALS

A. Amendments

STATE v. JOHNSON

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1898. 74 Minn. 381, 77 N.W. 203.

MITCHELL, J. The defendant was indicted, tried and convicted of keeping his saloon open after 11 o'clock at night contrary to the provisions of G.S.1894, section 2012. The offense is alleged to have been committed in June, 1898, in the city of Crookston.

Upon the trial the defendant offered to prove that, although his saloon was not closed until 20 minutes after 11 o'clock, standard time, it was closed some 6 minutes before 11 o'clock, according to local sun time, which at Crookston is 26 minutes and 40 seconds slower than standard time. The court excluded this evidence, holding that the case was governed by the standard time which had been established by universal usage in this state. The same point arose during the trial in various ways, as, for example, upon instructions to the jury given or refused. This presents the only important question in the case.

This statute was enacted in its original form in 1878 (Laws 1878, c. 75), and re-enacted in its present and amended form in 1889 (Laws 1889, c. 87). In both its original and amended form, the hour for closing places where intoxicating liquors are sold is the same, viz., 11 o'clock at night.

When the original act was passed in 1878, the present standard time had not been adopted or come into use. The standard time then in use was "Northfield time," just as "Chicago time" and "New York time," etc., were in use in other parts of the country, and "Greenwich time" in England. This is what is called mean or standard sun time, as distinguished from local sun time, as shown by a sundial; which, of course, varies with every change of longitude, and which was never in use in this state, and, since the day of railroads, is practically obsolete in every civilized country.

In 1883 the railroads of the United States and Canada adopted four kinds of standard time, viz., Eastern, Central, Mountain and Pacific, each applicable to a region covering approximately 15 degrees of longitude; in each case the standard being actual sun time at the central degree of longitude of the region to which the particular standard time was applicable. The state of Minnesota fell wholly within Central time, which was actual sun time at the ninetieth meridian of west longitude.

All standard mean times are based on sun time, but, for the sake of uniformity, sun time at some particular point is adopted as the standard.

The only substantial difference between the standard time now in use and that in use in 1878 is that, as the former embraces more degrees of longitude than the latter, it necessarily follows that at places the difference between it and local sun time is greater than it was under the standard time formerly in use.

The standard times adopted by the railroads in 1883 were soon adopted by the people,—in some parts of the country sooner than others,—and have long since become the sole standards of time throughout the United States. Cent.Dict. tit. "Time." In Minnesota, Central time was promptly adopted, and long before 1889 was in universal use, and established as the sole standard of time, in both public and private business. No other is ever used or referred to.

Counsel's contention is that this statute having been originally passed in 1878, before the present standard time was in use, it must be construed as referring to the standard time in use when the act was passed. Even if this is so, the statute would not refer to local sun time at Crookston, for that was never in use.

My own opinion is that, even if the statute of 1878 had never been amended and re-enacted, it should be construed with reference to the standard time established by law or usage at the time the offense is committed. On this, however, we are not all agreed. But we are all agreed that as the act, with amendments, was re-enacted after the present standard time was established by universal usage, it should be construed as referring to the standard time then and still in use.

We are not unmindful of the general canons of construction that, when a statute is amended "so as to read as follows," the provisions of the original statute retained in the amendatory act are to be deemed as having been in force all the time, and that words used in an amendatory statute are presumed to be used in the same sense in which they were used in the original. But to this latter rule there are exceptions, or rather cases which do not fall within it, and this, we think, is one of them.

We never had any statute in this state establishing any standard time. That matter has been left wholly to usage or custom. Neither the original nor the amendatory statute in terms adopts any standard of time. Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that the amendatory act should be construed as meaning the standard time in common use when the act was passed, and which is still in use.

When sustaining the objection to the evidence offered by defendant as to the difference between standard time and local sun time, the trial judge remarked:

"I shall certainly deprive this defendant, and all others, of any such buncombe as this for a defense."

There may be a difference of opinion as to the good taste of this remark. It was certainly provoked by defendant's own counsel in misstating the previous ruling of the court. But we fail to see how the remark could have prejudiced the defendant, when made merely with reference to a legal proposition, with which the jury had nothing to do.

There is nothing in the point that it did not appear whether the time referred to by the witness was 11 o'clock p. m. or 11 o'clock a. m. While no witness expressly stated that the time to which he referred was p. m., yet it is perfectly apparent that throughout the trial every one—witnesses, counsel and court—so understood it. The defense which defendant attempted to interpose as to the difference between standard and local sun time conclusively shows this.

Order affirmed.

1. In Posadas v. National City Bank, 296 U.S. 497, 56 S.Ct. 349, 80 L.Ed. 351 (1936), the Court on certiorari affirmed a decision of the Philippine Supreme Court refunding the entire amount of taxes which the bank sought to recover after payment under protest. In order to reach its conclusion, the Court had to decide whether subsequent legislation had the effect of repealing and abrogating section 25 of the Federal Reserve Act of 1913. Holding that the subsequent legislation did not have the effect of so repealing and abrogating, Mr. Justice Sutherland said at p. 506: "It follows that such parts of the original § 25 as were copied into the amended section were not thereby repealed and immediately reenacted, but continued, uninterruptedly, to be the law after the amendment precisely as they were before." It was also stated at p. 503: ". . . The intention of the legislature to repeal must be clear and manifest; otherwise, at least as a general thing, the later act is to be construed as a continuation of, and not a substitute for, the first act and will continue to speak, so far as the two acts are the same, from the time of the first enactment."

2. McAdam v. Federal Mutual Liability Ins. Co., 288 Mass. 537, 193 N.E. 362 (1934), involved a suit in equity whereby the plaintiff sought to recover a judgment obtained against an assured of the defendant. On appeal in affirming the decree below for the plaintiff, Pierce, J., quoting from several cases, said at pp. 363-4: "It is a familiar rule of construction, that when statutes are repealed by acts which substantially retain the provisions of the old laws, the latter are held not to have been destroyed or interrupted in their binding force". . . . "In practical operation and effect . . . they are rather to be considered as a continuation and modification of old laws, than as an abrogation of those old, and the reenactment of new ones.' . . . 'Those parts of the original statute which are inconsistent with the amended statute, and those only, are repealed by implication' [Citations omitted.]"

O'PRY v. UNITED STATES

Supreme Court of the United States, 1919.
249 U.S. 323, 39 S.Ct. 305, 63 L.Ed. 626.

Appeal from the Court of Claims.

Claim by Isabel Kouns O'Pry, as sole descendant and heir of John Kouns, surviving partner of George L. Kouns and John Kouns, and another, against the United States. Judgment against the claimants (51 Ct.Cl. 111), and claimants appeal.

MR. JUSTICE MCKENNA delivered the opinion of the Court.

Section 162 of the Judicial Code, enacted March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. 1139, c. 231 [Comp.St. § 1153]), provides as follows:

"The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the claims of those whose property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, entitled 'An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States,' and acts amendatory thereof, where the property so taken was sold and the net proceeds thereof were placed in the Treasury of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall return said net proceeds to the owners thereof, on the judgment of said court, and full jurisdiction is given to said court to adjudge said claims, any statutes of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding."

To avail herself of that section Isabel Kouns O'Pry alleged herself to be the sole surviving descendant and sole heir of John Kouns and brought this suit in the Court of Claims and for grounds thereof set forth the following facts:

June 6, 1865, George L. Kouns and John Kouns were owners of 900 bales of cotton in two lots, of which 350 bales had been raised in Texas and 550 bales raised in Louisiana, and after the cessation of hostilities were brought to New Orleans, June 6, 1865. The cotton was worth the sum of $123,110.

On that date—June 6, 1865—the act of Congress of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. 375, c. 225), was in force, section 8 of which made it lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to authorize agents to purchase for the United States products of states declared in insurrection at designated places at such prices as might be agreed on with the seller, not exceeding three-fourths of the market value at the latest quotation in the city of New York.

(The other provisions of the statute are not necessary to quote.)

The act of July 2, 1864, was an amendment of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States." 12 Stat. 820, c. 120.

In pursuance of the authority thus conferred the Secretary of the Treasury designated, among other cities, the city of New Orleans as a place of purchase and by a subsequent regulation directed that the agents appointed should receive all the cotton brought to the places designated as places of purchase and forthwith return to the seller three-fourths of the cotton or sell the same and retain out of the price thereof the difference between three-fourths of the market price and the full price thereof in the city of New York.

The agent appointed at New Orleans was Otis N. Cutler, and, on the arrival of the Kouns cotton, Cutler, as such agent, took possession of it and refused to release the same or to allow the owners to have any custody of it until they paid him one-fourth of its market value, being the sum of $30,777.50. They paid the same under protest and it was placed in the Treasury of the United States, where it remains. . . .

It is now asserted that . . . a claim has accrued to appellants by virtue of section 162 of the Judicial Code upon which they are entitled to recover. It will be observed by reference to that section that the Court of Claims is given jurisdiction of claims of those whose property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1863, "and acts amendatory thereof," where the property was sold and its net proceeds were placed in the Treasury of the United States, and they are directed to be returned upon judgment rendered for the claimant. Appellants invoke the relief of these provisions by the contention that the cotton was taken under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1863, because the act of July 2, 1864, was an amendment to it, and that therefore the provision of section 162 of the Judicial Code is completely satisfied; in other words, that the money exacted was taken under the act of March 3, 1863 "and acts amendatory thereof." It is further contended that the conditions of section 162 being thus satisfied it is no answer to say that the seizure of the cotton was legal, it being the intention of Congress to declare that even in such case "the proceeds should be returned to the owners." And this contention counsel offers as an answer to Cutler v. Kouns, supra, and that Congress having by section 162 opened the doors of the Court of Claims "to claimants whose property was seized after June 1, 1865, they can no longer be met with the defense that because the seizure was lawful when made, there can be no recovery on account of it. To sustain such a defense would be 'to keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope.'" The government opposes the contentions.

The act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 820), is entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States." Its first section empowers the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a special agent or special agents to collect and receive all abandoned or captured property in any state or territory in insurrection, with an exception not material. Section 2 provides that the property so received or collected may be put to public use or sold at public auction and the proceeds thereof put into the Treasury of the United States. By section 3 a bond may be required of the agent or agents, who may be required to keep a book or books of accounts showing those from whom the property was received, the cost of transportation and proceeds of sale. It is further provided that the owner of the property may at any time within two years prefer a claim for the proceeds thereof and upon proof of loyalty receive the residue of the proceeds.

It will be observed that the act had a special purpose and was directed to the receipt and collection of property in a particular condition, either abandoned or captured, recognizing however, that there might be a just claim to it, but limiting the assertion of the claim to two years after the suppression of the rebellion.

The act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. 375), describes itself to be "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary states, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in states declared in insurrection." The act, therefore, is declared to be an "addition" to preceding legislation, not an amendment to it. Is an addition the same as an amendment? We are informed by the dictionaries that in addition the added parts remain independent and by amendment there is change and, it may be improvement. The words and the processes they respectively describe may, however, be regarded as roughly or even accurately interchangeable and in investigating the meaning of legislation we must regard that possibility and resolve a doubt in the words by the purpose of the legislation. In other words, whatever the relation of the statutes, their purpose must be looked to to determine the application to them of section 162. So looked to, we agree with the government that the purpose of the act of July 2, 1864, demonstrates the contrary of the contention of appellants, and that the act was strictly in addition to prior acts and not an amendment of the act of March 3, 1863 in the sense asserted. The latter act applied to a different situation. The cotton collected under it and to which its provisions applied might be the property of those innocent of disloyalty, but victims of the disorder and violence of the times, and the government constituted itself a trustee for them and gave them the opportunity, at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, to establish their right to the proceeds, requiring of them nothing but proof of loyalty and ownership. United States v. Anderson, 9 Wall. 56, 65, 19 L.Ed. 615; United States v. Padelford, 9 Wall. 531, 19 L. Ed. 788; United States v. Klein, 13 Wall. 128, 20 L.Ed. 519.

The cotton in the present case, unlike that to which the act of March 3 applied, was the subject of a business enterprise and taken to a market opened by the United States forces upon the conditions expressed in the act of July 2, 1864—that is, that its owners should turn over to the government one-fourth of the cotton, or its money equivalent, which would immediately become the property of the United States. Cutler v. Kouns, supra. The conditions in the two situations, therefore, are in broad contrast and it could not have been the intention of section 162 to confound the conditions. The section did no more than remove the bar of limitation of time to sue that was given by the act of March 3, 1863. It did not intend to transfer property that had become that of the United States.

Judgment affirmed.

1. In United States v. Lapp, 244 F. 377 (C.C.A. Ohio 1917), the court, in affirming the decision below denying a writ of mandamus brought to compel the defendant to reinstate a deputy marshal, considered the effect on the general act of 1912 relating to the classified civil service of the act of 1913 relating to deputy collectors of internal revenue and deputy marshalls as well as the effect of the act of 1912 on the original act of 1883. At page 383 the court said: "A law is amended when it is, in whole or in part, permitted to remain, and something is added to or taken away from it, or it is in some way changed or altered to make it more complete or perfect, or to fit it the better to accomplish the object or purpose for which it was made, or some other object or purpose. [Citation omitted.] The act of 1912 is amendatory of the previous civil service law, adding thereto an additional section to remove a fault and better the then existing law."

2. In Rubert Hermanos, Inc. v. People of Puerto Rico, 106 F.2d 754 (C.C.A. Puerto Rico 1939), holding a Puerto Rican statute invalid as an attempt to amend an act of Congress contrary to the limitation prescribed in the Organic Act of Puerto Rico, the court said at p. 759:

"It is unimportant that the title of an Act does not declare an intention to amend a federal statute. Its character as an amendment must be determined by its effect rather than by its declaration of intention.

"Whether an act is amendatory of a prior act is to be determined by a comparison of their provisions, and its character is not determined by the fact that it does or does not profess to be an amendment. The form which the latter act may take is not material, and although it purports to be complete in itself, if it intermingles different provisions with the old ones or adds new provisions creating a new law from the prior act, then the new one is amendatory." 59 Corpus Juris, p. 851; In re Lovett, D.C., 2 F.2d 307.

"Similar legislation by the Territory of Alaska was declared invalid as an amendment of an act of Congress in Auk Bay Salmon Canning Co. v. United States, 300 F. 907, in which the court said [300 F. 910]:

"We see no escape from the conclusion that to make the changes in those laws which were attempted to be made by the territorial Legislature was to alter, amend, and to some extent repeal the acts of Congress relating to the same subject, and was within the prohibition of the Organic Act. To extend the period of the closed season, to enlarge the area affected by it, and to increase the penalties for violation of the fishing regulations, was to amend and alter the existing law. This conclusion is not obviated by the declaration therein contained that the statute shall not be construed as in any wise to alter, amend, modify, or repeal any of the fish laws, and that its purpose is only to provide for further and additional regulations for additional protection to the salmon and insure a future supply thereof, and it is not ground for holding otherwise that the alterations and amendments did in fact result only in greater protection to the fish and were in the interests of and operated to the welfare of the inhabitants of Alaska.'"

FLETCHER v. PRATHER

Supreme Court of California, 1894. 102 Cal. 413, 36 P. 658.

HAYNES, C. Under proceedings had by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, a contract was let to the defendant Prather for the construction of a sewer constituting an outlet of a system of sewers in that part of the city known as the Richmond district. The proposed sewer, or a considerable portion of it, is not to be constructed in a public street, but in private lands, the right of way for which has been granted by the owners. Fletcher, the appellant here, is the owner of lands within the assessment district, upon which the cost of constructing the sewer would be assessed, and brought this action to enjoin its construction.

The several defendants demurred to the complaint, the demurrers were sustained, and the plaintiff declining to amend his complaint, judgment was entered dismissing the action, and from that judgment he appeals.

The principal contention of appellant is that the statute under which the work was ordered is invalid.

Section 24 of an act approved March 18, 1885 (commonly known as the Vrooman act), authorized the construction of sewers "upon or in any street, lane, alley, court, or place in such city," but did not enumerate among the places in which sewers might be constructed private property over which the right of way for a sewer had been secured.

In 1889 the legislature passed an act entitled, "An act to amend sections two, . . . twenty-four, . . . of an act entitled, 'An act to provide for work upon streets, . . . and for the construction of sewers within municipalities,' approved March 18, 1885." (Stats.1889, p. 157.)

The only change made by the amendment of 1889 in section 24 of the original act was made by inserting, in addition to sewers, culverts, etc., authorized to be constructed, the words, "or cesspools."

In 1893 another act was passed entitled, "An act to amend sections two, twenty-four, and thirty-seven of an act entitled, 'An act to provide for work upon streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places, and sidewalks, and for the construction of sewers within municipalities,' approved March 18, 1885." (Stats.1893, p. 172.)

In said section 24, as amended in 1893, the following clause was inserted: "And also for drainage purposes, over or through any right of way obtained or granted for such purposes, with necessary and proper outlet or outlets to the same."

Appellant's contention is that by the amendment of 1889, section 24 of the act of 1885 was repealed and ceased to exist as such; and the act of 1893, which by its terms amended section 24 of the original act, was an attempt to amend a section which had ceased to exist; that to accomplish the purpose intended the act of 1893 should have amended "section 24 of the act of 1885 as amended by the act of 1889."

It is perfectly clear that that which does not exist cannot be amended. If an entire act, or an entire section, is wiped out of existence by a repeal, there is nothing to amend; it is as though the act, or the section, had never been enacted. But it does not logically or necessarily follow that an amendment of a section of an entire act upon a particular subject has that effect. Whether by force of any provision of the constitution, or by settled rules of statutory construction, it has such effect is the question to be considered.

The constitution provides as follows: "No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but in such case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length as revised or amended." (Art. IV, sec. 24.)

In the absence of a constitutional provision of this character, a section of an act might be, and often was, amended in one or more of four ways: 1. By striking out certain words; 2. By striking out certain words and inserting others; 3. By inserting certain words; and 4. By adding other provisions. This mode of amendment did not repeal or disturb the existence of the parts of the original section not stricken out; but the objection to this mode of amendment was that it tended to confusion and uncertainty, owing to the difficulty of correctly reading the original section with the amendments—a difficulty which largely increased with each subsequent amendment. This uncertainty not only affected those who were called upon to interpret statutes thus amended, but it begat uncertain and confused legislation, since every legislator, before he could intelligently vote upon proposed amendments, must first know with certainty how the section with all previous amendments read, and what it meant. So far as the original provisions of the section remained unchanged, they were in force from the date of the original enactment, and, so far as they were changed, the new or changed provisions took effect from the date of the amendment; so far as this is concerned, no reason for any change in the operation of an amended statute is suggested in the provision of the constitution above quoted, nor is any reason for a change apparent. We therefore conclude that its whole purpose and effect is to avoid the evils resulting from the mode of amendment which might and did prevail in the absence of such provision, and that it was not intended that the section as amended should not take its place by its appropriate number in the original act.

The provision in our first constitution in relation to amendment of statutes was the same as that contained in our present constitution; and in Billings v. Harvey, 6 Cal. 383, in commenting on this provision it was said: "The re-enactment creates anew the rule of action, and even if there was not the slightest difference in the phraseology of the two, the latter alone can be referred to as the law, and the former stands to all intents as if absolutely and expressly repealed."

Section 325 of the Political Code, afterwards enacted, as it is said, to meet the foregoing decision, is as follows: "Where a section or part of a statute is amended, it is not to be considered as having been repealed, and re-enacted in the amended form; but the portions which are not altered are to be considered as having been the law from the time when they were enacted, and the new provisions are to be considered as having been enacted at the time of the amendment."

In Dillon v. Saloude, 68 Cal. 267, 270, 9 P. 162, in speaking of section 3495 of the Political Code, which was amended in 1880 to conform to a provision of the constitution of 1879, after quoting the amendment, it was said: "The words quoted were added to the section, and 'are to be considered as having been enacted at the time of the amendment,' while 'the portions which are not altered are considered as having been the law from the time when they were enacted' " (citing the foregoing section of the Political Code); and, as if to emphasize the meaning of said section 325, section 330 of the same code provides: "An act amending a section of an act repealed is void."

Section 24 of the act in question, as amended in 1889, took the place of the original section 24 in the act of 1885, and though the reference to it in the act of 1893 would have been more specific if it had added "as amended by the act of 1889," the intention of the legislature is evident, and the effect is to amend the amended section.

This precise question arose in Commonwealth v. Kenneson, 143 Mass. 418, 9 N.E. 761, where an act passed in 1886 purported to amend certain sections of the public statutes which had been amended in 1885, without any reference to the amendatory act of 1885. The argument there, as here, was that an amendment of a repealed statute is a nullity. It was held that the intention of the legislature was plain, and the amendment of 1886 was sustained.

State v. Brewster, 39 Ohio St. 653, involved the same question. The syllabus upon this point correctly states the decision, as follows: "Where a section of the revised statutes is repealed, and re-enacted in a changed form, a subsequent statute which, in terms, again repeals and re-enacts the original section in still another form, is, as a general rule, to be regarded as a repeal of the section in its amended form, and the section in its last form will take its place in the revision as part of the revised statutes."

In Oshe v. State, 37 Ohio St. 494, 501, section 6941 was amended March 9, 1880. After the amendment Oshe was indicted for selling liquor "in violation of law, to wit, in violation of section 6941 of the revised statutes of Ohio," no reference being made to the amendment. The court said: "At the time of the passage of the amended section it took the place of the original section of the revision, and was thereafter the only section 6941 of the revised statutes in force. The reference in the indictment, therefore, to that section of the revised statutes must be understood as referring to the section then in force." See, also, Brigel v. Starbuck, 34 Ohio St. 280, and cases there cited.

In State v. Warford, 84 Ala. 15, 3 So. 911, it was held that "a statute enacted in 1856, having been amended in 1868, and thereby repealed under the constitutional provisions then in force, a subsequent statute of 1885, amending the statute of 1856 by date and title, but not mentioning the former amendatory law, supersedes and repeals such amendatory law." Blake v. Brackett, 47 Me. 28, is also directly in point. In Kamerick v. Castleman, 21 Mo.App. 587, 590, Phillips, P. J., said: "I understand the rule of construction in this respect to be, that where a section of a statute is amended, and the amendment is in such terms that it takes the place of such section, the statute in which the original section stood, as to future acts, is to be regarded as if the amended section was incorporated therein. So much so is this the rule that if, by an act subsequent to the amendatory act, the section of the original statute be repealed, the amendment which stood in its stead is also repealed"; citing Greer v. State, 22 Tex. 588; McKibben v. Lester, 9 Ohio St. 627; Holbrook v. Nichol, 36 Ill. 161, 162; and State v. Ranson, 73 Mo. 78, 88.

That the intention of the legislature was to amend the section as amended by the act of 1889 is apparent, from the fact that the amendment of 1893 follows the language of the amendment of 1889 as to a provision not contained in the act of 1885, and changes it only by inserting a provision covering the construction of sewers over a right of way acquired over private property.

I have cited a larger number of cases, and quoted more freely from them than may be thought necessary, because the authorities are not uniform. Sutherland in his work on Statutory Construction, section 132, takes the opposite view and says: "An amendment of a section after it has been thus displaced (by amendment) is void."

The cases he cites in support of this statement are, with one or two exceptions, from the Indiana reports, and these cases are cited by appellant.

The leading case in that state is Blakemore v. Dolan, 50 Ind. 194. The facts in that case were that in 1865 an act was passed requiring the common council or board of trustees of each incorporated town, at their first regular meeting in April of that year, and biennially thereafter, to elect three school trustees. In 1873 that act was amended, requiring the election at the first regular meeting in April of that year, of three school trustees, who should hold their offices for one, two, and three years respectively, and thereafter one should be elected each year. In 1875 the act of 1873 was amended, requiring the common council or board of trustees at their first regular meeting in June of that year to elect three school trustees, who should hold their office for one, two, and three years respectively, and thereafter one should be elected each year. These amendments were regularly made so far as the reference to the acts amended were concerned; in that respect being wholly different from the case at bar. It was there held that by the amendment "the original section is as effectually repealed and obliterated from the statute as if it had been repealed by express words; and it is upon this principle that it has been held that a section which has been once amended cannot be again the subject of amendment, but the section as amended must be amended."

Goodno v. City of Oshkosh, 31 Wis. 127, cited by appellant, was correctly decided, but it involved another question. There a section of the revised statutes was "amended so as to read as follows," the amendment consisting of an addition constituting an exception to the general provisions of the section. It was held that the provisions of the original section became incorporated in the section as amended; that the repeal of the amended section went to the whole of it, and that under the rule of construction adopted by statute in that state a prior statute was not revived by the repeal of an act repealing such former statute.

Upon this branch of the case, we conclude that the act of 1893, in question here, is a valid and constitutional enactment. . . .

Within the limits fixed by the statute, the superintendent of streets has the power expressly given him to fix the time for the commencement and completion of the work. It is not a matter left to be fixed by the agreement of the contractor and superintendent. The contractor makes his bid in view of the power given to the superintendent and its limitations, and it is only necessary that it should be definitely fixed with the knowledge of the contractor, and the time thus fixed then enters into, and becomes a part of, the contract. The time may be fixed either in the body of the contract, or, as here, indorsed upon it with the knowledge of the contractor, and authenticated by the official signature of the superintendent. There is nothing in Libbey v. Elsworth, 97 Cal. 316, or in Washburn v. Lyons, 97 Cal. 314, inconsistent with this view. The statute and the indorsement makes it part of the contract without the signature of the contractor to the indorsement.

In view of the conclusions reached it is not necessary to consider whether the city and county of San Francisco was improperly joined as a party defendant.

The judgment should be affirmed.

TEMPLE, C., and BELCHER, C., concurred.

NOTES

1. The question of implied repeal in Fletcher v. Prather is discussed infra, p. 385 et seq.

2. Despite the rule that a repealed act cannot be amended, the majority of courts attempt to give effect to the legislative intent as expressed in an amendment to a repealed statute. Thus in People ex rel. Strough v. Board of Canvassers, 143 N.Y. 81, 37 N.E. 649 (1894), it was said at p. 650: "It is the duty of the court, when passing upon an act of the legislature, to uphold and give effect to it, where it is possible, and when the legislative intent is plain, and there is no room for doubt here as to what the legislature intended. . . . The enactment of this law is put into the form of an amendment of a law which was standing upon the statute books; and whether that earlier law, by force of subsequent legislation, had become inoperative, is wholly immaterial. The only question is, has the legislature, in the enactment complained of, expressed its purpose intelligibly, and provided fully upon the subject? If it has, then its act is valid, and must be upheld. That is the case here."

3. Some courts, in sustaining legislation which is in effect an amendment of a repealed act, do so on the grounds that the "amendment" is an independent enactment. See in this connection Abrams v. Smith, 98 N.J.L. 319, 119 A. 792 (1923); Anderson v. Board of Com'rs of Douglas Co., 67 Colo. 403, 186 P. 284 (1920) ("The general trend of authorities is to the effect that the purpose of the Legislature should be upheld, where it can be done without doing violence to established rules of construction, and that a statute which deals fully with a subject of legislation should, if reasonably possible, be sustained as an independent statute." [p. 285]); Attorney General v. Stryker, 141 Mich. 437, 101 N.W. 737 (1905). Compare, however, Wall v. Garrison, 11 Colo. 515, 19 P. 409 (1888) where the court refused to sustain an act as independent because the subject was not expressed in the title and therefore the constitutional requirements were said not to be satisfied.

5. The rule applied by the Supreme Court of Minnesota in State ex rel. Markham v. Elmquist, 201 Minn. 403, 276 N.W. 735 (1937), that where a statute amends a former statute by re-enacting its terms with supplementary provisions the amended statute is merged in the amending statute, and the subsequent decision by a trial court applying the Indiana "replacement theory", are overruled by the Interpretation Act: M.S.A.1945, § 645.31.

ALLISON v. CORKER

Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1902.

(In 1893 the New Jersey Legislature passed a statute providing that townships might be divided into road districts with a road commissioner elected in each district by the freeholders of the respective districts. The Supreme Court held this statute unconstitutional in 1894 because the election of the road commissioners was limited to freeholders. By amendment of certain sections the legislature in 1896 changed this and vested the power to elect commissioners in the legal voters of the districts. It was contended that this did not render the legislation constitutional. A second statute passed in 1894 suffered the same sequence of events. Both are here considered.)

COLLINS, J. . . . The real reason of unconstitutionality of the act of 1894 was that the townships of the specified counties had no characteristics to differentiate them from townships of other counties.

The act, therefore, was in violation of article 4, § 7, par. 11, of the constitution, prohibiting private, local, or special laws regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties.

It is contended for the plaintiff in error that, notwithstanding the amendments of 1896, the legislation recited is still unconstitutional. A preliminary question raised is of the validity of the two acts of 1896, independently considered. It is argued that, as the original statutes were void, they could not be amended. For the purposes of this case it may be conceded that the unconstitutional provisions referred to were inseparable from the legislative intent, so that in each case the entire statute was unconstitutional. The question raised, therefore, is fairly presented. The argument is that an unconstitutional statute is a nullity. Granting this, it does not follow that it may not be imported into valid legislation by appropriate reference. It is entirely within the legislative power to give effect to documents without their full recital. Statutes validating agreements of lease, merger, or consolidation of railroad corporations are usually cast in that form (e. g., P.L.1871, pp. 946-1093; P.L.1872, p. 567). The matter is one purely of identification. Surely nothing can be more definite than a reference to a document that has been regularly promulgated as a public statute. In Mortland v. Christian, 52 N.J.Law, 521, 20 A. 673, it was held by this court that a statute providing for election of chosen freeholders of a county from assembly districts created under previous legislation was valid, whether such districts could be constitutionally created or not. But I am prepared to go farther, and hold that an unconstitutional statute is nevertheless a statute; that is, a legislative act. Such a statute is commonly spoken of as void. I should prefer to call it unenforceable, because in conflict with a paramount law. If properly to be called void, it is only so with reference to claims based upon it. Neither of the three great departments to which the constitution has committed government by the people can encroach upon the domain of another. The function of the judicial department with respect to legislation deemed unconstitutional is not exercised in rem, but always in personam. The supreme court cannot set aside a statute as it can a municipal ordinance. It simply ignores statutes deemed unconstitutional. For many purposes an unconstitutional statute may influence judicial judgment, where, for example, under color of it private or public action has been taken. An unconstitutional statute is not merely blank paper. The solemn act of the legislature is a fact to be reckoned with. Nowhere has power been vested to expunge it or remove it from its proper place among statutes. . . .

Reversed.

NOTES

1. The courts are about equally divided on whether a completely unconstitutional statute is capable of amendment. For the reasoning supporting a conclusion that it is not, since it is a nullity, see especially City of Plattsmouth v. Murphy, 74 Neb. 749, 105 N.W. 293 (1905). All agree that where an act is only partly unconstitutional it may be amended by deleting or changing the invalid provisions. See Note, 60 L.R.A. 504.

B. Supplements

MCCLEARY v. BABCOCK

Supreme Court of Indiana, 1907. 169 Ind. 228, 82 N.E. 453.

HADLEY, C. J. The principal question in this appeal involves the construction of the statutes of the state concerning the voting of aid to interurban railroads incorporated under the street railway act. In July, 1904, a petition signed by more than 25 resident taxpayers and voters of Wayne township, Kosciusko county, was filed with the board of county commissioners, praying said board to order an election for the purpose of voting upon the question of donating to the appellee, the Winona Interurban Railway Company, a corporation organized under the statutes for the incorporation of street railway companies, $25,000, as aid to the appellee in the construction of its railroad through the township. The prayer was granted, and the election held, which resulted favorably to the donation. The board of commissioners ordered the levy to be made, and the same was placed upon the tax duplicates of Wayne township for collection, and said duplicates placed in the hands of appellee Babcock, as treasurer of the county, for collection against appellants, who were taxpayers of said township. Whereupon this action was commenced by appellant for himself and 85 others to enjoin the collection of the tax. The complaint is in one paragraph. To the complaint each of the defendants filed a demurrer in these words: "The defendants and each of them separately demur to the plaintiff's complaint herein for each of the following reasons. . . ." The court sustained the demurrer of each of the defendants, and the plaintiff declining to plead further, judgment was rendered against him.

The complaint is based upon the theory that there is no valid law of this state authorizing the levying of a tax in aid of interurban railroads, and that the tax complained of is therefore illegal and void. . . . Then, is the act of 1903 constitutional? It is claimed that the act is in derogation of the Constitution of Indiana in two particulars: First, because it has no enacting clause, as required by section 1, art. 4; and, second, if intended as an amendment to the act of 1869, it is void for failure to set forth in full the section as amended in accordance with section 21, art. 4. It is sufficient to say, once for all, that the said act of 1903 has an enacting clause in the precise language of the Constitution, and hence the act is not obnoxious to section 1, art. 4. The first legislation authorizing the voting of aid to railroads was approved May 12, 1869, and entitled "An act to authorize aid to the construction of railroads by counties and townships taking stock in, and making donations to railroad companies." Laws 1869, p.

92, c. 44. The act of 1903, in controversy, has a title covering more than two printed pages, and begins thus: "An act supplemental to an act entitled 'An act to authorize aid to the construction of railroads by counties and townships taking stock in, and making donations to railroad companies, approved May 12, 1869; also supplemental to an act entitled,' " etc.; and in like manner proceeding to recite that said proposed act was supplemental to all the acts, either original, supplemental, or amendatory, affecting the original act of 1869, setting each act forth specifically by title and date of approval, all of which occupy so much space that we do not feel justified in quoting. The enacting section, in substance, is as follows: "Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of Indiana that wherever the word 'railroad' occurs in either section of the act of May 12, 1869, or in any section of any subsequent act, amendatory, or supplemental to said act of 1869, here setting forth such acts by title and date of approval, the same shall be extended to and held to include every kind of street railroad, suburban street railroad, or interurban street railroad . . . by whatever power its vehicles are to be or are transported." It will be observed that the new act makes no change in any existing statute relating to the subject of giving aid to railroads. Its passage did not affect the force and vigor of any previous legislative provision relating to the subject. If the act of 1869, and all subsequent, supplemental, and amendatory legislation, applied solely to what are commonly called "steam roads," as contended by appellant, that could make no difference to them, for every such company may yet proceed in every particular the same as if the act of 1903 had not been passed. It is plain that the act of 1903 is not, in effect, an amendatory act. To amend a statute is to alter it, to annul or remove that which is faulty and substitute that which will improve it. An amendment means to "change or modify in any way for the better." Webster's Int. Dict.; Diamond v. Williamsburg Ins. Co., 4 Daly (N.Y.) 494, 500. The word "amend" is synonymous with "correct, reform, rectify." It means a correction of errors, an improvement, a reformation. It necessarily implies something upon which the correction, alteration, and improvement can operate. Something to be reformed, corrected, or improved. In re Pa. Tel. Co., 2 Chest. Co. Rep. (Pa.) 129, 131. A supplemental act has quite a different meaning. "It signifies something additional, something added to supply what is wanting." Webster's Int. Dict. It is that which supplies a deficiency, adds to, or completes, or extends that which is already in existence, without changing or modifying the original. State v. Wyandot Co., 16 Ohio Cir.Ct.R. 218, 221, 9 O.C.D. 90; Rahway Savings Inst. v. City of Rahway, 53 N.J. Law, 48, 20 A. 756. Since the adoption of the Constitution of 1852, it has been the custom of the General Assembly to pass remedial laws of the character of the one under consideration. . . . There is no express provision of the Constitution for supplemental legislation, so called, but it has been so long indulged by the General Assembly, and so long acquiesced in, and unquestioned by the people, that the important rights that have accrued and become settled by such legislation during the past half century should not now be disturbed, nor the legislative power to pass such laws be considered an open question. It should be further said, however, that courts in considering questions relating to the constitutional power of the General Assembly in matters of legislation give great weight to the Assembly's own interpretation of such power, as the same is manifested by its continued and repeated exercise for a long period. State v. Gerhardt, 145 Ind. 439, 457, 44 N.E. 469, 33 L.R.A. 313, and authorities collated; City of Terre Haute v. Railroad Co., 149 Ind. 174, 183-186, 46 N.E. 77, 37 L.R.A. 189. It is well established, however, that supplemental matter must be germane to the subject, as expressed in the title of the original act; that is, the new supplemental matter must be of a character which, if contained in the original act, would be clearly embraced within its title. Invoking the rule, appellant contends that the act of March 9, 1903, is not germane to the subject-matter and title of the act of 1869, and subsequent, amendatory, and supplemental acts, as enumerated in the title of the act of 1903, his insistence being that the two statutes relate to corporations organized for different and distinct purposes. We must examine the question under the guidance of the well-established rule of construction, that to sustain legislative action courts will liberally construe the title to the act, and accord to the words employed their fullest and broadest meaning to uphold the law; and, if the language is susceptible of two constructions, one inimical, and the other in support of the act, the latter will be adopted. This rule is clearly stated in Hargis v. Board, 165 Ind. 194, 195, 73 N.E. 915; Board v. Albright (this term) 81 N.E. 578. Technically a railroad is a way or road upon which iron rails are laid for wheels to run on, for the conveyance of heavy loads and vehicles. Dinsmore v. Racine M. R., Co., 12 Wis. 649. The term "railroad" as employed in our general legislation relates to institutions of a quasi public character, to highways or roads constructed by the authority of the state, with fixed metallic rails upon which public carriers may propel their carriages, or cars, speedily in the transportation of passengers and freights. Any way or road having these characteristics is a railroad. It is the mode of construction and chartered use, and not the motive power, that determines the character of a railroad. It is declared in the original act providing for the incorporation of railroads that they shall have power to convey on their railroads, persons, and property, by steam, animal, or any mechanical power, or any combination of them. 1 Rev.St. 1852, p. 409, c. 83; section 5153, cl. 8, Burns' Ann.St.1901. The term "railroad" is generic, and embraces all species of road constructed and chartered with the above-mentioned attributes. Rapalje & Lawrence Law Dict. p. 1061; 1 Wood's Railway Law, p. 1; Fulton v. Short Route, etc., Co., 85 Ky. 640, 4 S.W. 332, 7 Am.St.Rep. 619; Bloxham v. Consumer's etc., R. R. Co., 36 Fla. 519, 18 South. 444, 29 L.R.A. 507, 51 Am.St.Rep. 44. One may be operated with heavy and infrequent trains, another with single and frequent cars. The real difference is only a matter of degree. At the time of the passage of the act of 1869 there was in use at least two kinds of species of railroad, viz., the great lines of state and interstate roads, operated by steam power, and the city street or horse railroad, similarly constructed and operated, both common carriers, and both dispensing in large measures like conveniences and benefits to the general public. That the Legislature has regarded all kinds of railroads as belonging to the same genus is manifest from the recent numerous statutes wherein under the term "railroad" expressed in the title legislation has been accomplished affecting steam, electric, interurban, suburban, and street railroads.

. . . The principle involved in the case at bar is well illustrated in the case of Barton v. McWhinney, 85 Ind. 481. An act was passed in 1875, section 2 of which reads as follows: "Hereafter the general laws of the state and amendments thereto, approved Dec. 2, 1872, for the uniform assessment of taxes, shall apply to all cities and towns not having special charters, so far as the same shall be applicable." In the case referred to the statute was assailed as in violation of section 21, art. 4, of the Constitution, for failure to set out the amended section. The court in upholding the statute said (page 488): "We do not consider the act of 1895 obnoxious to the Constitution. If section 2 had been embodied in the act of 1872, its validity could not have been assailed; and it is no less valid where it is found. It is not a revision of any act, nor an amendment of any act or section of an act. If, by implication, it repeals or modifies the provisions of any other law, it is not therefore unconstitutional." We have seen that new matter, which, if it had been embodied in the original act, it would have been embraced within the subject expressed in the title, may be subsequently incorporated into such original act by a supplemental or amendatory act; and this may be done without title, beyond a statement clearly identifying the original act to which the new proposition is to become supplemental, since the validity of the new matter must be determined by the title of the original act. Brandon v. State, 16 Ind. 197; Shoemaker v. Smith, 37 Ind. 122; Bell v. Maish, 137 Ind. 226, 36 N.E. 358, 1118. The act in controversy is constitutional under another canon of construction, namely, that when a statute provides a rule of construction for prior statutes, and which is not in terms amendatory, it does not fall within the requirements of section 21, art. 4, Const., if covered by the title of the original act. As was said by this court in Dequindre v. Williams, 31 Ind. 444, 450: "It is not ordinarily the function of the Legislature to interpret statutes, nor is such interpretation binding upon the courts as to past transactions. But as to matters occurring hereafter such legislation guides all departments of the government. Sedgw. on Constitution. If a legislative construction be plainly contradictory to the terms of the act construed, it must nevertheless be taken as a new enactment, changing the old law." To the same effect, see State ex rel. Michenor v. Harrison, 116 Ind. 300, 307, 19 N.E. 146; Chicago, etc., R. R. Co. v. State, 153 Ind. 134, 51 N.E. 924. In the Michenor Case, it is further stated, at page 307 of 116 Ind., page 149 of 19 N.E.: "And it has been held that a statute declaratory of a former one has the same effect upon the construction of such former act, in the absence of intervening rights, as if the declaratory act had been embodied in the original act at the time of its passage"—citing Endlich, Inter.St. § 365; Smith v. State, 28 Ind. 321;

Jones v. Surprise, 4 New Eng.Rep. 292, 294. Acts 1853, p. 107, c. 87, Acts 1865, p. 120, c. 26, Acts 1889, p. 38, c. 28, Acts 1901, p. 121, c. 81, are all statutes of this class, the validity of which has never been called in question. The act of 1889, under the title of "An act declaratory of the meaning of the word 'mining,' as used in chapter 35 of the Revised Statutes of Indiana, now in force," declares "that it was the intent and meaning of the word 'mining,' as used in said chapter, to include the drilling, boring, and operating wells for petroleum and natural gas." In Acts 1901, p. 121, c. 81, under the title of "An act supplemental to an act entitled 'An act concerning taxation,' etc., it is enacted "that the word 'railroad' wherever it occurs in the act concerning taxation, approved March 6, 1891, shall be considered as including every kind of street railroad, suburban railroad, or interurban railroad."

Appellee insists that if the act of March 9, 1903, had not been passed, interurban and suburban railroad companies would have had the right to accept aid from counties and townships under the act of May 12, 1869, even though such railroads were in 1869 wholly unknown. Under the view we have taken of the act of March 9, 1903, the question here propounded becomes immaterial, and we do not decide it, though we concede that there is at least ground for the contention arising under the rule that general statutes give way, or open up, to special statutes upon the same subject. The principle is well illustrated by Maxwell on Inter. of St. (2d Ed.) p. 93, as quoted in Daniels v. State, 150 Ind. 354, 50 N.E. 74: "The language of a statute is generally extended to new things which were not known and could not have been contemplated by the Legislature when it was passed. This occurs when the act deals with a genus, and the thing which afterwards comes into existence is a species of it."

Our conclusion is that the act of March 9, 1903, is constitutional and valid, and that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTES

1. In Lockhart et al. v. City of Troy, 48 Ala. 579 (1872), the action was for an injunction to restrain the City of Troy from collecting a tax levied on the property of certain of its citizens. In affirming the decree of the court below dissolving the injunction, the court examined the question whether the acts out of which the proceedings complained of arose were unconstitutional. The court held that the acts were not unconstitutional, Peters, J., stating at p. 584: "Supplemental acts and healing acts do not necessarily fall into the category of a revised or amended act. A supplemental act merely adds something that was left out of the original act. It does not necessarily revise it or amend it in the more technical sense. An amendment is what may be incorporated into the original on its passage. A supplemental act is an independent law; and a healing act is one that cures some defect in a proceeding which the legislature could have authorized in the first instance."

2. In People ex rel. Gramlich v. City of Peoria, 374 Ill. 313, 29 N.E.2d 539 (1940), in upholding an act on the ground that it was not amendatory but supplementary, despite a reference within itself to "this amendatory Act", the court said:

" . . . Part of section 13 of article 4 of the Constitution, Smith-Hurd Stats., provides: 'No law shall be revived or amended by reference to its title only, but the law revived, or the section amended, shall be inserted at length in the new act.'

" . . . Whether the amendatory act amends prior acts is to be determined not alone by the title, or whether the act purports to be an amendment of existing laws, but by its effect upon prior laws and an examination and comparison of its provisions with the prior law left in force. . . . This same principle is applicable whether the amendatory act purports to be an independent act or to be an act to amend another act by the adding of a new section. If the amendatory act is complete in itself, constituting an entire act of legislation on the subject with which it purports to deal, it is to be deemed good and is not subject to the constitutional provision notwithstanding it may repeal by implication or modify the provisions of the prior law. If the amendatory act merely amends the old law by intermingling new and different provisions or by adding new provisions so as to create out of the old act and the new, when taken together, a complete act and leaves it in such condition that the old act must be read with the new to determine its provisions and meaning, then the act is amendatory of the old law, and the constitutional provision requires that the law so amended be inserted at length in the new act. . . .

"The purpose of the provision quoted from section 13 of article 4 of the Constitution was to avoid the necessity of having to make reference to a prior law to determine and give meaning to an amendatory act."

C. Repeals

TIERNEY v. DODGE

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1864. 9 Minn. 166, Gil. 153.

MCMILLAN, J. This is an appeal from an order of the district court, denying a peremptory mandamus to the city justice of St. Paul, requiring him to allow an appeal to the district court from a judgment, on conviction for an assault. The penalty imposed by the justice was less than twenty-five dollars.

The Compiled Statutes, defining the criminal jurisdiction of justices of the peace, and regulating its exercises, provides that, "The person charged with and convicted by any such justice of the peace, of any such offense, may appeal from the judgment of such justice of the peace to the district court. Provided, such person shall, within twenty-four hours, enter into a recognizance," etc. Comp. Stat. 526, Sec. 199. The chapter providing for appeals, etc., in criminal cases, contains this further provision: "Every person convicted before a justice of the peace, of any offense, may appeal from the sentence to the district court then next to be held for the same county." Comp. Stat. 777, Sec. 1. These were the provisions of law on this subject in force at the time of the passage of the act incorporating St. Paul, and the several amendments thereto. The act reducing the law incorporating the City of St. Paul and the several acts amendatory thereof, into one act and amending the same, was approved March 20, 1858. Sec. 11, ch. 3, of this act defines the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace for the city, conferring both civil and criminal jurisdiction, and, among other offenses, of assaults; and provides, substantially, that the same proceedings shall be had, where not otherwise directed in said act, as in like cases before justices of the peace under the laws of the state, with a distinct proviso, as amended in 1860, that, among others, in cases of assault, "no appeal shall be allowed where the judgment or fine imposed, exclusive of costs, is less than twenty-five dollars," and, by the 25th sec. ch. 10 of the act, all acts inconsistent therewith are repealed.

There can be no doubt as to the intention of the legislature in this act; not only is the provision in regard to appeals directly inconsistent with the general law upon the same subject, but the repealing clause expressly includes all acts inconsistent with it. It is evident, therefore, that the general law on the subject of appeals so far as it is inconsistent with the provision in the charter, if this legislation is sustained, is not applicable to cases before the city justice, or, if applicable, is repealed. . . .

[The order of the district court, refusing peremptory mandamus, affirmed.]

1. In Commonwealth v. Sanderson, 170 Va. 33, 195 S.E. 516 (1938), the question was whether license fees should be charged against a city's chauffeurs. House Bill 339, approved March 26, 1932, relating to licenses generally, provided that no charge be made for chauffeur's licenses issued to the employees of any of the political subdivisions of the State when necessary in connection with operating a motor vehicle owned by the State, its political subdivisions or agencies. House Bill 103, approved March 29, 1932, dealing specifically with chauffeur's licenses, made only four exceptions to the requirement of payment, none of them relating to city chauffeurs. House Bill 103 also contained a so-called "blanket repealer", i.e., a provision repealing all acts or parts thereof inconsistent with that bill. The court held that fees were due from city chauffeurs, pointing out that the Legislature "must have meant something" by the statement repealing all inconsistent acts or parts thereof. Holt, J., speaking for the court, said at p. 517: "The repeal by implication is not favored but, if inevitable, is as effective as is an express statutory mandate", going on to point out that there was a "head-on collision" between the two statutes and in such case "that the last approved by the Governor must prevail. [p. 520]" With regard to the effect of one statute being general, one special, it is said at p. 520: "If a general statute does not repeal an earlier one of special import, then for a stronger reason it would not overrule one thereafter enacted. To apply this principle to the instant case the act of March 29th, which deals only with chauffeurs, cannot be supplanted by an earlier motor vehicle code."

2. State v. Mangiaracina et al., 344 Mo. 99, 125 S.W.2d 58 (1939), involved Sections 4064 and 4065 and Section 7786 of the Revised Statutes of 1929 of Missouri. Section 7786 was a later enactment than the other two sections. The court here adopted a previous ruling in Missouri to the effect that a general statute on a subject and a specific statute on the same subject should be, if possible, harmonized, but where the statutes are inherently repugnant, the special statute prevails and if the special statute is a later enactment, it will be considered as an exception or qualification of the general statute. The opinion continues, at p. 60: "Our General Assembly in the enactment of Sec. 7786 expressly provided that 'all laws or parts of laws contrary to, inconsistent or in conflict with any of the provisions of this act are hereby repealed . . .'. . . . Thus a clear legislative intent to take the larceny or attempted larceny of the automobile here involved out from under the general provisions of Secs. 4064 and 4065 and to treat such larceny as an offense separate and apart from the offense denounced and punishable under the comprehensive terms of Secs. 4064 and 4065 is manifested."

STATE ex rel. LUM v. ARCHIBALD

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1890. 43 Minn. 328, 45 N.W. 606.

COLLINS, J. This is an appeal from an order directing that a peremptory writ of mandamus issue, addressed to the defendant, an assessor, requiring and compelling him, as such, to proceed with the assessment of real and personal property in certain territory alleged to be a part of Crow Wing county. The controversy arises by reason of the passage of an act entitled "An act relating to the change of county lines of unorganized counties, and annexation of unorganized territory to organized counties," which was approved on February 25, 1887, now known as chapter 119, Gen.Laws of that year; and the passage of another act, approved on February 18th of the same year, entitled "An act to detach certain territory from the unorganized county of Cass and attach the same to Crow Wing county." It is now found as chapter 118, Laws 1887. The appellant contends that the act last mentioned (chapter 118) was repealed upon the passage and approval of the other act, (chapter 119,) and this we regard as the only question needing special consideration. By the several sections of chapter 118, a certain portion of the unorganized county of Cass was detached therefrom, and, subject to the approval of the legal voters of the organized county of Crow Wing, attached to the latter. The proposition was to be submitted to the electors of the organized county at the next general election, and, if approved by a majority of those voting thereon, the governor of the state was required to make proclamation of the fact. There was also another provision of the act in reference to taxes previously levied on property affected by the change, remaining uncollected at the time of its approval by the legal voters.

There are three sections in the law approved February 25th: The first, that no change shall be made in the lines of an unorganized county, and no part thereof shall be annexed to an organized county, "without first submitting the proposition for such change of line or annexation to the electors of the county or counties to be affected thereby," and an adoption of the proposition by a majority of the electors of each county voting thereon; the second, "that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed;" and the third, (as was also provided in chapter 118,) that the same should take effect from and after its passage. In accordance with the provisions of chapter 118, the question of annexing the territory therein described to Crow Wing county was duly submitted to the legal voters thereof at a general election held in November, 1888, at which time a majority voted in favor of annexation. The electors of Cass county did not vote upon the proposition. The result in Crow Wing was proclaimed by the governor prior to April 2, 1889, and on that day defendant was duly appointed assessor for a portion of Crow Wing county, including, if chapter 118 was unrepealed, the territory in dispute. Thereafter defendant refused to proceed with the assessment of personal property within this territory, solely on the ground heretofore indicated, that the earlier act (chapter 118) was repealed by implication on the passage of the later, (chapter 119.)

1. Starting out with the proposition, which has become axiomatic, that repeals by implication are not favored, we may safely say, as a reasonable proposition, that a legislature does not intend to effect so important a measure as the repeal of a law, without expressing its intent so to do. Such an interpretation, therefore, should not be adopted unless it be inevitable, and any reasonable construction of the later act which offers an escape from it is more likely to be in consonance with the real intention. It is a rule well founded in reason, as well as in authority, that to give an act not clearly intended as a substitute for another the effect of repealing it, the implication of an intent to repeal must be disclosed by a repugnancy between its provisions and those of the earlier law, so positive as to be irreconcilable by any fair, strict, or liberal construction thereof, which would without destroying its manifest intent and meaning, find for it a reasonable field of operation, preserving at the same time the force of the earlier law, and construing both together in harmony with the whole course of legislation upon the subject. To justify a court in holding that an act is repealed by one subsequently passed, it must appear that the later provision is certainly and clearly in hostility to the former. If by any reasonable construction the two statutes can stand together, they must so stand. If harmony is impossible, and it is only in that event, the earlier enactment is repealed. Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. 342; State v. Stoll, 17 Wall. 425; Chew Heong v. U. S., 112 U.S. 536, 5 S.Ct. 255; People v. Board Suprs. St. Lawrence Co., 103 N.Y. 541, 9 N.E. 311; Rounds v. Waymart Borough, 81 Pa.St. 395; Covington v. City of East St. Louis, 78 Ill. 548; Iverson v. State, 52 Ala. 170; Pratt v. Atlantic & St. Lawrence R. Co., 42 Me. 579; Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 105; Smith, St. Law, 879. Of course, repeal by implication can be effected by inconsistent enactments at the same session of the legislature; but it has been said that statutes enacted at the same session are to be construed to a certain extent as one act, and therefore in such a case there is a much stronger presumption against an intention to repeal which is not expressed than in case of statutes passed at different sessions; and in such cases there should be such an exposition as will give effect to what appears to be the main intent of the lawmaker. Peyton v. Moseley, 3 T. B. Bon. 77; Eckloff v. District of Columbia, 4 Mackey, 572; Board of Commrs. of La Grange Co. v. Cutler, 6 Ind. 354.

In the cases first above referred to, and in the large number of authorities therein cited, may be found instances in which the general rules in respect to repeal by implication have been applied, and it only remains for us to make a like application to the facts in hand. As section 1, art. 11, of the constitution bears upon changes in the lines of organized counties only, the law-makers were not restricted in any manner when dealing with the county of Cass. But, as chapter 118 affected the boundary lines of the organized county of Crow Wing, the measure had to be formally approved by the electors of that county before the alteration declared by the legislature became a certainty, and this approval was provided for in the act. Without this enactment, the voters of Crow Wing county were helpless. Its passage, whereby the boundary lines of both counties were changed in so far as that could be accomplished by legislation, was quite as essential to the transfer of a portion of the unorganized county to the organized as was the step subsequently to be taken by the legal voters. And when the law-makers considered and determined upon the subject of this change in county lines, fully and finally covering all matters within the scope of legislative authority, we are unable to see why this action was not as complete and of as great force as if neither of these counties had been organized, and the sections providing for a ballot had been omitted. If such had been the case, no one would have contended that there had been a repeal by implication. When enacting chapter 118, the legislative mind was particularly called to Cass county, and that part of its territory which was to be attached to another county, if the electors of the last-mentioned county so willed it by their ballots. The intent in reference to this particular subject was specially manifested and announced, while chapter 119 was general in its application to the unorganized counties of the state. See Dill. Mun. Corp. Sec. 87. Therefore, and without considering the fact that these laws were passed about the same time and at the same session of the legislature, we conclude that both acts may stand, and that the later general law is not in hostility to, and may readily be harmonized with, the earlier, which is special and local.

NOTE

In State ex rel. City Loan & Sav. Co. v. Moore, 124 Ohio St. 256, 177 N.E. 910 (1931), an Ohio statute repealed certain legislation and replaced it with a new enactment. During the same session of the legislature another statute was passed expressly repealing the new act and reenacting the abrogated legislation. The Ohio Constitution provided that all statutes, with certain exceptions, shall not be effective until ninety days after filing. The court held that re-enactment, although ineffective as a statute for ninety days, in substance operated as a motion to reconsider. This case is discussed and criticized in 45 Harv.L.Rev. 591 (1932).

SPENCER v. THE STATE

Supreme Court of Indiana, 1853, 5 Ind. 41.

[The case appears infra, p. 995.]

STATE v. THORNBURY

Supreme Court of Washington, 1937. 190 Wash. 549, 69 P.2d 815.

MILLARD, JUSTICE. Defendant was charged in the superior court for Thurston county with the crime of Sabbath breaking, in that on Sunday, April 11, 1937, at or about the hour of 12:30 o'clock, a. m., he " . . . then and there did willfully and unlawfully sell, offer for sale and expose for sale personal property, to-wit, intoxicating liquors, to-wit, beer and wine."

To that information the defendant interposed a demurrer which was sustained. The State has appealed.

Counsel for respondent contended in the trial court, as they insist in this court, that section 242, chapter 249, p. 963, Laws 1909, Rem.Rev. Stat. § 2494, was repealed by implication by chapter 62, p. 173, Laws of the Extraordinary Session of 1933, Rem.Rev.Stat. § 7306—1 et seq., Known as the "Washington State Liquor Act." The statute (Rem. Rev.Stat. § 2494) defines Sabbath breaking as follows:

"Every person who, on the first day of the week, shall promote any noisy or boisterous sport or amusement, disturbing the peace of the day; or who shall conduct or carry on, or perform or employ any labor about any trade or manufacture, except livery-stables, garages and works of necessity or charity conducted in an orderly manner so as not to interfere with the repose and religious liberty of the community; or who shall open any drinking saloon, or sell, offer or expose for sale, any personal property, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor: Provided, that meals, without intoxicating liquors, may be served on the premises or elsewhere by caterers, and prepared tobacco, milk, fruit, confectionery, newspapers, magazines, medical and surgical appliances may be sold in a quiet and orderly manner. In works of necessity or charity is included whatever is needful during the day for the good order or health or comfort of a community, but keeping open a barber-shop, shaving or cutting hair shall not be deemed a work of necessity or charity, and nothing in this section shall be construed to permit the sale of uncooked meats, groceries, clothing, boots or shoes."

There can be no implied repeal of one act by another unless both acts deal with or relate to, the same subject-matter. Rem.Rev.Stat. § 2494 is a Sunday closing law; it is not a liquor law. It prohibits the sale on Sunday of intoxicating liquor and all other personal property except "that meals, without intoxicating liquors, may be served on the premises or elsewhere by caterers," and other specified articles. The sale on Sunday of Intoxicating liquors is specifically prohibited, as is the sale of uncooked meats, clothing, and other personal property. The Sabbath breaking statute, Rem.Rev.Stat. § 2494, deals with many varied acts (including the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday), constituting violations of that statute. The state liquor act has to do with the subject-matter of intoxicating liquor. It does not include the entire subject-matter of the Sabbath breaking statute, therefore it cannot repeal it by implication. It will be presumed that the Legislature, in enacting the state liquor law, acted with full knowledge of the Sunday closing law. Our state liquor law is silent on the question of Sunday sales by hotels and restaurants. Surely, if the Legislature had intended to repeal the Sunday closing law, it would have done so when it enacted the state liquor statute which deals only with the subject-matter of intoxicating liquors. It does not, as stated above, cover the whole subject-matter of the statute having to do with Sabbath breaking, and, clearly, was not intended to take its place. . . .

Reversed.

1. In Gaston v. Merriam, 33 Minn. 271 at p. 283, 22 N.W. 614 (1885), Mitchell, J., said: "All laws are presumed to be passed with deliberation, and with full knowledge of existing ones on the same subject; and it is, therefore, a reasonable conclusion that the legislature, in passing a statute, did not intend to interfere with or abrogate any prior law relating to the same matter, unless the repugnancy between the two is irreconcilable and irresistible. The court is bound to uphold the prior law, if the two acts may well subsist together."

2. Lindley, J., in Oudahy Bros. Co. v. La Budde et al., 92 F.2d 937 (C.C.A.7th, 1937), said at p. 939: "Familiar is the principle that repeals will not be implied unless there is a positive repugnance between the provisions of the new law and those of the old and that presumption against such intention to repeal is strongest when the two acts are passed not only at the same session but on the same date. [Citation omitted.] Here, indeed, the two subsections are a part of the same section."

BENDER v. UNITED STATES

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Third Circuit, 1937.
93 F.2d 814.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey; William Clark, Judge.

Samuel Bender was convicted of knowingly and unlawfully working in a distillery for the production of spirituous liquors upon which no sign bearing the words "Registered Distillery" was placed and kept as required by law, and he appeals.

Reversed and remanded.

BIGGS, CIRCUIT JUDGE. Samuel Bender, the appellant, was tried upon an indictment consisting of four counts. The learned trial judge submitted only the first and third counts to the jury for its consideration. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty upon the third count alone. The third count was as follows: "That on or about the 18th day of April, A.D.1934, at Lafayette in Andover Township and the County of Sussex, in the State and District of New Jersey and within the jurisdiction of this Court, the said Sam Bender knowingly and unlawfully did work in a distillery for the production of spirituous liquors upon which no sign bearing the words 'Registered Distillery' was placed and kept, as required by law; contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. . . ."

The statute in question was R.S. § 3279, 26 U.S.C.A. § 1182, the pertinent portions of which are as follows:

"Every person engaged in distilling or rectifying spirits . . . shall place and keep conspicuously on the outside of the place of such business a sign, exhibiting in plain and legible letters, . . . the name or firm of the distiller, rectifier . . . with the words: 'Registered distillery', 'rectifier of spirits', . . . as the case may be. Every person who violates the foregoing provision by negligence or refusal, or otherwise, shall pay a penalty of $500. . . ."

"And every person who works in any distillery, rectifying establishment, or wholesale liquor store, on which no sign is placed and kept, as hereinbefore provided; and every person who knowingly receives at, carries, or conveys any distilled spirits to or from any such distillery, rectifying establishment, warehouse, or store or who knowingly carries and delivers any grain, molasses, or other raw material to any distillery on which such sign is not placed and kept, shall forfeit all horses, carts, drays, wagons, or other vehicle or animal used in carrying or conveying such property aforesaid, and shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than six months."

The statute just quoted was derived from an act of Congress passed upon July 20, 1868, 15 Stat. 132, § 18, and was law at least until the passage of the National Prohibition Act, 27 U.S.C.A. § 1 et seq., which the appellant contends repealed the statute just quoted by implication.

The pertinent portion of the National Prohibition Act, which was passed upon October 28, 1919, c. 85, tit. 2, § 17, 41 Stat. 313, 27 U.S.C.A. § 29, is as follows: "Advertising liquor or manufacture, sale, or keeping for sale thereof; exceptions. It shall be unlawful to advertise anywhere, or by any means or method, liquor, or the manufacture, sale, keeping for sale or furnishing of the same, or where, how, from whom, or at what price the same may be obtained. No one shall permit any sign or billboard containing such advertisement to remain upon one's premises. But nothing herein shall prohibit manufacturers and wholesale druggists holding permits to sell liquor from furnishing price lists, with description of liquor for sale, to persons permitted to purchase liquor, or from advertising alcohol in business publications or trade journals circulating generally among manufacturers of lawful alcoholic perfumes, toilet preparations, flavoring extracts, medicinal preparations, and like articles: Provided, however, That nothing in this chapter [or Section 341 of Title 18] shall apply to newspapers published in foreign countries when mailed to this country."

We believe that the statute just quoted repealed by implication the statute under which the third count of the indictment in the case sub judice. United States v. Yuginovich, 256 U.S. 450, 41 S. Ct. 551, 65 L. Ed. 1043; Ketchum v. United States, 8 Cir., 270 F. 416; Sanford v. United States, 8 Cir., 274 F. 369; United States v. Windham, D.C., 264 F. 376; Gray v. United States, 6 Cir., 276 F. 395.

The only question therefore remaining is whether or not R.S. § 3279, 26 U.S.C.A. § 1182, was re-enacted or revived by any subsequent act of Congress or constitutional amendment.

Upon November 23, 1921, Congress passed an act re-enacting the provisions of the revenue laws in respect to manufacture and sale of liquor which had been repealed by the National Prohibition Act. That statute, chapter 134, § 5, 42 Stat. 223, 27 U.S.C.A. § 3, is as follows: "Effect on existing legislation. All laws in regard to the manufacture and taxation of and traffic in intoxicating liquor, and all penalties for violations of such laws that were in force on October 28, 1919, shall be and continue in force, as to both beverage and nonbeverage liquor, except such provisions of such laws as are directly in conflict with any provision of this title."

It is clear, we think, that the last clause of the statute just above quoted could not serve as a re-enactment of R.S. § 3279, 26 U.S.C.A. § 1182, since that statute expressly required the posting of a sign, registered distillery, and the National Prohibition Act expressly prohibits it. Commercial Credit Co. v. United States, 6 Cir., 5 F.2d 1, 4.

If it be the fact that the statute which required a distiller to post a sign showing that his place of business was a distillery has been repealed it follows as a matter of logic that a statute making it a crime to work in a distillery upon which no such sign is posted is also repealed.

The National Prohibition Act was itself repealed upon August 27, 1935, 49 Stat. 872, shortly following the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment. Can it be said that the repeal of the National Prohibition Act and of the Eighteenth Amendment had the effect of reviving section 3279, 26 U.S.C.A. § 1182, at that time, as we have found, repealed by implication? Can a dead act rise again? Rev.St. § 12, 1 U. S.C.A. § 28, provides: "Whenever an Act is repealed, which repealed a former Act, such former Act shall not thereby be revived, unless it shall be expressly so provided."

We are of the opinion that the statute just quoted applies to repeals by implication as well as by express language. Milne v. Huber, Fed.Cas.No.9,617. The statute in question, in our opinion, changes the common-law rule that the repeal of a repealing act revived the former act. Wallace v. Bradshaw, 54 N.J.L. 175, 23 A. 759.

We are therefore of the conclusion that Rev.St. § 3279, 26 U.S.C.A. § 1182, when repealed by implication was not subsequently revived and that therefore the third count of the indictment against the appellant was founded upon the provisions of a statute which had ceased to exist as law.

Having reached this conclusion we deem it unnecessary to examine further into this case.

The decision of the court below is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further action in accordance with this opinion.

such manner as the court may direct, upon the nearest blood relative and guardian of such insane person, and the superintendent of the institution in which he is confined. "9. That Laws 1933, Chapter 262 be and the same hereby is repealed."

Approved April 25, 1935.

3. The New York Law Revision Commission sponsored a bill in the 1947 session of the New York Legislature declaratory of the common law rule of that state that where "two or more acts enacted at the same legislative session, without reference to each other, affect the same statute or portion of a statute, the construction of the statute so affected is a question of law depending on the intent of the legislature, and the order in which the several acts took effect, or became law, is not conclusive." Based on People ex rel. Chadbourne v. Voorhis, 236 N.Y. 437, 141 N.E. 907 (1923), and McMaster v. Gould, 240 N.Y. 379, 148 N.E. 556 (1925). See (1947) N.Y.Leg.Doc.No.65(N)). The bill was vetoed without explanation.

DUNCAN L. KENNEDY, LEGISLATIVE BILL DRAFTING

Repealing acts are of two general types. A repeal by implication is obtained by enactment of contrary provisions, and since the latest statute prevails, the former is of no effect and is repealed by implication, but the former statute is repealed only insofar as it is in conflict with the provisions of the later statute. Repeals by implication are more prevalent when statutes are not kept up to date and in their proper place. If the statutes are not up to date and do not clearly show what is the latest amendment or law on any subject, legislators are more apt to pass laws concerning matters already covered without specifically repealing the prior laws and without taking them into consideration. The result is a multiplicity of laws and repeals by implication. Only the courts can finally decide whether an entire law, or only a part thereof, is repealed. Until the court passes upon it, no one can know whether an implied repeal will stand. Most implied repeals can be prevented by an efficient revisor of statutes who knows the statutory law and is constantly on the lookout for bills containing implied repeals.

In express repeals care must be exercised to fully determine the status of existing matters by virtue of the act to be repealed, and also as to the status of pending matters. Provision would also have to be made to take care of applications for licenses which are pending at the time the repeal would take effect. These results are generally taken care of by means of saving clauses. The repeal of an act takes away from it all force and the act is totally destroyed.

[The same author in "Drafting Bills for the Minnesota Legislature" (1946) at p. 16, says:]

"A common practice in the past, now less frequently followed, was to provide at the close of a bill, 'all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.' This is both unnecessary and confusing. In legal effect it adds nothing, as without such provision all prior conflicting laws or parts of laws would be repealed by implication. Robert Luce states it thusly: 'Why waste ink by so much as declaring that "all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed?" Of course they are. It is elementary that the last word goes.'"

SECTION 5. REVISIONS, CODIFICATIONS, CONSOLIDATIONS AND COMPILATIONS

SMITH v. EAU CLAIRE

Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1891. 78 Wis. 457, 47 N.W. 830.

By an ordinance passed by the common council of the city of Eau Claire, on March 6, 1889, the grade of a street in said city, known as "Fifth Avenue," was changed, and ordered to be raised above the former grade thereof duly established several years before. The street was filled by the city to the new grade during the spring and summer of 1889. The plaintiff owned a lot fronting on Fifth avenue, on which stood his residence. The lot had been filled with reference to the old grade, and the filling of the street to the new grade raised it above the level of the lot, and thereby damaged the property. The plaintiff presented to the common council a claim for such damages, but the council disallowed the same. He thereupon took an appeal from such disallowance to the circuit court, pursuant to the provisions of the city charter. The court directed the parties to file and serve formal pleadings, and thereupon the plaintiff filed and served his complaint, alleging therein the facts above stated, with the additional fact that the ordinance changing the grade of Fifth avenue was approved by the mayor March 7, and published in the official newspaper of the city April 9, 1889. The city interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, and appeals from an order overruling the same.

LYON, J., (after stating the facts as above.) . . . This brings us to the inquiry, is there any statute which entitles the plaintiff to compensation for the consequential injury to his lot caused by such change of grade? The charter of the city of Eau Claire now in force is contained in chapter 184, Laws 1889. It was published, and took effect, March 30, 1889. The charter in force before that time is contained in chapter 16, P. & L. Laws 1872, entitled "An act to incorporate the city of Eau Claire," approved March 2, 1872, and in certain acts amending the same. The title of chapter 184 is "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the charter of the city of Eau Claire, approved March 2, 1872, and the several acts amendatory thereof." Chapter 184 contains no provision making the city liable for damages caused by a change of grade of a street. Chapter 16 of 1872 (the old charter) contained such a provision. Is that provision repealed by the new charter? The general rule is that a statute which revises the subject-matter of a former statute works a repeal of such former statute without express words to that effect. Lewis v. Stout, 22 Wis. 234. Hence, if chapter 184 contained no express repealing clause, it would operate to repeal chapter 16 by implication, for it revises the whole subject-matter of the latter chapter. But chapter 184 contains a repealing clause, which is as follows: "All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with, and conflicting with, the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed." It was held, in Lewis v. Stout, that such a repealing clause, saves all provisions in the old act which are not inconsistent with the revised act. So it was held in that case that a provision in a former statute, requiring a certain bond to run to the governor, was not repealed by a revising act which required the bond to be given, but did not provide to whom it should be executed, and which only repealed acts inconsistent therewith. It is obvious that the provision in the former statute, thus saved, was not inconsistent with the revising statute. But we have no such case here. Chapter 184 of 1889 does not charge the city with liability for consequential damages caused by a lawful change of the grade of a street. Standing alone, it is as complete an immunity from such liability as though it had been expressly enacted therein that the city should not be so liable. The former statute imposed such liability in terms. That the two are inconsistent with each other seems to admit of no doubt.

The order of the circuit court must be reversed, and that court directed to sustain the demurrer.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. STATE

LEWIS, J. 1. The latter part of section 2189 of the Civil Code gives the railroad commissioners power to require the location of such depots, and the establishment of such freight buildings, as the condition of the road, the safety of freight, and the public comfort and convenience require. This provision is contained in the act of October 29, 1889 (Acts 1889, p. 132). Under section 2196 of the Civil Code a penalty is prescribed against any railroad company doing business in this state for a violation of the rules and regulations fixed by the railroad commissioners. This section is a codification of section 9 of the act of October 14, 1879 (Acts 1878-79, p. 129). It appears from the record that on January 28, 1896, the railroad commissioners of this state passed an order requiring the Central of Georgia Railway Company to erect a suitable depot building at Forsyth, in Monroe county. The company refused to comply with this order, and suit was instituted by the state, through the attorney general, in Monroe superior court, to recover the penalty provided for in the above section 2196 of the Civil Code. . . .

The wrong done in this case was a failure on the part of the company, through its principal officer, to obey the order of the railroad commissioners. It involved simply an omission of a duty. No agent in Monroe county was charged with this duty, or had anything whatever to do with its performance, so far as the record shows. No disregard, therefore, of the mandates of the railroad commissioners occurred in that county. The wrong was perpetrated by the company through its principal officer, who failed or refused to obey the order in question. The violation, therefore, occurred in the county where the company's principal office is located, and there the wrong was perpetrated. . . . We think, therefore, that the court erred in not sustaining the first ground of the demurrer to the petition.

2. It is contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that there is no law in this state which confers upon the railroad commissioners the power and authority to require a railroad company to erect depot buildings; that the act which undertakes to confer this power, to wit, the act approved October 29, 1889, amendatory of the act of 1879, is unconstitutional, because it contains matter different from what is expressed in the title thereof; and that the act approved August 31, 1891, which undertook to remove the defect in the title in the act of 1879, is itself unconstitutional, because its title does not indicate the matter contained in the body of the act. On the other hand, it is contended by counsel for the state that, the act of 1889 being codified as section 2189 of the new Code, the act of 1895 adopting and making of force that Code cured all those defects, if any, which had existed in the act of 1889. Counsel for plaintiff in error insists, however, that by the adopting act of 1895 the legislature never intended to make anything in the Code law which was not the law before its adoption; and that, even if such was its intention, it did not have the power, under the constitution, to enact in this way new statutes, or any changes or modifications in the existing laws of the state. We will not pause to consider or pass upon the questions raised in reference to the constitutionality of the acts of 1889 and 1891 as originally passed by the legislature, but we will pass over these to consider the more important question as to what validity or force the adopting act of the legislature gave to the provisions in the present Code of 1895. Upon this issue was fought the great legal battle between counsel for the contending parties in this case; and the view we take of this question, which can scarcely be measured in its importance and interest to the profession and the people generally, renders it unnecessary to consider the other constitutional questions touching defects in the titles of the original acts. It is insisted that by the act approved December 19, 1893, providing for the appointment of three commissioners to codify the laws of Georgia, these commissioners were simply empowered to codify and arrange in systematic and condensed form the laws then in force in the state, and had no authority whatever to embody in the Code any new law, or any provision which modified any existing law of the state. No one would hardly pretend that any new matter in the Code derives force or efficacy by virtue of the act of the commissioners alone. Even if the legislature had attempted to confer upon the commissioners the power to make changes in the law, and to embody in the Code such new matter as they saw proper, such an act of the legislature, in so far as its purpose was to thus create new legislation for the state, would have been an absolute nullity. Enacting and changing laws for a state devolves by the constitution upon the legislative branch of its government, and that branch cannot delegate the power to another. A consideration, therefore, of the duties and powers imposed upon the code commissioners, can throw no light upon what construction should be given an act of the legislature adopting their work. If the codifiers introduced any new matter in the Code, it, of course, amounted to nothing unless it afterwards was enacted into statute by legislative sanction. Where such matter is not inherently unconstitutional,—that is, where it embraces nothing that is not a proper subject-matter of legislative enactment,—there can be no question but that the legislature has the power to enact it into law or not, as it sees proper. When the work of the commissioners was completed, it was laid before the legislature. It had the power to reject that work or to accept it, and in its acceptance it had the power simply to provide for the pay of the commissioners, and the publication of their work for the use of the public; and, if nothing more was done, there would have been a want of legislative sanction to any new matter embodied in the Code, and hence such new matter would never have had any validity. The vital question, then, in this case, is not what the commissioners had the power to do, but what the legislature intended to do with their work. That intention can only be gathered from what the legislature itself has deliberately declared when it finally passed upon the work reported to it by the commissioners. This final action of the legislature is embodied in what is known as the "Adopting Act" of the Code, approved December 16, 1895. Section 1 of that act declares: "That the code of laws prepared under its authority by John L. Hopkins, Clifford Anderson, and Joseph R. Lamar, and revised, fully examined and identified by the certificate of its joint committee, and recommended and reported for adoption, and with the acts passed by the general assembly of 1895 added thereto by the codifiers, be, and the same is, hereby adopted and made of force as the Code of Georgia." This portion of the body of the act is covered by these words in the title, "An act to approve, adopt, and make of force the code of laws prepared under the direction and by authority of the general assembly," etc. A legislative body should always be presumed to mean something by the passage of an act. If, as contended by plaintiff in error, the legislature by this act intended to adopt such provisions in this Code as were law anyway, without any further legislative sanction whatever, then the act in question is absolutely meaningless. It would give no more force or effect to the Code of 1895 than such a work would have carried with it emanating from a private source, and without any legislative warrant or authority whatever. The code of laws designated and identified in the act was adopted and made of force as the Code of Georgia. Not a part of the Code was then made of force, but the entire Code, as compiled by the commissioners. It would be difficult to conceive how language could more clearly or forcibly express the real intent of the legislature in this matter than the words used in the title and the body of this act. If it means anything, it means a purpose of the legislature to adopt and make of force a code of laws, and hence to breathe into every provision in that code the vitality of a legislative enactment. Any other construction would ascribe to the legislature the folly of declaring, in effect, "We adopt as law in this code everything which would be law anyway without further sanction." It would be just as reasonable for that body to re-enact verbatim et literatim a statute which it recognized and knew to be already of force. Had such been the legislative will, that body would, doubtless, have pursued the same course with reference to the Code of 1895 that its predecessors followed in regard to the Codes of 1868, 1873, and 1882. The Code of 1868, known as "Irwin's Code," and also the Code of 1873, were both the work of private enterprise, their compilation not even having been previously authorized by any act of the legislature. The Code of 1882 was compiled in pursuance of an act of the legislature, but neither this edition nor the other two named received the sanction of an adopting act. After each of these works was completed, it was, by resolution of the general assembly, submitted, the first to a committee of three, and the last two to the attorney general of the state, and each received favorable reports. This was a completion of the works, and all the legislature afterwards did was to order a publication of a given number of volumes, and make appropriation therefor. When, however, the Code of 1895 was reported by the commissioners, and was examined, approved, and favorably reported by a joint committee of both houses of the legislature, that body went a step further, and passed the "Adopting Act" of 1895. . . . There is quite a difference between a code of laws for a state and a compilation in revised form of its statutes. The code is broader in its scope, and more comprehensive in its purposes. Its general object is to embody as near as practicable all the law of a state, from whatever source derived. When properly adopted by the lawmaking power of a state, it has the same effect as one general act of the legislature containing all the provisions embraced in the volume that is thus adopted. It is more than evidentiary of the law. It is the law itself. In 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 173, it is declared: "The word [code] is used frequently in the United States to signify a concise, comprehensive, systematic re-enactment of the law, deduced from both its principal sources,—the pre-existing statutes and the adjudications of courts,—as distinguished from compilations of statute law only." We quote the following from Black on Interpretation of Laws (page 363): "Although a code or revision may be made up of many provisions drawn from various sources, though it may include the whole or parts of many previous laws and reject many others in whole or in part, though it may change or modify the existing law, or though it may add to the body of law previously in force many new provisions, yet it is to be considered as one homogenous whole, established 'uno flatu.' All its various parts or sections are to be considered and interpreted as if they were parts of a single statute. And hence, according to a well-known rule, the various provisions, if apparently conflicting, must, if possible, be brought into harmony and agreement. In order to bring about this harmony and agreement, the court which is called upon to interpret the code will look through the entire work, and gather such assistance as may be afforded by a complete survey of it." Whenever the legislature, therefore, employs such words as "adopting a code," no other legitimate or reasonable construction can be given the language itself than an intention to enact and make of force as a statute every provision in the entire work which it has under consideration. Such being the intention, then, of the legislature by the adopting act of 1895, it remains to be considered whether or not this purpose has been legally and constitutionally declared.

3. The present constitution of this state (article 3, § 7, par. 7; Civ. Code, § 5770) declares that "every bill, before it shall pass, shall be read three times, and on three separate days, in each house, unless in cases of actual invasion or insurrection." One attack made upon the adopting act is that it does not contain in its body any of the various provisions of the law which it seeks to declare of force, and that under the constitutional provision above cited it was necessary that these provisions should have been embodied in the act, and should have been read three times before their passage. If this contention be correct, then a large body of our laws, many of which have been enforced for a century, are unconstitutional and void. The act of 1782 revived the colonial statutes by mere reference, and without embodying them in the act itself. The act of 1784 adopted the common law of England. These laws were passed under a constitution which required bills to be read three times in the house and twice in the council; and the common law not only was not so read, but very few, if any, of the legislators knew of all its provisions.

. . . In Association v. Richards, 21 Ga. 592, it was held that an act of the legislature incorporating a company by its constitution and by-laws, without embodying the same in the act, was constitutional and valid. On page 613, Lumpkin, J., delivering the opinion, said: "Suppose the legislature were to adopt the Bible as a part of the law of the land. Would the act be void, unless the whole of the Old and New Testament were embodied in the statute? Suppose it were to declare that the Levitical decrees as set forth in the Old Testament should fix the relationship within which marriage might or might not be contracted; or suppose it were to say that Mr. Greenleaf's treatise on Evidence should be the guide of the courts in settling the rules of testimony. It is needless to multiply illustrations. The position is untenable and impracticable. . . . We think the court did right in overruling all the grounds of the demurrer except the first, and we reverse the judgment for not sustaining the demurrer on the ground, alone, that Monroe superior court did not have jurisdiction of this cause of action. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

2. Recommendation of the Law Revision Commission to the Legislature Relating to the Compilation of Acts Creating or Validating Public Authorities as a Separate Chapter of the Consolidated Laws. N.Y.Leg.Doc. (1939) No. 65 (I), 3-5. (1939) Rep.Rec. & St.Law Rev.Comm. 387-389.

In a recommendation dealing with public authorities, transmitted to the 1938 Legislature, the Commission pointed out that "There are in existence today twenty-two corporate instrumentalities of the state of New York, generally known as 'authorities', created by act of the Legislature for the furtherance of various self-liquidating public improvements or enterprises, such as parkways, bridges, regional markets and hydro-electric power development systems. The creation of a twenty-third, the New York City Parkway Authority, is now before the Legislature. In addition, there are several authorities created by local action pursuant to general law, of which three—the New York City, Buffalo and Schenectady housing authorities—have been specifically validated by the Legislature.

"At the present time, the acts creating these authorities and defining their powers, as well as the numerous amendments thereto, can be found only by consulting the session laws. It is frequently necessary to refer to six or seven volumes of the session laws for the acts relating to a single authority. This inconvenience would be entirely obviated by assembling, as a new chapter of the Consolidated Laws, the twenty-five or more public authority statutes as last amended."

The Commission recommended in 1938 the compilation of the legislative acts creating or validating public authorities as a separate chapter of the Consolidated Laws. Twenty-six such authorities have been created since 1928, and it is probable that others will be created in the future.

The only question raised with regard to the proposed compilation was a constitutional one, namely whether it would conflict with Article III, section 16, of the New York State Constitution. (This article appears infra, p. 420. Ed.) The Commission after considering the question concluded that a mere compilation, without substantive changes, would be constitutional (see Leg.Doc. (1938) No. 65 (R) for Recommendation and Study). However, doubts on the constitutional point persisted, and the bill did not become law.

The constitutional question has now been expressly resolved. By an amendment to the Constitution adopted in 1938, section 16 of Article III was renumbered section 15. Former section 23, renumbered section 21, was rewritten and reads as follows:

"§ 21. Sections fifteen, sixteen, and seventeen of this article shall not apply to any bill, or the amendment to any bill, which shall be recommended to the legislature by commissioners or any public agency appointed or directed pursuant to law to prepare revisions, consolidations or compilations of statutes. But a bill amending an existing law shall not be excepted from the provisions of sections fifteen, sixteen and seventeen of this article unless such amending bill shall itself be recommended to the legislature by such commissioners or public agency."

Section 21 of Article III of the New York State Constitution now makes it clear that section 15 of that article (formerly section 16) does not apply to bills recommended by the Law Revision Commission. . . .

Inasmuch as the exemption from section 15 of Article III of the Constitution, granted by section 21 of that article, does not cover amending bills, unless recommended by the commissioners or public agencies described in section 21, the Commission suggests that, if the Public Authorities Law be enacted, any amendments thereto, unless of a general nature, and applicable to all the authorities included in the consolidation, shall involve no more than a single authority, and shall be entitled in the following form:

"An act to amend the public authorities law, in relation to authorizing Triborough bridge authority to construct a bridge across the East river," etc. A title in the form suggested would comply strictly with the requirements of section 15 (formerly section 16) of Article III of the Constitution. . . .

[The proposed measure became N.Y.Laws 1939, ch. 870.]

Twelve supplemental bills were also introduced, each of which incorporated in the compilation the provisions of another bill before the Legislature at this session amending one of the acts creating a public authority or creating a new authority. Each of these twelve supplemental bills received the same action as the bill whose provisions it incorporated. Five were enacted. Ed.]

3. The New York Public Authorities Law provides: "§ 1600. Construction. This chapter shall not be considered a new act, but a reenactment and a continuation of the several acts consolidated herein; nor shall this chapter affect or impair any right, power or duty conferred or imposed by any such act or any liability or right incurred or action or proceeding taken thereunder."

IN RE HALL

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1882.
50 Conn. 131, 47 Am.Rep. 425.

PARK, C. J. This is an application by a woman for admission to the bar of Hartford County. After having completed the prescribed term of study she has passed the examination required by the rules of the bar and has been recommended by the bar of the county to the Superior Court for admission, subject to the opinion of the court upon the question whether as a woman she can legally be admitted. The Superior Court has reserved the case for our advice.

The statute with regard to the admission of attorneys by the court is the 29th section of chapter 3, title 4, of the General Statutes, and is in the following words:—"The Superior Court may admit and cause to be sworn as attorneys such persons as are qualified therefor agreeably to the rules established by the judges of said court; and no other person than an attorney so admitted shall plead at the bar of any court of this state, except in his own cause."

It is not contended, in opposition to the application, that the language of this statute is not comprehensive enough to include women, but the claim is that at the time it was passed its application to women was not thought of, while the fact that women have never been admitted as attorneys, either by the English courts or by any of the courts of this country, had established a common-law disability, which could be removed only by a statute intended to have that effect.

It is hardly necessary to consider how far the fact that women have never pursued a particular profession or occupied a particular official position, to the pursuit or occupancy of which some governmental license or authority was necessary, constitutes a common-law disability for receiving such license or authority, because here the statute is ample for removing that disability if we can construe it as applying to women; so that we come back to the question whether we are by construction to limit the application of the statute to men alone, by reason of the fact that in its original enactment its application to women was not intended by the legislators that enacted it. And upon this point we remark, in the first place, that an inquiry of this sort involves very serious difficulties. No one would doubt that a statute passed at this time in the same words would be sufficient to authorize the admission of women to the bar, because it is now a common fact and presumably in the minds of legislators, that women in different parts of the country are and for some time have been following the profession of law. But if we hold that the construction of the statute is to be determined by the admitted fact that its application to women was not in the minds of the legislators when it was passed, where shall we draw the line? All progress in social matters is gradual. We pass almost imperceptibly from a state of public opinion that utterly condemns some course of action to one that strongly approves it. At what point in the history of this change shall we regard a statute, the construction of which is to be affected by it, as passed in contemplation of it? When the statute we are now considering was passed it probably never entered the mind of a single member of the legislature that black men would ever be seeking for admission under it. Shall we now hold that it cannot apply to black men? We know of no distinction in respect to this rule between the case of a statute and that of a constitutional provision. When our state constitution was adopted in 1818 it was provided in it that every elector should be "eligible to any office in the state" except where otherwise provided in the constitution. It is clear that the convention that framed, and probably all the people who voted to adopt the constitution, had no idea that black men would ever be electors, and contemplated only white men as within any possible application of the provision, for the same constitution provided that only white men should be electors. But now that black men are made electors, will it do to say that they are not entitled to the full rights of electors in respect to holding office, because an application of the provision to them was never thought of when it was adopted? Events that gave rise to enactments may always be considered in construing them. This is little more than the familiar rule that in construing a statute we always inquire what particular mischief it was designed to remedy. Thus the Supreme Court of the United States has held that in construing the recent amendments of the federal constitution, although they are general in their terms, it is to be considered that they were passed with reference to the exigencies growing out of the emancipation of the slaves, and for the purpose of benefiting the blacks. Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 67, 21 L.Ed. 394; Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 306, 25 L.Ed. 664. But this statute was not passed for the purpose of benefiting men as distinguished from women. It grew out of no exigency caused by the relation of the sexes. Its object was wholly to secure the orderly trial of causes and the better administration of justice. Indeed the preamble to the first statute providing for the admission of attorneys, states its object to be "for the well-ordering of proceedings and pleas at the bar." . . .

The statute finally took its present form in the revision of 1875. It retains the provision that the Superior Court may make rules for the admission of attorneys, and provides that the court "may admit and cause to be sworn as attorneys such persons as are qualified therefor agreeably to the rules established," and restores the provision, dropped in the revision of 1866, that "no person other than an attorney so admitted shall plead at the bar of any court in this state, except in his own cause."

These changes, though not such as to affect the meaning of the statute at any point of importance to the present question, are yet not wholly without importance. The adoption by the legislature of a revision of the statutes becomes, both in law and in fact, a re-enactment of the whole body of statutes; and though in determining the meaning of a statute we are not to regard it as then enacted for the first time, especially if there be no change in phraseology, yet where there is such a change, it follows that the attention of the revisers had been particularly directed to that statute, as of course also that of the legislature, and that with the changes made it expresses the present intent of both. Thus in this case it is clear that the revisers gave particular thought to the phraseology of the statute we are considering, and put it in a form that seemed to them best with reference to the present state of things, and decided to leave the words "such persons" to stand, with full knowledge that they were sufficient to include women, and that women were already following the profession of law in different parts of the country. The legislators must be presumed to have acted with the same consideration and knowledge. It would have been perfectly easy, if either should have thought best, to insert some words of limitation or exclusion, but it was not done. Not only so, but a clause omitted in the revision of 1866 was restored, providing that no "person" not regularly admitted should act as an attorney—a term which necessarily included women, and the insertion of which made it necessary, if the word "persons" as used in the first part of the statute should be held not to include women, to give two entirely different meanings to the same word where occurring twice in the same statute and with regard to the same subject matter.

The object of a revision of the statutes is, that there may be such changes made in them as the changes in political and social matters may demand, and where no changes are made it is to be presumed that the legislature is satisfied with it in its present form. And where some changes are made in a particular statute, and other parts of it are left unchanged, there is the more reason for the inference, from this evidence that the matter of changing the statute was especially considered, that the parts unchanged express the legislative will of to-day, rather than that of perhaps a hundred years ago, when it was originally enacted.

But this statute, in the revision of 1875, is placed immediately after another with regard to the appointment of commissioners of the Superior Court, the necessary construction of which, we think, throws light upon the construction of the statute in question. That act was passed in 1855, after women had begun, with general acceptance, to occupy a greatly enlarged field of industry, and some professional and even public positions; and it has been held by the Superior Court, very properly, we think, as applying to women, a woman having three years ago been appointed a commissioner under it. Its language is as follows:—"The Superior Court in any county may appoint any number of persons in such county to be commissioners of the Superior Court, who, when sworn, may sign writs and subpoenas, take recognizances, administer oaths and take depositions and the acknowledgment of deeds, and shall hold office for two years from their appointment." Here the very language is used which is used in the statute with regard to attorneys. In one it is, "any number of persons" in the other, "such persons as are qualified." These two statutes are placed in immediate juxtaposition in the revision of 1875 and deal with kindred subjects, and it is reasonable to presume that the revisers and legislators intended both to receive the same construction. It would seem strange to any common-sense observer that an entirely different meaning should be given to the same word in the two statutes, especially when in giving the narrower meaning to the word in the statute with regard to attorneys, we are compelled to give it a different meaning from that which the same word requires in the next line of the same statute.

We are not to forget that all statutes are to be construed, as far as possible, in favor of equality of rights. All restrictions upon human liberty, all claims for special privileges, are to be regarded as having the presumption of law against them, and as standing upon their defense, and can be sustained, if at all by valid legislation, only by the clear expression or clear implication of the law.

We have some noteworthy illustrations of the recognition of women as eligible or appointable to office under statutes of which the language is merely general. Thus, women are appointed in all parts of the country as postmasters. The act of Congress of 1825 was the first one conferring upon the post-master general the power of appointing postmasters, and it has remained essentially unchanged to the present time. The language of the act is, that "the postmaster-general shall establish post offices and appoint postmasters." Here women are not included except in the general term "postmasters," a term which seems to imply a male person; and no legislation from 1825 down to the present time authorizes the appointment of women, nor is there any reference in terms to women until the revision of 1874, which recognizes the fact that women had already been appointed, in providing that "the bond of any married woman who may be appointed postmaster shall be binding on her and her sureties."

Some of the higher grades of postmasters are appointed by the president subject to confirmation by the senate, and such appointments and confirmations have repeatedly been made. The same may be said of pension agents. The acts of Congress on the subject have simply authorized "the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to appoint all pension agents, who shall hold their offices for the term of four years, and shall give bond," etc. At the last session of Congress a married woman in Chicago was appointed for a third term pension agent for the state of Illinois, and the public papers stated that there was not a single vote against her confirmation in the senate. Public opinion is everywhere approving of such appointments. They promote the public interest, which is benefited by every legitimate use of individual ability, while mere justice, which is of interest to all, requires that all have the fullest opportunity for the exercise of their abilities. These cases are the more noteworthy as being cases of public offices to which the incumbent is appointed for a term of years, upon a compensation provided by law, and in which he is required to give bond. If an attorney is to be regarded as an officer, it is in a lower sense.

We have had pressed upon us by the counsel opposed to the applicant, the decisions of the courts of Massachusetts, Wisconsin and Illinois, and of the United States Court of Claims, adverse to such an application. While not prepared to accede to all the general views expressed in those decisions, we do not think it necessary to go into a discussion of them, as we regard our statute, in view of all the considerations affecting its construction, as too clear to admit of any reasonable question as to the interpretation and effect which we ought to give it.

MACKEY v. MILLER.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1903. 126 F. 161.

GILBERT, CIRCUIT JUDGE. The appellants contend that the judgment of the District Court is void for the reason that the indictment charges no offense against any law of the United States. Section 6 of Act July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 179, c. 201), occurs in a chapter which is entitled "An act to further prevent smuggling, and for other purposes." It is as clear as words can make it that it refers only to offenses committed against officers of the customs, their deputies, and persons assisting them in the execution of their duties, and that it has no application to an act done in resistance of an Indian agent in making searches or seizures upon an Indian reservation. It is true that section 5447 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.Comp.St.1901, p. 3678) omits from the prior statute the words "by this act" and "authorized as aforesaid," and it is contended on the part of the appellee that by such omission it was the intention of Congress in adopting the Revision to extend the penalty therein denounced to all cases of resistance to any person authorized by a law of the United States to make searches or seizures. Unaided by the prior act, and unaffected by the marginal notes, there might be grave question whether the language of section 5447 were not susceptible of interpretation in accordance with this contention. The marginal note, however, defines the section with these words: "Resisting revenue officers, rescuing or destroying seized property," etc. It has been held in New York that the headings to the Revised Statutes of that state, which were passed as one act, formed a part of the body thereof quite as much as the section itself, and that "it was inserted for the purpose of controlling and limiting the scope and application of the general words used in the chapter." People v. Molineux, 53 Barb. 15; People v. Molyneux, 40 N.Y. 113. And the same was held by the Supreme Court of California concerning the headnotes to the chapters and titles in the practice act of that state. Barnes v. Jones, 51 Cal. 303. But, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U.S. 41, 20 S.Ct. 747, 44 L.Ed. 969, holding that the heading of a revised statute is proper to be considered in interpreting the statute when ambiguity exists, it may be doubted whether the rule of New York and California obtains as to the interpretation of the Revised Statutes of the United States. But, conceding that the marginal note is not an integral part of section 5447, and aside from the question whether or not there is ambiguity in the statute, there is no doubt that it may be referred to as indicating the intention of Congress not to alter by the revision the substantial provisions of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 178, c. 201). In Canan v. Pound Mfg. Co. (C.C.) 23 F. 184, 23 Blatchf. 173, it was held, in substance, that the use in a revision of language plain enough, if taken by itself, to effect a change in the law, will not be allowed to have the effect, unless the court is satisfied that Congress in fact realized that effect, contemplated it, and actively intended it. That decision was approved in Bate Refrigerating Co. v. Hammond, 129 U.S. 151, 169, 9 S.Ct. 225, 229, 32 L.Ed. 645. In Dominick v. Michael, 4 Sandf. 409, the court said: "For nearly half a century it has been a cardinal and controlling maxim that in the construction of a revised act a mere change in the language shall not be regarded as evidence of an intention to vary the construction, unless the change is such as to render that intention manifest and certain." In Goodell v. Jackson, 20 Johns. 722, 11 Am.Dec. 351, Chancellor Kent declared the law to have been long since settled that "The change of phraseology in the language of a revised act shall not be deemed a change of the law as it stood before the revision, unless such phraseology evidently purported an intention in the Legislature to work a change." Such being the rule which must guide us in the interpretation of the revised statute in question, it is clear that, by adopting the marginal note limiting the scope of the statute to acts done in resistance of revenue officers, Congress affirmed its purpose not to amend or change the original legislation. The reason for the omission of the words "by this act" and "authorized as aforesaid" is found in the fact that section 5447 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.Comp.St.1901, p. 3678) is taken from its place in the original act, which is an act to prevent smuggling and for other purpose, and is inserted as a section in a chapter which deals with "Crimes against the Operation of the Government," and there is no context to which those words would apply.

The judgment of the Circuit Court will be reversed, and the appellants discharged from custody.

NOTES

1. Robert K. Cullen, Revisor of Statutes for Kentucky, in "Mechanics of Statutory Revision," 24 Ore.L.Rev. 1, at p. 2, states the purposes and aims of revision as:

"(1) To determine what statutes are nominally in force, and to obtain accurate copies of such statutes.

"(2) To eliminate, from the body of statutes nominally in force, those statutes and parts of statutes that actually are not in force, by reason of obsolescence, unconstitutionality, implied repeal.

"(3) To bring together, under a logical classification system, those statutes and parts of statutes which, because of similarity of subject matter, properly belong together, and, having done so, to eliminate those statutes that are found to be duplicated or repetitious.

"(4) To simplify and clarify the statutes that remain, by rejecting equivocal and ambiguous words, circuitous and tautological phraseology, and verbose and cumbersome stylizations, and by restating the statutes in clear and perspicuous common language, capable of being understood by every person of whatever avocation who can read with intelligent understanding the American English tongue.

"(5) To arrange the statutes relating to each subject in a logical sequence and according to a consistent plan.

"(6) To publish the statutes in the most convenient and usable form, with such aids to use in the form of numbering, cross reference, tables, indexes, and sub-indexes as will best facilitate the locating of the law on any subject."

2. Wisconsin has had a system of continuous topical revision and annotation as carried on by its Revisor of Statutes since 1910. Nine other states now have adopted this system.

When established in Wisconsin the plan was unique, and experience led to some minor amendments to the original act, to facilitate the work of the Revisor.

Experience in Wisconsin has proved that the work of a highly qualified and efficient Revisor of the Statutes results in:

1. Development of revision experts and a trained expert staff.
2. Continuity of work which leads to clearer, simpler, more compact and complete statutory law.
3. Reduction in bulk of existing statutes.
4. Removal of obsolete statutes.
5. Clarification of the result of judicial construction and application of statutory provisions.
6. Searching out of implied repeals and either rectifying them or making them express.
7. There is a growing practice among lawyers of calling the Revisor's attention to error, omissions, conflicts, and other defects in the statutes and suggesting how the law might be improved. The office has served as an effective clearing house between the lawyers and legislature.
8. Verbosity of statutory language has been reduced.
9. The function of the Revisor is to deal with details—not fundamentals. State policies are for the legislature.
10. Every Wisconsin lawyer who keeps up-to-date on the law buys the volume known as Wisconsin Statutes. The biennial edition keeps the general statutes assembled, makes one body of those laws and reduces the probability of the legislature, enacting duplications or legislating on any subject without knowing of existing statutes.

STATE ex rel. BERGIN v. WASHBURN

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1947. — Minn. —, 28 N.W 2d 652.

JULIUS J. OLSON, JUSTICE. The court commissioner of Hennepin county died May 14, 1947, thereby creating a vacancy in that office. On May 19, the judges of the district court of that county appointed respondent, Betty W. Washburn, to fill the vacancy. On May 20, the board of county commissioners appointed relator, Tom Bergin. Each appointee promptly qualified by filing with the register of deeds the official bond and oath of office, and each claims to be entitled to fill the vacancy. Therefore, the question is which body had the authority to make the appointment.

Relator claims that L.1913, c. 458, as amended by L.1915, c. 168, Minn.St.1941, §§ 382.01 and 382.02, is controlling, while respondent asserts that M.S.A. 1945 § 489.05, is determinative. That section reads:

"When a vacancy occurs in the office of court commissioner, the judge of the district court of the county shall appoint some competent person to fill such vacancy, who shall give the bond and take the oath by law required, and shall hold his office until the next general election, and until his successor qualifies."

The 1913 act was by its title and terms one "to fix the terms of certain county officers." The offices of clerk of court and court commissioner were not included. The term of office of each of the enumerated officers was to be for four years after the election of 1914, "and said offices shall be filled by election every four years thereafter." Inconsistent acts were repealed. The 1915 act was by its title and context "An Act to amend Chapter 458 General Laws of Minnesota for 1913, entitled 'An Act to fix the terms of certain county officers.'" Section 1 provided that at the general election to be held that year all present county officers, including "clerk of the district court" and "court commissioner," should be elected that year. The names of the officers italicized were added by the amendment. Section 2 provided that present officials were to hold their offices until 1919 and that their official terms of office "shall be four (4) years and until their successors are elected and qualified, and shall begin on the first Monday in January next succeeding said election, and said offices shall be filled by election every four (4) years thereafter." Section 3 gave to the county board power to fill vacancies, and "Any person now holding any one of the said offices, whether by election or appointment, shall continue in such office until the first Monday in January A. D. 1919, and any appointment made to fill a vacancy in any of the said offices shall be for the balance of such entire term. All appointments under the provisions of this act, shall be made by the county board." (Italics in act.) By § 4, inconsistent acts were repealed. Minn.St.1941, § 382.01, provided that the county officers included in the 1915 act, including the court commissioner, should be elected at the general election in 1918; that their respective terms of office were to begin on the first Monday in January next succeeding their election; and that the "offices shall be filled by election every four years thereafter." Section 382.02 gave to the county board authority to fill vacancies by appointment. "Any appointment made to fill a vacancy in any of the offices named in section 382.01 shall be for the balance of such entire term, and be made by the county board." Finally, the legislature in 1945 reenacted these sections, but omitted the clerk of the district court and the court commissioner from the other county officers, so that the power of the county board to fill vacancies was limited to such other officers. These are the sections that have brought the present controversy before us.

It will be noted that the latest enactment in 1945 contains not a word about appointment to fill the vacancy in the office of court commissioner. In fact, the court commissioner is not even mentioned, nor is the clerk of the district court. The only provision as to such appointment is § 489.05, heretofore quoted, which respondent claims fully and unqualifiedly sustains her contention. Also to be noted is the fact that when M.S.A.1945 was adopted the legislature changed of 1945 are to be given effect. When the legislature reached § 489.05, Minn.St.1941, § 382.01, so as to eliminate therefrom the offices of clerk of the district court and court commissioner. As to these offices, the county board no longer has authority to fill vacancies if the statutes of 1945 are to be given effect. When the legislature reached § 489.05, it included and reenacted the previous law without change.

1. As in Wenger v. Wenger, 200 Minn. 436, 274 N.W. 517, relator's position is that a revision of an existing statute is presumed not to change its meaning, even if there be alterations in the phraseology, unless such intention to change the law clearly appears from the language of the revised statute. We recognized that rule in the Wenger case. However we there concluded that the intention to change clearly appeared, and in so doing we quoted from In re Estate of Cravens, 177 Minn. 437, 440, 225 N.W. 398, 399, as follows:

2. "In re-enacting a statute, intention to change meaning may as clearly appear from the omission of old as by adding new language."

This seems particularly apropos here, since the 1913 law had for its purpose the increase of the length of term of certain named county officers from two to four years. As amended in 1915, the act was made applicable also to the clerk of the district court and the court commissioner. The power to appoint officers to these positions was given to the county board, but it will be observed that such "appointments [were to be] under the provisions of this act," and no more. So the obvious purpose remained as it was, i. e., to fix terms of office at four years as to all named county offices in respect to elections to be later held. Both acts related to elections so as to make the four-year term applicable to all the offices listed in these acts.

Relator cites and relies upon State ex rel. Evans v. Borgen, 189 Minn. 216, 248 N.W. 744, 249 N.W. 183, claiming that it "is controlling and decisive of the issue herein." That case was a proceeding in mandamus to compel respondents, the county auditor and the canvassing board of St. Louis county, to canvass certain sticker votes alleged to have been cast for relator at the 1932 election for the office of sheriff of that county and to declare him elected to that office. The trial court, on respondents' motion to quash the writ on the ground that the facts alleged did not state a cause of action, granted the motion, and the appeal to this court followed. In disposing of the case here, we quoted L.1913, c. 458, in full, and concluded (189 Minn. at page 218, 248 N.W. at page 745):

"It is too clear for argument that by the last clause of section 2 the only general elections at which votes can be lawfully cast for any of the county officers named in section 1 are those occurring at each four-year interval counting from the general election in November, 1914."

That was the reason for our holding (189 Minn. at page 222, 248 N.W. at page 746):

" . . . There was no vacancy in the sheriff's office of St. Louis county to be filled at the November, 1932, general election, and at that election no votes for that office could be cast lawfully, hence defendants rightly refused to canvass the sticker votes wrongfully cast."

3. There can be no doubt that the question before us lies wholly in the legislative field. What the legislature has authority to enact it obviously has like authority to amend or even to repeal. The facts have been recited. M.S.A. §§ 382.01 and 382.02, omits and eliminates the office of court commissioner. Section 489.05 was reenacted in 1945 when our revised statutes were adopted. See, "An Act providing that the compilation and revision of general statutes of the state of Minnesota of a general and permanent nature," etc., approved March 8, 1945, quoted in Preface to M.S.A.1945, p. 5. Section 1, subd. 1, of the act provides:

4. "The compilation and revision of general statutes of the state of Minnesota of a general and permanent nature, prepared by the revisor of statutes under the provisions of Laws 1943, Chapter 545, and filed in the office of the secretary of state on December 28, 1944, is hereby adopted and enacted as the 'Minnesota Revised Statutes.'"

Thus, the change is one of legislative sanction and action. The statute thus "adopted and enacted as the 'Minnesota Revised Statutes'" (italics supplied) must be given effect as "the latest expression of the legislative will."¹

5. The change is a part of the legislative process. We may only apply the law as the legislature has enacted it, and we are only giving effect to the change as the language chosen and used by the legislature made the change. The language is clear and unambiguous, and, as such, there is no room for construction or interpretation. 2 Dunnell, Dig. & Supp. § 1817, and cases there cited. Our latest case is that of Pierce v. Grand Army of the Republic, — Minn. —, 28 N.W. 2d 637.

¹ State ex rel. Mergens v. Babcock, 175 Minn. 583, 585, 222 N.W. 285, 286. Cf. 6 Dunnell, Dig. & Supp. § 8927, and cases under notes 20 and 21; M.S.A. § 645.39.

We are of the opinion, and so hold, that respondent is the duly appointed court commissioner of Hennepin county.

Writ discharged.

THOMAS GALLAGHER, J., took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

NOTES

1. The Preface to Wisconsin Statutes 1939, at p. 6, reads:

"A major rule of interpretation of revision acts is the reverse of the corresponding rule for construing other legislative acts. The general rule . . . is that every legislative act intends some change in the law. . . . The rule (in revision acts) is to the contrary. As to acts which revise or restate the law there is the presumption that no change in substance was intended unless the change in language clearly indicates an intent to change the substance". (See Becklin v. Becklin, 99 Minn. 307, 109 N.W. 243 (1906) in accord, and cf. Platt Institute v. City of New York, 183 N.Y. 151, 75 N.E. 1119 (1905).)

This paragraph of the Preface was changed in Wis.Stat.1941, and since then has read, in part, as follows:

"Bill No. 255, S., which became chapter 298, laws 1941, created 370.01 (49) of the statutes. Subsection (49) and the note which was appended to the bill read:

"(370.01) (49) Construction of Revised Statutes. A revised statute is to be understood in the same sense as the original unless the change in language indicates a different meaning so clearly as to preclude judicial construction. And where the revision bill contains a note which says that the meaning of the statute to which the note relates is not changed by the revision, the note is indicative of the legislative intent.

"Note: The first sentence of subsection (49) embodies a rule of construction which the supreme court has repeatedly applied, . . .

"The second sentence of subsection (49) give statutory effect to a revisor's note printed in a revision bill. The chief purpose of the system of continuous revision is to remove conflicts and duplications, to free the language of the statutes from redundancy, tautology and verbosity and to delete obsolete and expired provisions and those declared invalid by the court. In short, the purpose is to keep the language of the statutes up to date and as compacted and simple as possible. The recognition proposed to be given to revisor's notes will tend to give the revisor a greater freedom in drafting revision bills and give the legislature a greater assurance as to the effect of such bills."

The New York Law Revision Commission sponsored a bill in the 1947 session of the New York Legislature providing that when a statute is stated to be intended merely to correct or improve the form of the statutes affected by it, it will neither make any change in the legal effect or application of any statute nor affect the operation of any legislative act which is intended to accomplish a change in the law. In the event of conflict between a revision act and any legislation enacted at the same session and intended to make substantive change in the law, the revising act would be deemed repealed by implication. 1947 N.Y.Leg.Doc.No.65(N):

2. Minn.Stat.1945, § 645.05 reads: "The provisions of Revised Laws 1905, so far as they are the same as those existing on March 1, 1906, shall be construed as continuations thereof, and not as new enactments; and references in statutes not repealed to provisions of law which are revised and reenacted therein shall be construed as applying to such provisions as so incorporated in the Revised Laws."

3. Does a revised law differ in effect from an amendment "so as to read as follows"?

MURRELL v. WESTERN UNION TEL. CO.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1947. 160 F.2d 787.

SIBLEY, CIRCUIT JUDGE. Appellant Murrell sued appellee in a federal district court for $1,000, alleging that his action arose under the Act of Congress of June 19, 1934, Sect. 601, 48 Stats. 1101, 47 U.S.C.A. § 601,¹ and Title 47 U.S.C.A. § 8; and that appellee, having as a telegraph company filed its acceptance of the provisions of Sections 1 to 6 and Section 8 of Title 47 of the Code had failed and neglected to speedily and promptly transmit three telegraphic communications after having agreed with appellant for a consideration to do so. The complaint was dismissed on motion because "the penalty created by 47 U.S.C.A. § 8, is for the benefit of, and can be recovered only by the United States; it is not available to an individual." This appeal followed.

Appellant contends that the plain language of section 8 supports his suit; that the preceding section 7 expressly mentions telegrams sent "for the Government and for the general public" ; and that the penalty authorized by section 8 to be sued for in the district court, no plaintiff being specified, is to be understood as recoverable by himself as the party injured and concerned under principles set forth in 25 C.J., Fines, Forfeitures and Penalties, § 98. Appellee contends that the history of the legislation shows that only failure to transmit the telegraphic communications presented by the public functionaries named in it were penalized, and that the United States alone may sue.

The United States Code was not enacted as a statute, nor can it be construed as such. It is only a prima facie statement of the statute law. The statutes collected in it did not change their meaning nor acquire any new force by their inclusion. If construction is necessary, recourse must be had to the original statutes themselves. Section 2(a) of the Act of June 30, 1926, 44 Stats. Part 1, page 1.

Section 7 of Title 47 is derived from an appropriation Act which referred to railroad companies which have telegraph lines, and authorized them to transmit telegrams for the Government and for the general public on accepting the restrictions and obligations which by previous legislation had been prescribed for telegraph companies who desired to use the public domain for their wires. It did not amend or change the obligations of telegraph companies. Act of June 23, 1879, 21 Stats. p. 31.

The telegraph companies were first allowed to use the public domain, including post roads, by the Act of July 24, 1866, 14 Stats. 221. The principal obligation then imposed was to transmit certain messages for the United States at such rates as the Postmaster General should annually fix and to give them priority over other business.

No penalties were provided for failure, except nonpayment for services.² The Joint Resolution of February 9, 1870, 16 Stats. p. 369, authorized the Secretary of War to transmit meteorological messages by telegraph. Then the Act of June 10, 1872, 17 Stats. 367, provided as to telegraph companies accepting the benefits of the Act of 1866, "If such company, its agents, or employees shall hereafter refuse or neglect to transmit any such telegraphic communications as are provided for by the aforesaid act or by the joint resolution approved February nine, eighteen hundred and seventy . . . (it) shall forfeit and pay to the United States not less than one hundred and not exceeding one thousand dollars for each refusal or neglect aforesaid, to be recovered by an action or actions at law, in any district court of the United States." The intent is here clear to bring within the penalty provision only the failure to transmit the specified government telegraphic communications, and to make the penalty recoverable only by the United States.

This provision was carried into the Revised Statutes of 1873 as Section 5269, reading thus: "Whenever any telegraph company, after having filed its written acceptance with the Postmaster General of the restrictions and obligations required by the Act approved July twenty-fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' or by this Title, shall, by its agents or employes, refuse or neglect to transmit any such telegraphic communications as are provided for by the aforesaid act, or by this Title or by the provisions of section two hundred and twenty-one, Title 'The Department of War,' authorizing the Secretary of War to provide for taking meteorological observations at the military stations and other points of the interior of the continent, and for giving notice on the northern lakes and the sea-board of the approach and force of storms, such telegraph company shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one hundred dollars and not more than one thousand dollars for each such refusal or neglect." The Revised Statutes constituted a new statute, and if inconsistent with the older statutes which are incorporated therein, the Revised Statutes control. Revised Statutes, Sect. 5596. But there is no inconsistency here. Although express mention of the United States as the beneficiary of the penalties is dropped, the failures to transmit that are penalized are still carefully restricted to the public messages mentioned in the Act of 1872, being those provided in the Act of 1866 and the Joint Resolution of 1870. "This Title," to wit Title LXV of the Revised Statutes, is for present purposes identical with the Act of 1866, embodying and superseding it; and Section 221 of the Title "Secretary of War" covers the same messages as were dealt with in the Joint Resolution of 1870. Thus all the messages protected by the penalties continued to be only the messages of the United States, and not the messages of private individuals. By necessary inference the United States would be the party to sue. The mention of the court in which suit should be brought was restored by the Act of Feb. 27, 1877, 19 Stats. p. 252.

The matter so stood until the United States Code was promulgated. Its compressed language cannot be held to have enlarged these penalties or changed their beneficiary as is here contended.

Judgment affirmed.

SECTION 6. SPECIAL LEGISLATION

WILLIAM ANDERSON, SPECIAL LEGISLATION IN MINNESOTA

7 Minn.L.Rev. 133, (1922).

1. The Constitutional Amendment.—Special legislation was a well known evil in state legislative practice long before the Civil War. It was an abuse from which the people of Minnesota did not escape. Under the organic act of the territory there was, unfortunately, no restriction of any kind upon the passage of special acts by the legislative assembly. Mr. Sibley, who sat for one session in that body, later said that:

"In that session I saw enough to determine me that if ever I had anything to do with the formation of the constitution of a new state, I would place it beyond the power of the legislature to pave the whole country as ours has already done with charters conferring special privileges. . . . It is doubly our duty to tie up the legislature from the power of imposing upon the people of our future state, these charter privileges which have been the curse and bane of all the states."

The question of what could be done to put an end to this abuse was fully debated in the Democratic wing of the Minnesota constitutional convention of 1857, and received some attention also in the Republican wing. In both it was agreed that the special incorporation of private companies should be forbidden. The Democratic group went even farther. During the debate upon the proposal that "No corporations shall be formed under special acts except for municipal purposes," an amendment was carried to strike out the last four words. In the Republican wing a provision was adopted which retained the exception authorizing special acts for incorporating municipalities. The compromise committee which drew up the constitution upon which both conventions and the people finally agreed, accepted the Democratic provision but restored the words "except for municipal purposes." This was, in brief, the origin of section 2 of article 10 of the Minnesota constitution which, though superseded in fact, is still printed as part of the constitution and was for many years the only important prohibition against special legislation in this state.

As a limitation upon the powers of the legislature, the provision mentioned above was strictly construed. It prohibited the special incorporation of non-municipal corporations and nothing more. In fact, it was a prohibition which prohibited almost nothing. Special legislation increased with almost every session and became finally so great an inconvenience to all concerned that in 1881 Governor John S. Pillsbury strongly recommended to the legislature that it propose an amendment to the constitution to curb the evil if not to end it. The legislature acceded to his request, and at the election that year the voters adopted an amendment which added sections 33 and 34 to article 4 of the state constitution. This amendment was far from being an all-inclusive prohibition. It simply forbade "special or private" laws upon eleven stated subjects, seven of which related to questions of local government, and four of which concerned questions more strictly private. General laws upon these subjects were expressly sanctioned, but such general laws were to be "uniform in their operation throughout the state." In the entire amendment there was nothing to prevent special legislation for cities, nor to prevent the amendment of any previous special act whatever. For these and other reasons this prohibition proved entirely unsatisfactory. Special legislation, while changing somewhat in character, actually increased in quantity. Legislators apparently found themselves unable to resist the demands put upon them, and came to desire some more efficacious measure of relief. The result was the proposal by the legislature of 1891 and the adoption by the voters in 1892 of the present section 33 of article 4 of the constitution. It is one of the most sweeping prohibitions of its kind to be found among the constitutions of the forty-eight states. Section 34 was not changed in 1892. For convenience of reference, both sections are printed herewith.

Practically all of the state constitutions now prohibit special legislation by one method or another, either entirely or as to certain specified matters. It is unfortunate, therefore, that there is no adequate up-to-date treatise on the subject. A complete discussion of special legislation even for the state of Minnesota alone would require a considerable space. Such a comprehensive examination of the subject will not be attempted here. The aim will be to analyze the decisions upon a few important points, and to pay particular attention to any rules laid down in this jurisdiction which seem to be in any sense unique or novel. . . .

III. The Sweeping Clause of the 1892 Amendment.—The 1892 amendment prohibiting special legislation improves upon the 1881 amendment in three important respects. (1) In addition to the specific prohibition of special laws in certain stated cases, the later amendment forbids the enactment of special laws "in all cases when a general law can be made applicable," and declares it to be a judicial question as to whether a general law could have been applicable in any case. This provision is the first sentence of the present section 33. It is herein called the "sweeping clause" and will be discussed in the following paragraphs. (2) It extends very materially the list of named subjects upon which the legislature "shall pass no local or special law." (3) It also adds the clause that "the legislature may repeal any existing special or local law but shall not amend, extend or modify any of the same." The intention very clearly was to close the door to all special legislation upon the subject stated and upon all similar subjects. As has been said above, the doctrine of ejusdem generis would require the limitation of the scope of the term "special law" in the first sentence to laws upon subjects closely allied to those named in the second sentence as to which special laws are absolutely forbidden. So construed, the sweeping clause is a sort of dragnet, not designed to catch everything, but only things, similar to those named, which might have been omitted through oversight. For example, it is very clear that the provision against special legislation was not intended to prohibit what is called "class legislation."

It is reasonable to presume that the members of the supreme court at the time of the adoption of the 1892 amendment understood quite as fully as any of their successors the meaning of the amendment and the intentions of its framers. Upon the first argument of the well-known Cooley case in 1893 the court made an explanation of the prohibition which has not been improved upon. The facts were that at an earlier date the legislature had created a board of court house and city hall commissioners in and for the county of Hennepin and the city of Minneapolis to construct a combined court house and city hall. Finding itself short of means needed to complete the work, this body procured the passage of an act of the legislature authorizing it by name to borrow additional funds. The county auditor refused to recognize the validity of this act, holding it to be contrary to the new prohibition against special legislation. Thus the litigation arose. Counsel for the commissioners admitted that the act was special, but made a strong point of the fact that the legislature had found it impossible to enact a general act applicable to the situation in Hennepin county. It was one of those cases where a general law could not be made applicable. This argument compelled the court to consider the sweeping clause of the amendment in its relation to other provisions of the section.

Judge Collins wrote for the court that the sweeping clause:

"Is entirely unlike anything that has previously appeared in the fundamental law. . . . It is sufficient to say that we regard it as independent of the sentence which follows, and that the specified prohibitions enumerated in the second sentence or clause are not subject to or modified by the first, which forbids the enactment of special laws where general laws can be made applicable.

The court recognized that the act in question covered a situation where a general law could not have been made applicable. "The situation was so peculiar that no law, it would seem, could have been framed which would have covered it, and still be a general law in any sense." Hence, if the sweeping clause had been the whole of the prohibition, the law would have been held valid even though special. But the argument of counsel for Cooley had stressed the fact that the act in question came under the express prohibition in the second sentence, which says that the legislature "shall pass no local or special law; regulating the affairs of . . . any county, city," etc. It could not be denied, the court said, that this act did fall under this prohibition, which was unqualified, and was entirely independent of the sweeping clause. Upon the assumption that the act was special, it followed that it was unconstitutional. It is the conclusion of the writer that, as far as it went, this interpretation of the amendment by the court was entirely sound. Though the court came to a different decision in the case upon reargument, it did not retract or modify any portion of what has been here set down.

The framers of section 33 seem to have considered the sweeping clause very important. They put it first in the amendment, and undoubtedly expected important results from it. Upon the first test given it in the courts, this clause was correctly interpreted as a separate and independent part of the prohibition. One would expect, therefore, to find in the decisions during the succeeding thirty years that the clause has been frequently applied to prevent the enforcement of special laws. In the ninety volumes of Minnesota reports from 1893 to date, one should find at least an occasional case in which the court, having determined that a certain special act does not violate one of the express prohibitions against special laws, would turn to consider the validity of the act under the sweeping clause, to determine, in other words, whether the subject is one to which the prohibition of the sweeping clause would apply, and whether a general law could have been applicable in the particular case. What is the surprise of the student, therefore, to find not a single discussion of this clause in any judicial decision from that day to this. The clause appears to be as dead as Caesar.

It is difficult to assign reasons for this neglect of the provision under discussion. To some extent, no doubt, it is due to the fact that the express prohibitions cover so much ground that very few cases arise which are not covered by one or another of them. Perhaps, also, there is misunderstanding as to the nature and significance of the clause. It may be considered either too vague to be concretely useful, or so broadly inclusive as to be dangerous. There is one assertion in a later case which seems to convey the idea that the court itself considers the clause of no effect. The statement is made that the prohibitions of section 33 of article 4 "are specific, not general, and are limited by the courts to the subjects particularly enumerated." The few authorities cited for this statement do not support it in any way, and since there was no argument of the point in the decision we are left without any reasonable explanation of what the court meant. It is impossible to harmonize the view expressed with the many cases in which examples of "class legislation" upon subjects in no wise mentioned in section 33 have been held to be violative of its provisions. If the court really intended to say that the sweeping clause adds nothing to the more specific prohibitions of section 33, it in effect declared that one portion of the constitution is mere waste of words. This would, of course, be contrary to established rules of constitutional construction, and directly opposed to the well reasoned views in the Cooley case. The decision in which the assertion was made will be dealt with in the next section.

"1. Self-Rule for District of Columbia

"Recommendation: That Congress divest itself of the duty of governing the District of Columbia and provide for a referendum on adoption of self-government by city charter.

"The Nation cannot afford the luxury of having its national legislative body and the District committees in both the House and Senate perform the duties of a city council for the District of Columbia.

"In order to relieve Congress of this extraneous work-load and enable it to devote full attention to natural legislation, we recommend that a plan for self-rule for the District of Columbia be provided as early as possible.

"We do not assume the responsibility of suggesting what plan should be adopted for handling the municipal affairs of the District, but we do recommend that steps be taken immediately to provide for establishing a commission of Washington residents to prepare a suitable city charter and that it be submitted by referendum to the citizens of the District for their approval or rejection.

"We recommend that Congress authorize this referendum as soon as a satisfactory self-government city charter is drafted and that on its adoption legislation be introduced to make it effective."

The Report of the Special Committee on the Organization of Congress accompanying S. 2177, dated May 31 (legislative day March 5) 1946, states at p. 1:

"The Special Committee on the Organization of Congress, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2177) to provide for increased efficiency in the legislative branch of the Government, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with amendments and recommend that the bill, as amended, do pass.

"The most important amendment made by the special committee was to eliminate from the bill Title VII—Self-Government for the District of Columbia. The Committee on the Judiciary has favorably reported a bill, S. 1942, to incorporate the Federal City Charter Commission. Title VII of S. 2177 and S. 1942 are similar measures, having the same objective of home rule for the District of Columbia. Attainment of this desirable objective will be expedited, we believe, by the enactment of S. 1942."

Accordingly, at p. 40 of this same report, it is said with regard to Title VII:

"This title, which provided for the preparation of a charter designed to provide a form of municipal government for the District of Columbia, and a referendum thereon of District residents, was stricken from the bill by the committee, for the reasons given in its general statement above."

WILLIAMS v. MAYOR AND CITY COUNCIL OF BALTIMORE

Supreme Court of the United States, 1933.
280 U.S. 36, 53 S.Ct. 431, 77 L.Ed. 1015.

MR. JUSTICE CARDOZO delivered the opinion of the Court.

The controversy in these cases hinges upon the validity of a statute of Maryland, adopted by the General Assembly in June, 1931, whereby the property of a particular railroad was made exempt from taxation. Acts of 1931, c. 497.

For an understanding of the merits there is need that the statute be quoted in full:

"An Act to exempt the railroad property of the Washington, Baltimore and Annapolis Electric Railroad Company, or so much thereof as may be used for railroad purposes by said company, its receiver, successors and assigns, from all State taxes and charges, including contributions to the cost of construction of railroad crossings made or to be made under the authority of the State Roads Commission, and from all county and city taxes and charges in the nature of a tax for the years during which the property is so used, but not exceeding two years beginning January 1, 1931.

"Whereas, The Washington, Baltimore and Annapolis Electric Railroad Company did not in the year 1930 earn its operating charges, and it is of the utmost importance for the welfare of the State and particularly the communities served by said railroad, that the operation of said railroad be continued, and

"Whereas, It is in the judgment of the General Assembly of Maryland a wise and sound public policy to encourage the continued operation of said railroad by the exemption herein provided:

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, That the railroad property of the Washington, Baltimore and Annapolis Electric Railroad Company, or so much thereof as may be used for railroad purposes by said company, its receiver, successors and assigns, be exempt from all State taxes and charges, including contributions to the cost of construction of railroad crossings made or to be made under the authority of the State Roads Commission, and from all county and city taxes and charges in the nature of a tax for the years during which the property is so used, but not exceeding two years beginning January 1, 1931.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That this Act shall take effect June 1, 1931."

At the passage of this act, the Washington, Baltimore & Annapolis Electric Railroad Company was in the hands of a receiver, appointed in January, 1931, by the Federal District Court. For ten years preceding the receivership the gross receipts from its business had progressively declined. In 1930 the total revenues derived from the operation of its line were $1,347,967.03, and the operating expenses $1,191,897.32. These expenses were exclusive of taxes and fixed charges, such as interest on its debts. There was a funded debt of more than nine million dollars and an unsecured debt of nearly a million. In 1930, 3,247,534 passengers had traveled on the road, which supplied the only rail service to Annapolis, the capital of the state. Large public interests were involved in keeping the service going.

The mayor and city council of Baltimore, and the mayor, counselor, and aldermen of the city of Annapolis, municipal corporations, challenged the validity of the exemption, and filed proofs of claim with the receiver for taxes overdue. The claim of the city of Baltimore was for real property taxes on the cars, and for franchise taxes or charges under a municipal ordinance. The claim of the city of Annapolis was for taxes on real property and for local taxes or charges owing for the franchise. The District Court upheld the validity of the statute, and disallowed the claims. Upon appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit the orders were reversed upon the ground that the statute was invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution and under several provisions of the Constitution of the state. 61 F.2d 374. Writs of certiorari were granted by this court. 287 U.S. 594, 53 S.Ct. 222, 77 L.Ed. 518. The writ in No. 513 brings up the claim filed with the receiver by the City of Baltimore; the writ in No. 514 brings up the claim of the City of Annapolis.

1. There is error in the holding of the Circuit Court of Appeals that the statute of Maryland creating this exemption is a denial to the respondents of the equal protection of the laws in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

A municipal corporation, created by a state for the better ordering of government, has no privileges or immunities under the Federal Constitution which it may invoke in opposition to the will of its creator. Trenton v. New Jersey, 262 U.S. 182, 43 S.Ct. 534, 67 L.Ed. 937, 29 A.L.R. 1471; City of Newark v. New Jersey, 262 U.S. 192, 43 S.Ct. 539, 67 L.Ed. 943; Worcester v. Worcester Consolidated Street Ry. Co., 196 U.S. 539, 25 S.Ct. 327, 49 L.Ed. 591; Pawhuska v. Pawhuska Oil Co., 250 U.S. 394, 39 S.Ct. 526, 63 L.Ed. 1054; Risty v. Chicago, R. I. & Pac. Ry. Co., 270 U.S. 378, 390, 46 S.Ct. 236, 70 L.Ed. 641; Railroad Commission v. Los Angeles R. R. Corporation, 280 U.S. 145, 156, 50 S.Ct. 71, 74 L.Ed. 234.

2. There is error in the holding of the Circuit Court of Appeals that the statute is invalid under the Constitution of Maryland.

Several provisions of that Constitution are invoked by the respondents. They will be considered in succession.

(a) The statute is not repugnant to article 15 of the Maryland Declaration of Rights, wherein it is provided: "That the levying of taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive and ought to be prohibited; that paupers ought not to be assessed for the support of the Government; that the General Assembly shall, by uniform rules, provide for separate assessment of land and classification and subclassifications of improvements on land and personal property, as it may deem proper; and all taxes thereafter provided to be levied by the State for the support of the general State Government, and by the counties and by the City of Baltimore for their respective purposes, shall be uniform as to land within the taxing district, and uniform within the class or sub-class of improvements on land and personal property which the respective taxing powers may have directed to be subjected to the tax levy; yet fines, duties or taxes may properly and justly be imposed, or laid with a political view for the good government and benefit of the community."

The courts of Maryland hold that the rule of uniformity established by these provisions does not forbid the creation of reasonable exemptions in furtherance of the public good. [Citing cases.] It does not even prohibit an exemption in favor of an individual as distinguished from one for the benefit of the members of a class. All that it exacts in respect of the narrower exemption is the presence of a relation, fairly discernible, between the good of the individual and the good of the community. There must be something more than an arbitrary preference of one among many. Baltimore City v. Starr Church, 106 Md. 281, 287, 288, 67 A. 261.

Furtherance of the public good is written over the face of this statute from beginning to end as its animating motive. "It is of the utmost importance for the welfare of the State and particularly the communities served by said railroad, that the operation of said railroad be continued." "It is in the judgment of the General Assembly" that "to encourage the continued operation" of the road by the grant of an exemption will be to give heed to the promptings of "a wise and sound public policy." The exemption is to be confined to that part of the property of the company, which is used for railroad purposes, is to continue only so long as the property is so used, and is to expire in any event at the end of the two years beginning in January, 1931. It is not the function of a court to determine whether the public policy that finds expression in legislation of this order is well or ill conceived. Otis v. Parker, 187 U.S. 606, 609, 23 S.Ct. 168, 47 L.Ed. 323; Missouri, Kansas & Texas Ry. Co. v. May, 194 U.S. 267, 24 S.Ct. 638, 48 L.Ed. 971; Sproles v. Binford, 286 U.S. 374, 388, 389, 52 S.Ct. 581, 76 L.Ed.

1167. The judicial function is exhausted with the discovery that the relation between means and end is not wholly vain and fanciful, an illusory pretense. Within the field where men of reason may reasonably differ, the Legislature must have its way. Otis v. Parker, supra. Nor in marking out that field will a court be forgetful of presumptions that help to fix the boundaries. "As underlying questions of fact may condition the constitutionality of legislation of this character, the presumption of constitutionality must prevail in the absence of some factual foundation of record for overthrowing the statute." O'Gorman & Young v. Hartford Fire Insurance Co., 282 U.S. 251, 257, 51 S.Ct. 130, 132, 75 L.Ed. 324. There has been no departure from that principle in the judgments of the highest court of Maryland. Wampler v. LeCompte, 159 Md. 222, 150 A. 455; Id., 282 U.S. 172, 175, 51 S.Ct. 92, 75 L.Ed. 276.

We are told that the signs of an arbitrary preference are written on the statute because the exemption is confined to this particular insolvent when it might have been extended to all other insolvents engaged in a like business. There is nothing to show that any Maryland railroad other than this one was in the hands of a receiver. The assailants of the statute have the burden of proving everything essential to their case. Pullman Co. v. Knott, 235 U.S. 23, 25, 35 S.Ct. 2, 59 L.Ed. 105; Wampler v. LeCompte, supra. But the result will be no different if other insolvents be assumed. The public policy that made it wise in the judgment of the Legislature to help this particular railroad and keep its business going may have failed altogether in respect of any other railroad, solvent or insolvent. Here was a line carrying millions of passengers, and supplying the only railroad service between the capital of the state and its most populous city. The rescue of such a road might be dictated by the public interest when a road in some other territory might wisely be abandoned to its fate.

We are told that the statute is not to be distinguished in principle from the one considered by the highest court of Maryland in the case of the Starr Church, and there condemned as arbitrary. City of Baltimore v. Starr Church, 106 Md. 281, 67 A. 261. But we think the distinctions are many and obvious. A religious corporation, the Starr Church, had received a gift of wharf property which it leased for profit. The General Assembly passed an act exempting the wharf from taxes so long as it continued in the ownership of the church. The exemption for other churches was confined to a place of worship and a parsonage. The statute did not say that the new exemption was designed to promote the comfort or well-being of the community at large. For all that appeared no such interests were involved. The statute said no more than this, that the exemption would be "a great relief and benefit to said religious body," which was singled out for privileges denied to any other. This preference for one, with no profession of a purpose to advance the common weal and with nothing in the situation to indicate that such a purpose would be served, is the evil that the court denounced.

We are told that the many cases upholding an exemption to a railroad at the time of its formation have no bearing upon this exemption which was granted later on. A charter, so it is argued is a contract, or becomes one when accepted. There is thus a quid pro quo. A privilege conferred thereafter is nothing more than a gratuity, and hence an arbitrary preference irrespective of its motive. But this is to misread the cases and misconceive the rationale back of them. The charter exemption to a railroad does not gain validity from the circumstance that a charter is a contract. If the exemption is a valid one, the contract may mean that there will be no power of revocation, though exemptions not contractual are terminable at will. Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. (U. S.) 133, 11 L.Ed. 529. Even this difference will be absent if there is a reservation by the state of the power to repeal or change. Northern Central Ry. Co. v. Maryland, 187 U.S. 258, 23 S.Ct. 62, 47 L.Ed. 167, affirming State of Maryland v. Northern Central Ry. Co., 90 Md. 447, 45 A. 465. Revocable or irrevocable, the contract will not give validity to what would otherwise be void. Stearns v. Minnesota, 179 U.S. 223, 254, 21 S.Ct. 73, 45 L.Ed. 162; Duluth & I. R. R. Co. v. St. Louis County, 179 U.S. 302, 21 S.Ct. 124, 45 L.Ed. 201; and cf. Hudson County Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U.S. 349, 357, 28 S.Ct. 529, 52 L.Ed. 828, 14 Ann.Cas. 560; Union Dry Goods Co. v. Georgia Public Service Corporation, 248 U.S. 372, 375, 376, 39 S.Ct. 117, 63 L.Ed. 309, 9 A.L.R. 1420. To see that this is so we have only to inquire what the consequence would be if a charter exemption were to be given to a mere private corporation, conducted for profit solely like any other business enterprise. Charter or no charter, the exemption would not stand. City of Baltimore v. Starr Church, supra.

The policy that sustains an exemption in order to keep a crippled railroad going is precisely the same as the one that sustains an exemption to set it going at the start. In the one case as in the other, the state maintains the highways upon which its people are dependent for their economic and social life. Cole v. La Grange, 113 U.S. 1, 7, 5 S.Ct. 416, 28 L.Ed. 896. It is idle to say that a railroad, when once it has been organized, is under a duty to go on, and hence that its distress is not important for any one except itself. Science has wrought her wonders, but the time is not yet here when trains will run under the impulsion of duty without more. There is room, indeed, for question whether even the duty is so absolute as the respondents' argument assumes. Railroad Commission v. Eastern Texas R. R. Co., 264 U.S. 79, 85, 44 S.Ct. 247, 68 L.Ed. 569. Certain it is, in any event, that operation may end with the consent of the public service commission when the earnings are inadequate. Code of Public General Laws of Maryland (Bagby's Ed.) 1929 supplement, art. 23, § 380; Benson v. Public Service Commission, 141 Md. 398, 118 A. 852. Nor is there need to show a probability of utter cessation or abandonment. Service is likely to be inefficient and even dangerous if operation is continued in the face of an increasing deficit. The state has an interest in seeing to it that railroads shall be run, but an interest also in how they shall be run. The General Assembly, weighing these and other considerations, has found them adequate to justify a temporary exemption from the burdens of taxation. Nothing in the Constitution of Maryland or in the decisions of her courts enables us to say that there has been clear abuse of power. We may not nullify for doubt alone. There must be something near to certainty. We do not reach it here.

(b) The statute is not repugnant to article 3, § 33, of the Maryland Constitution, wherein it is said that "the General Assembly shall pass no special law for any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law."

The highest court of Maryland has considered this provision, and defined its meaning and effect. The Police Pension Cases, 131 Md. 315, 101 A. 786; City of Baltimore v. United Railways & Electric Co., 126 Md. 39, 94 A. 378; City of Baltimore v. Starr Church, supra; Littleton v. City of Hagerstown, 150 Md. 163, 132 A. 773; O'Brian Co. v. County Commissioners of Baltimore County, 51 Md. 15; Hodges v. Baltimore Union Pass Ry. Co., 58 Md. 603. There has been need, now and again, to develop close distinctions. Our endeavor in what follows is to extract the essence of the decisions and to give effect to it as law.

Time with its tides brings new conditions which must be cared for by new laws. Sometimes the new conditions affect the members of a class. If so, the correcting statute must apply to all alike. Sometimes the new conditions affect one only or a few. If so, the correcting statute may be as narrow as the mischief. The Constitution does not prohibit special laws inflexibly and always. It permits them when there are special evils with which existing general laws are incompetent to cope. The special public purpose will then sustain the special form. City of Baltimore v. United Railways Co., supra. The problem in last analysis is one of legislative policy, with a wide margin of discretion conceded to the lawmakers. Only in cases of plain abuse will there be revision by the courts. City of Baltimore v. United Railways Co., supra, at page 52 of 126 Md., 94 A. 378. If the evil to be corrected can be seen to be merely fanciful, the injustice or the wrong illusory, the courts may intervene and strike the special statute down. City of Baltimore v. Starr Church, supra. If special circumstances have developed, and circumstances of such a nature as to call for a new rule, the special act will stand. The Police Pension Cases, supra.

The distinction is neatly pointed by comparing two decisions. In City of Baltimore v. Starr Church, supra, the court condemned a special act as a merely arbitrary departure from the rule of uniform taxation. Declaration of Rights, art. 15. It held at the same time that the act was void under another section of the Constitution (article 3, § 33) because no evil had arisen, no circumstances had developed, to give even colorable grounds of reason for the adoption of a special rule. The Police Pension Cases, supra, show the picture from a different angle. There were general laws upon the statute books providing for the grant of pensions to members of the police force, not including matrons. A matron was dismissed for physical disability after many years of service. The Legislature, impressed by the hardship of her position, passed a special act for her relief. The court took the view that here was a special case not provided for or considered in an existing general law, and so upheld what had been done. See, also, O'Brian & Co. v. County Commissioners of Baltimore County; Hodges v. Baltimore Union Pass Ry. Co., applying a like rule.

(c) The statute is not repugnant to article 11A, the home rule article, of the Maryland Constitution: "Sec. 4. From and after the adoption of a charter under the provisions of this Article by the City of Baltimore or any County of this State, no public local law shall be enacted by the General Assembly for said City or County on any subject covered by express powers granted as above provided. Any law so drawn as to apply to two or more of the geographical subdivisions of this State shall not be deemed a Local Law, within the meaning of this Act. The term 'geographical sub-division' herein used shall be taken to mean the City of Baltimore or any of the Counties of this State."

The act of exemption is so drawn as to apply to two or more geographical subdivisions of the state, i. e., to Baltimore and Annapolis. It is thus within the powers expressly reserved to the General Assembly. . . .

They were plainly so intended.

4. We have assumed, without deciding, that the respondents, though without standing to invoke the protection of the Federal Constitution, will be heard to complain of a violation of the Constitution of the state.

Their standing for that purpose, at least in the state courts, is a question of state practice (Columbus & Greenville Ry. Co. v. Miller, 283 U.S. 96, 99, 51 S.Ct. 392, 75 L.Ed. 861; Braxton County Court v. W. Va., 208 U.S. 192, 197, 198, 28 S.Ct. 275, 52 L.Ed. 450; Stewart v. Kansas City, 239 U.S. 14, 16, 36 S.Ct. 15, 60 L.Ed. 120), as to which the federal courts do not exercise an independent judgment.

The Maryland decisions proceed on the assumption that municipal corporations assailing a statute of exemption or other special legislation have an interest in the controversy which entitles them to be heard (City of Baltimore v. Starr Church, supra; City of Baltimore v. Allegany County Com'rs, 99 Md. 1, 57 A. 632), though the reports do not show that their interest was questioned.

In the absence of any argument to the contrary in behalf of the petitioner, we make the same assumption here.

The judgments are reversed.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION OF SEATTLE
v. PARISH

Supreme Court of Washington, 1916.

MAIN, J. This is an action brought for the purpose of restraining the county assessor of King county from listing for taxation certain real property. The trial resulted in a judgment dismissing the action. From this judgment, the plaintiff appeals.

The appellant, at the time the action was instituted, was the owner of lots 2 and 3 and the east half of lots 6 and 7, in block 21, of Boren's addition to the city of Seattle. This property fronted on the west side of Fourth avenue, in the city of Seattle, and extended from Madison street to Marion street. The appellant had for some years owned lots 2 and 3, and had erected thereon a six-story brick and concrete building, which is known as the Y.M.C.A. building. After this building had been erected, the association acquired two adjacent half lots on the south, facing Fourth avenue, and extending from the main building to Marion street. This latter property was, when acquired, and still is, improved by the east half of the former Stander hotel, a six-story brick and stone structure. Since its purchase by the association, it has been connected with the main building as an annex thereof, and is permanently partitioned off from the unacquired part of the Stander hotel. The entire property thus owned by the association is used for the various activities and departments of the Young Men's Christian Association.

The objects of the association, as set forth in its articles of incorporation, are: "The improvement of the spiritual, mental, social, and physical condition of the young men of Seattle by the support and maintenance of lectures, gospel services, libraries, reading rooms, gymnasium, recreation grounds, etc."

The county assessor of King county was asserting the right to list this property for purposes of taxation upon the tax rolls for the year 1913, when the present action was brought for the purpose of restraining such listing.

The controlling question in the case is whether the statute under which it is claimed the property is exempt from taxation is constitutional or unconstitutional. The statute, Rem. & Bal. Code, Sec. 9098, as amended by chapter 117 of Laws of 1913, p. 351, relating to taxation, after exempting certain other specified property, provides:

"Also all property of Young Men's Christian Associations . . . which shall be wholly used, or to the extent solely used, for the religious purposes of such association." 3 Rem. & Bal. Code, Sec. 9098.

It will be noted that this is an exemption to the association by name, with a limitation that only such of its property as is "wholly used," or to the extent "solely used" for the religious purposes of such association, shall be exempt.

Section 2 of article 7, of the state constitution, after requiring that the legislature shall provide by law a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation upon all property in the state and prescribe such regulations by general law as shall secure a just valuation for the taxation of all the property, provides:

"That the property of the United States, and of the state, counties, school districts, and other municipal corporations, and such other property as the legislature may by general laws provide, shall be exempt from taxation."

Under this section of the constitution, all property within the state is subject to taxation, unless it falls within one of the classes mentioned in the constitution and is exempted therefrom by a general law. The question then arises,—Is the statute by which the property of Young Men's Christian Associations is claimed to be exempt a general or a special law? If it is a special law, obviously the attempted exemption is invalid under the constitutional provision quoted. If it is a general law, then it conforms to the constitutional requirement.

The authorities are in substantial harmony upon the rule by which a law is to be tested to determine whether it is general or special. A special law is one which relates to particular persons or things, while a general law is one which applies to all persons or things of a class. A law is general when it operates upon all persons or things constituting a class, even though such class consists of but one person or thing; but the law must be so framed that all persons or things constituting the class come within its provisions. 4 Words & Phrases (2d series), p. 635; Budd v. Hancock, 66 N.J.L. 133, 48 A. 1023; State ex rel. Attorney General v. Miller, 100 Mo. 439, 13 S.W. 677; Sutherland, Statutory Construction, Section 121.

In 4 Words & Phrases (2d series), p. 635, the rule is stated: A special law is one that relates to particular, as distinguished from a general law, which applies to all persons or things of a class.

The rule is stated in Budd v. Hancock, supra, as follows:

"A law is special in a constitutional sense when, by force of an inherent limitation, it arbitrarily separates some persons, places or things from others upon which, but for such limitation, it would operate. The test of a special law is the appropriateness of its provisions to the objects that it excludes. It is not, therefore, what a law includes that makes it special, but what it excludes. If nothing be excluded that should be contained the law is general. Within this distinction between a special and a general law the question in every case is whether any appropriate object is excluded to which law, but for its limitations, would apply. If the only limitation contained in a law is a legitimate classification of its objects it is a general law. Hence, if the object of a law have characteristics so distinct as reasonably to form, for the purpose legislated upon, a class by itself, the law is general, notwithstanding it operates upon a single object only; for a law is not general because it operates upon every person in the state, but because every person that can be brought within its predicament becomes subject to its operation."

Many other authorities could be cited supporting the rule; but as the controversy upon this phase of the case is over the application of the law, rather than its statement, further citation in support of the rule seems unnecessary.

In applying the rule, this court in Denver v. Spokane Falls, 7 Wash. 226, 34 P. 926, held that an act of the legislature which attempted to confer upon certain municipal corporations which had previously undertaken to incorporate under an invalid law the right to incorporate under the statute without reference to the population, but solely by reason of their peculiar condition, was a special and not a general law. It was there said:

"As to such communities, is this a general or a special law? It is claimed by the learned counsel for the appellants that it is general, because it applies to all communities in the state similarly situated. But we think that cannot be said to be the exclusive test. If the operation and effect of a statute is necessarily limited to a particular class or number of persons or things, it is as much a special statute, whatever may be its form, as it would be if it applied to but one person or thing only."

In Terry v. King County, 43 Wash. 61, 86 P. 210, the court had under consideration a statute which specifically conferred upon King, Pierce, and Spokane, power to contract indebtedness for the purpose of purchasing armory sites and assisting in the construction of armories. No other counties or towns in the state were mentioned in the act. Nor was it possible for any other county, even though its population should equal that of the counties named, to come within its provisions. It was there held that the law was special and not general, citing the previous case of Denver v. Spokane Falls supra.

Applying the rule of law stated and its application as appears in the two cases last cited, to the facts in the present case, Was the statute exempting the Young Men's Christian Association general or special? The exemption covers the property of such associations wholly used, or to the extent solely used, for religious purposes of the association. If the property should not be devoted to a religious purpose, then it does not come within the exemption. The effect of the statute is to exempt only the property of Young Men's Christian Associations which is devoted to religious purposes. Under this statute, other property in the state devoted to religious purposes would not be exempt. The property of the class referred to in the statute is that devoted to religious purposes. The association is one organization which devotes property to such purposes. The property of other associations devoted to a religious purpose could not claim the exemption. The statute is special and not general, because it excludes from its operation the property of other organizations which is or may be devoted or set apart for religious purposes.

It would hardly be claimed that a statute exempting the church property of a particular religious denomination by name, and which thus would exclude from its provisions the church property of all other denominations, would be a general law. Likewise a statute which exmpts property of Young Men's Christian Associations only to the extent such property is devoted to religious purposes, as already stated, must necessarily exclude the property of other organizations and associations devoting property to the same purposes. The operation and effect of the statute is limited to one of the organizations which compose a class, and is therefore special. The case falls within the holdings of this court in the cases of Denver v. Spokane Falls and Terry v. King County, supra.

A number of cases are cited in the briefs where the property of Young Men's Christian Associations has been held exempt. In every one of the cases cited, with one exception, the exemptions were under statutes which did not exempt the property of the associations by name, but exempted all property by general language which was devoted to religious, benevolent, or charitable purposes. Had the statute in this state under which this case arose contained some such general language an entirely different question would be presented. The one case referred to as supporting an exemption where the statute applied to a Young Men's Christian Association by name was that of Young Men's Christian Ass'n v. City of Keene, 70 N.H. 223, 46 A. 186. In the state of New Hampshire, however, where that case was decided, there was no constitutional provision against the passage of a special law.

In reaching the conclusion that the statutory provision is unconstitutional, we have not overlooked the rule adopted by the previous decisions of this court that a law will be presumed constitutional and valid until the contrary clearly appears, and that it is the duty of the court to sustain the law unless its invalidity is so apparent as to leave no reasonable doubt upon the question. State v. Somerville, 67 Wash. 638, 122 P. 324; State v. Pitney, 79 Wash. 608, 140 P. 918. Notwithstanding this rule, we see no escape from the conclusion that the statute containing the exemption is special, and therefore, under the constitution, is invalid.

The judgment will be affirmed.

STATE ex rel. ATTORNEY GENERAL v. BOROUGH OF SOMERS POINT

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1889.
52 N.J.L. 32, 18 A. 694, 6 L.R.A. 57.

DEPUE, J. The borough of Somers Point was incorporated under an act of the legislature, entitled "An act for the formation of borough governments in seaside resorts," approved March 29th, 1878. Pamp. L., p. 232; Rev.Sup., p. 942. The object of the information filed by the attorney general ex officio is to test the constitutionality of the act under which this municipal corporation was organized.

The contention against the validity of this corporation is founded upon the prohibitory clauses contained in paragraph 11, section 7 of article IV, of the constitution.

The first section of the act provides, "that the inhabitants of any township, which is a seaside resort for summer visitors, embracing within an area not to exceed two square miles taxable property of the amount of one hundred thousand dollars or more, may become a body corporate and politic, in fact and in law, under the title of the borough of, &c., whenever, at a general or special election called for that purpose, it may be so decided by a majority of the votes of the electors of such township or part of a township."

Section second provides that such election shall be called by one of the chosen freeholders of the township in which the district proposed to be incorporated is situate, on written application by persons representing one-tenth of the taxable real estate in such district.

The other sections of the act provide for the election of a mayor and members of a common council and officers, such as clerk, officers of election, assessors, collectors, chosen freeholders, surveyors of the highways, &c., with the powers and duties of such officers in any of the townships of this state. The act also provides for ordinances laying out, opening and improving streets and sidewalks, erecting public buildings, water and gas works, and for the exercise of all those governmental functions which usually pertain to cities and towns. The powers granted to municipalities organized under this act are found in a series of acts contained in the Supplement to the Revision, from pages 942 to 950. They are equal to, and, in some respects, exceed, the powers conferred upon the largest cities in the state.

As applied to legislation of this character a law is special or local, as contradistinguished from general, in the sense of the prohibitory clauses in this paragraph of the constitution, which embraces less than the entire class of persons or places to whose condition such legislation would be necessary or appropriate, having regard to the purpose for which the legislation was designed. A law which so particularizes, and, by such means, is restricted in its operation to persons or places which do not comprise all the objects which naturally belong to the class, is special or local, within the meaning of the constitutional interdiction.^{*}

The act in question is limited to a specified location—situation on the seaside. It is further restricted to places so situate which are the resort for summer visitors, and is applicable only to places within these limitations in which taxable property to an amount of $100,000 or more is embraced within an area not to exceed two square miles.

Municipal powers and franchises such as this act confers are as appropriate to places in an inland situation as to those located on the seashore, and are as suitable to localities inhabited or frequented by other individuals as to resorts for summer visitors. The act leaves population entirely out of view. The machinery to obtain the organization of a borough may be set in motion by "persons representing one-tenth of the taxable real estate in such district," without regard to residence; and if there be population enough to furnish a clerk and two judges of election, who shall be legal voters in the district, the requirements of the act are complied with. If taxable property irrespective of population be a proper classification on which to base a grant of municipal powers of the scope of those granted by this act, such property presents the same characteristics, wherever situate, as it possesses when located in seaside places frequented by summer visitors.

This law is so plainly a special and local law within the constitutional interdict that argument and citation of authorities are unnecessary.

Judgment of ouster from the franchises, &c., should be entered.

STATE ex rel. BOARD OF COURTHOUSE & CITY HALL COM'RS v. COOLEY

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1893. 56 Minn. 540, 58 N.W. 150.

COLLINS, J. By the provisions of Sp. Laws 1887, ch. 395, a board of commissioners was created with power to acquire certain land for the purpose in the city of Minneapolis and thereon to erect a building to be used, when completed, by the county of Hennepin and said city, jointly, for a county courthouse and a city hall. The issuance of bonds in a specified amount was authorized, that money might be had with which to pay for the land and erect the building. These bonds were to be countersigned by the county auditor. They were issued and sold, the land was acquired, and work on the building progressed until about January 1, 1893. It was then unfinished, and, not having funds sufficient to complete it in accordance with the plans, interested parties secured the passage of an act at the legislative session held in 1893, entitled "An act to provide additional means for completing and furnishing the courthouse and city hall building now in process of erection in the city of Minneapolis, and to authorize the issue and sale of bonds therefor." These bonds were to be in the same general form as those authorized by the statute of 1887, and their issuance and sale were to be governed by the express provisions of that act. Upon presentation, the county auditor, this defendant, refused to countersign these bonds, and this proceeding in mandamus was brought to compel him to perform this alleged duty.

The defendant justifies his course upon the ground that the enactment of 1893 is void, because interdicted by the Constitution, Art. 4, Section 33, relative to special legislation. This section, it must be noticed, was adopted by vote of the people at the general election held in November, 1892, and took effect prior to the passage of the act authorizing the issuance and sale of the bonds in controversy. The sole question before us is whether the legislation upon which the validity of these proposed obligations depends was obnoxious to the constitutional provision. That portion of the section upon which defendant relies reads as follows: "Sec. 33. In all cases where a general law can be made applicable, no special law shall be enacted; and whether a general law could have been made applicable in any case is hereby declared a judicial question, and, as such, shall be judicially determined, without regard to any legislative assertion on that subject. The legislature shall pass no local or special law regulating the affairs of or incorporating, erecting, or changing the lines of any county, city, village, township, ward, or school district, or creating the offices, or prescribing the powers and duties of the officers of, or fixing or relating to the compensation, salary, or fees of the same, or the mode of election or appointment thereto, * * *: provided, however, that the inhibitions of local or special laws in this section shall not be construed to prevent the passage of general laws on any of the subjects enumerated.

"The legislature may repeal any existing special or local law, but shall not amend, extend, or modify any of the same."

1. The first paragraph of the section is entirely unlike anything that has previously appeared in the fundamental law; while the second, in reference to specific subjects, respecting which there shall be no local or special legislation, is but an enlargement of section 33, prohibiting the enactment of special or private laws relative to various enumerated subjects, as that section was originally adopted and made a part of the constitution in 1881.

But at this time it is not necessary, and would be unwise, to consider or determine the full purpose and scope of the first paragraph, the opening clause, of section 33 as it now stands. It is sufficient to say that we regard it as independent of the sentence which follows, and that the specified prohibitions enumerated in the second sentence or clause are not subject to or modified by the first, which forbids the enactment of special laws where general laws can be made applicable.

2. It seems obvious that the last paragraph of the section, prohibiting the amendment, extension, or modification of existing special or local laws, applies to all special or local laws on all subjects as to which special or local legislation has been prohibited, namely, the various subjects distinctly enumerated in the preceding paragraph. No other effect can be given to this portion of the section.

3. It is also obvious that the case covered by the act of 1893 is not one to which a general law could have been made applicable. A special board of commissioners had been designated to perform certain specified duties, had been authorized to cause certain bonds to be issued and sold, and with the proceeds to purchase a particular tract of land, and to thereon erect a public building for the joint use of the county and city. The land had been secured, and the building partly completed, when, more money being needed, the issuing of additional bonds, to be the obligations of the county, only, was authorized. The situation was so peculiar that no law, it would seem, could have been framed which would have covered it, and still be a general law in any sense. Such a law might have been general in form, if enacted, but, of necessity, would have been special in its operation, and this would have violated the constitutional inhibition as much as if it were special in form. Nichols v. Walter, 37 Minn. 264, 33 N.W. 800.

4. This brings us to the inevitable proposition that, if the act of 1893 falls within any of the specific prohibitions enumerated in the second paragraph of the section, its validity cannot be upheld, and this remark would apply to the original law of 1887, had the existing provision in the constitution been in force when it was enacted. In this connection we have simply to inquire whether this law regulates the "affairs" of a county or city; and the statement heretofore made as to the nature of the original act and that of 1893, which was, in effect, nothing more than an amendment, fully answers the inquiry. Under the law as it stood prior to the legislation of 1887 it was the duty of the county, through its officers, to provide a courthouse, if one was needed. 1878 G.S. ch. 8, Section 86. But this could not have been undertaken jointly with the city. Borough of Henderson v. County of Sibley, 28 Minn. 518, 11 N.W. 91. And while our attention has not been called to any charter provision which would authorize the city officials to erect a city hall, their power to provide proper city offices could not well be doubted. Yet by the act of 1887 the duty and power in these matters was taken away from the county and city officers, and conferred upon a special board without the approval of the people of either county or city. We need spend no time in demonstrating that when the legislature authorized and directed the issue and sale of the bonds of each of these municipalities and the erection of a public building for their joint use, to be paid for by taxes which were directed to be levied for that purpose, it attempted a very noticeable regulation of the "affairs" of a county and of a city. Special acts which relate to the government of a municipality are excluded by the words "regulating the internal affairs" of such municipality in the constitution of the state of New Jersey, and it has been held in that state that any attempt to deprive a city of its control of matters which are the subject of its control incidentally, or which have been expressly granted, or to confer upon it additional powers, or to change the manner of exercising the powers already existing, is a regulation of such internal affairs, and inhibited by the constitution. State ex rel. v. Mayor &c. of Newark, 40 N.J.L. 71; Bingham v. Mayor &c. of Camden, Id. 156; Freeholders of Hudson Co. v. Buck, 51 N.J.L. 155, 16 A. 698.

The result of this litigation may prove very unfortunate in the present condition of the building in question, but under the constitutional provision the statute of 1887 could not have been lawfully enacted, and that of 1893 is clearly within the prohibition we have discussed.

Judgment reversed.

On Reargument.

COLLINS, J. When the case was submitted at the last term of this court, counsel for relator conceded, or at least did not deny, that the act under consideration (Laws 1893, ch. 243) was special in operation, as well as in form; but his contention was (1) that it was not an act

"regulating the affairs of any county or city," within the meaning of the Constitution, Art. 4, Section 33, as amended in 1892; but, if it was, (2) that the specific prohibitions enumerated in the second clause of that section are qualified by the provision in the first clause limiting the prohibition against special legislation to cases where a general law can be made applicable. Our decision on both those points was adverse to the relator; and then, assuming, what relator conceded, that the law was special, the conclusion necessarily followed that it was invalid. Hence, if the result should have been different on other grounds, the responsibility can hardly be said to be on the court.

The court is still unanimously of opinion that upon both of the questions presented on the former argument the decision was right; but now, on the reargument, we are confronted, for the first time, with the question whether the act is in fact "special," within the meaning of the constitution.

It may be stated as settled law that a constitutional prohibition against special legislation on a particular subject does not deprive the legislation of the power to divide it into classes, and apply different rules to the different classes, provided only that it adopts a proper basis of classification; and the law is none the less general, in the constitutional sense, because it applies only to one of these classes. To illustrate, the provision against special legislation regulating the affairs of a city does not require that all laws on that subject shall apply alike to all cities in the state, and thus prevent their division into classes for legislative purposes. Provisions against special legislation are to be found in the constitutions of numerous states, some of them having been in force for over forty years, and the courts have uniformly recognized the right of the legislature to divide a subject into classes, the only question generally being whether it had adopted a proper basis of classification. No court has recognized the existence of this power to classify more distinctly than we have. In Nichols v. Walter, 37 Minn. 264, 33 N.W. 800, and in State ex rel. v. Spaude, 37 Minn. 322, 34 N.W. 164, this court, in both cases speaking through Chief Justice Gilfillan, said that "it must be conceded that when a general law, uniform in its operation, is required, the law is none the less general and uniform because it divides the subjects of its operation into classes, and applies different rules to different classes. For the purposes of efficient and beneficial legislation, it is often necessary to do so." And again: "A law, to be general, need not operate alike upon all the inhabitants of the state, or all the cities or all the villages in the state. To require this would be utterly impracticable. A law is general which operates alike upon all the inhabitants or all the cities or all the villages or other subjects of a class of such subjects. That for the purpose of legislation it may be necessary, and that the legislature may make such classification, is undoubted." The same doctrine is repeated in State ex rel. v. Sheriff of Ramsey Co., 48 Minn. 236, 51 N.W. 112.

Hence a "general law" does not import universality in the subject or operation of the law. "General" is defined by Webster as relating to a genus; pertaining to a whole class or order. The line of demarcation between general laws and special laws often seems indefinite and difficult to draw; but, if the principles upon which the distinction rests are kept in mind, the difficulty is not nearly so great as might seem. A law is general, in the constitutional sense, which applies to and operates uniformly upon all members of any class of persons, places, or things requiring legislation peculiar to itself in matters covered by the law; while a special law is one which relates and applies to particular members of a class, either particularized by the express terms of the act, or separated by any method of selection from the whole class to which the law might, but for such limitation, be applicable. And in this connection there should be kept in mind the distinction between "public" and "private," and "general" and "special", as the latter terms are used in these constitutional restrictions; for special legislation in the constitutional sense may be either public or private.

The principal as well as most difficult question is, what constitutes a class, or what constitutes a proper basis of classification, for legislative purposes. We do not intend, neither is it necessary for the purposes of this case, to go into anything like a full discussion of this subject of classification, or to do more than to state a few general rules. A very able and exhaustive discussion of the whole subject will be found in the American Law Register & Review for September, 1893, in one of a series of articles by Charles C. Binney, Esq., on "Restriction upon Local and Special Legislation in the United States."

It should be noted that in determining whether the legislature has adopted a proper basis of classification, under these constitutional restrictions, the courts have uniformly applied the same tests which they apply in determining whether a law is what is commonly called "class legislation;" that is, legislation which selects particular individuals from a class, and imposes upon them special burdens, from which others of the same class are exempt, and thus denies them the equal protection of the laws. All class legislation is special legislation, although all special legislation is not class legislation, in that sense of the term. The evils aimed to be prevented in the two instances are somewhat different, but the test of the propriety of the method of classification is the same in both.

Hence, in the cases cited, this court, in determining whether an act was "special legislation," applied precisely the same test to the mode of classification which it applied in determining whether an act was "class legislation" in Lavallee v. St. Paul M. & M. Ry. Co., 40 Minn. 249, 41 N.W. 974; Johnson v. St. Paul & Duluth R. Co., 43 Minn. 222, 45 N.W. 156; and numerous other cases.

The fundamental rule is that all classification must be based upon substantial distinctions, which make one class really different from another. As was said in Nichols v. Walter and State ex rel. v. Spaude, it must be based upon some natural reason,—some reason suggested by necessity, by some difference in the situation and circumstances of the subjects placed in the different classes, suggesting the necessity of different legislation with respect to them. By necessity is meant practical, and not absolute, necessity; but the characteristics which will serve as a basis of classification must be substantial, and not slight or illusory.

For example, distinctions due merely to pre-existing repealable special legislation would not, of themselves, constitute a proper basis of classification, for that would tend to perpetuate the very peculiarities which the constitution was designed ultimately to remove. In such cases the legislature can always remove the distinction by merely repealing the special legislation. Neither can classification be based upon existing circumstances only, or those of limited duration, except where the object of the law itself is a temporary one. This rule applies peculiarly to cases where the membership of the class may change in the future, so that new members may acquire the characteristics of the class, and present members lose them. There the law must provide for the future, so that the classification may remain permanent, although the membership of the class may change. Examples of acts obnoxious to this rule are laws classifying cities on the basis of present population.

Cobb v. Bord, 40 Minn. 479, 42 N.W. 396, is an example of the cases where, in a law intended to provide merely for temporary objects, existing or temporary circumstances may be a proper basis of classification. It may be added in this connection that the duration of an act has nothing to do with its character as general or special. If it be general in its application while it continues in force, it is none the less general because limited in duration.

Another rule is that the characteristics which form the basis of the classification must be germane to the purpose of the law; in other words, legislation for a class, to be general, must be evident connection between the distinctive features to be regulated and the regulations adopted. An illustration of a law obnoxious to this rule would be the case supposed in Nichols v. Walter, supra, where towns situated on rivers are made a class, for the purpose of conferring on them special powers with reference to maintaining schools.

Another rule is that, to whatever class a law applies, it must apply to every member of that class. As was said in Johnson v. St. Paul & Duluth R. Co., supra, not only must the law treat alike, under the same conditions, all who are brought within its influence, but in its classification it must bring within its influence all who are under the same conditions; and as already suggested, if the basis of classification is such that new members of the class may come into existence, the law must be so framed as to include them when they arise. Nichols v. Walter, supra, furnishes an instance of a law obnoxious to this rule.

Another proposition that may be laid down as beyond question is that, if the basis of classification is valid, it is wholly immaterial how many or how few members there are in the class. One may constitute a class, as well as a thousand, although, of course, the fewer the members, the closer the courts will scrutinize the act to see that it is not an evasion of the constitution.

An illustration of this proposition may be found in acts classifying cities by population. The mere fact that there is only one city, and there may never be another, having the requisite population to belong to a class, will not render the law special. The last proposition to which we will refer is that the character of an act as general or special depends on its substance, and not on its form. It may be special in fact, although general in form; and it may be general in fact, although special in form. The mere form is not material. To illustrate, suppose mountains were one of the subjects on which special legislation was prohibited, and that there was only one mountain in the state; a law referring to that mountain by name would be special in form, but general in fact, according to all the rules.

Or suppose that special legislation was prohibited with reference to the police regulation of the shores of the great lakes; would it be claimed that a law was special in fact because, by its terms, it applied only to Lake Superior? Or would it be any less general because, by its terms, its operation was limited to the counties of St. Louis, Lake, and Cook? Most certainly not.

In most, if not all, of the adjudicated cases, the laws under consideration were general in form, but were assailed as being special in fact; but the test must be the same when the law is special in form, but is claimed to be general in fact.

It only remains to apply these principles to the act under consideration. It is unnecessary to state at length the provisions of the special law of 1887, as these were fully set out in the former opinion; and the law will speak for itself. Under this law, the commissioners had acquired title in themselves to the designated site for a city hall and courthouse. By the provisions of the act, they were to retain this title until the building was completed, and until they had adjusted the accounts between the city and county, in order to charge each with its proper share of the entire cost; and then they were to convey to each its respective share of the property. They had gone on and partially constructed the building, and had expended all the funds thus far provided for that purpose, and, in doing so, had expended two-thirds of these funds on the part of the building designed for the use of the county; and, as the matter stood, nobody but the board had authority to adjust this inequality in the accounts, and that only on the completion of the building. Obviously, the board could not complete the building without more funds, and these could not be obtained without further legislation. The courts might, perhaps, have granted relief by way of adjusting the accounts between the city and the county, and directing a conveyance to each of a part of the unfinished structure; and then, perhaps, steps might have been taken by the city and county, respectively, by which each could finish its part of the structure so as, in the end, to secure a city hall and courthouse in some form. But the present physical conditions were such that, without additional legislation, the building could never be completed; and the difficulties in the way of carrying it on to completion on any other plan than as a joint enterprise were very serious, if not well nigh insuperable. The difficulty could not be removed by repealing the special act of 1887, for the uncompleted building and the outstanding uncompleted contracts for material and construction would still remain. No legislation more general in fact than the act of 1893 would fully meet the case. If that act had been general in form, it could not be made more general in fact, and still fully cover the situation. Such, in short, was the condition of things under which the act of 1893 was passed, and which it was designed to meet.

It seems to us that, if the other essentials of a proper classification exist, this condition of things constituted such substantial distinctions as, in the language of Nichols v. Walter, supra, "to suggest the necessity of different legislation with respect to it." If not, then the legislature is virtually deprived of jurisdiction to legislate on the subject in any form,—a conclusion not to be lightly reached.

Inasmuch as courts will in such cases take judicial notice of all facts bearing on the constitutionality of the law, we know that this is the only case of the kind—the only member of the class—which now exists, or ever can exist; for, under the constitutional amendment of 1892, no other special law like that of 1887 can be enacted. Hence the classification is complete.

Again, the legislation (providing funds to complete the building) is confined to matters connected with and peculiar to the distinctive features of the case; or, in the language of the rule, the characteristics forming the basis of the classification are germane to the purpose of the law.

Finally, as we have already seen, the facts that the law is special in form, and that it applies to only a single object, or, in the language of another rule, that the class consists of only one member, are not important.

Our conclusion is that the act, although special in form, is general in fact, within the meaning of the constitution.

Judgment affirmed.

LEIGHTON v. CITY OF MINNEAPOLIS

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1946.
222 Minn. 523, 25 N.W.2d 287.

LORING, CHIEF JUSTICE. This action was brought by a taxpayer and freeholder against the city of Minneapolis, the auditor and the treasurer of Hennepin county, and the board of park commissioners of the city, in behalf of plaintiff and all others similarly situated, for a declaratory judgment to determine whether L.1945, c. 486, violates Minn. Const. art. 4, §§ 33, 34, and 36. The act authorizes and empowers each city of the first class of the state now or hereafter having a population of 450,000 inhabitants or more, and now or hereafter brought under a home-rule charter, to levy annually on real and personal property of said city a tax not exceeding one and one half mills on each dollar of the assessed valuation of said city for the "purpose of acquiring, equipping, maintaining, operating and governing playgrounds and other recreational facilities and conducting recreational programs throughout said City for the public use as a part of the system of parks and parkways of said City," The act requires the imposition of that tax to be made through the city council or chief governing body and its board of park commissioners. Defendants answered, asserting the validity of c. 486 and that classification of cities therein is a valid classification, setting forth, among other things, the greater proportional expense and necessity therefor which exist in cities of that classification over that which exists in smaller cities.

The case was tried by the court, which made findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of defendants. From the judgment entered, plaintiff has appealed.

The case presents for decision the same questions that were presented to this court in the companion case of Leighton v. City of Minneapolis, Minn., 25 N.W.2d 263. All of those questions, except whether population is germane to the subject matter or purposes of this act, are disposed of by the discussion in the companion case. The sole question remaining for decision here is, therefore, whether the classification of cities of 450,000 inhabitants is a classification germane to the subject matter and purposes of the act. The court took considerable evidence and made findings with reference to the matter of classification. It found:

"V.

" . . . That the census report of the United States for the year 1942 shows that the per capita expense of the activities described in said Chapter 486 are much larger in the cities of 450,000 or more inhabitants than in smaller cities, and such expense increases with the size of the city and with the density of population. That said census figures show that all per capita cost of city government increases as the size of the city increases. The court finds that the density of population per square mile in Minneapolis is one and two-thirds times that of St. Paul and five times that of Duluth, St. Paul and Duluth being the other two cities of the first class as described in Section 36, Article 4 of the Constitution. That at the time said Section 36 was adopted, Duluth's population was less than 50,000 inhabitants. That the need for recreational facilities increases with the size of the city and the resulting increase in density of population.

"VI.

"That the tax base in Minneapolis has decreased from $330,858,640.00 in 1932 to $266,820,368.00 in 1945 when the act was passed. The court finds from the evidence submitted that the labor cost of the Park Board of the City of Minneapolis increased from 68¾c per hour in 1932 to 96½c per hour in 1945, and that the rate has been set at $1.05 per hour for 1946, and the labor cost represents over seventy percent of the entire cost of operating the recreational activities of the City of Minneapolis. That the population of Minneapolis increased from 464,356 in 1930 to 492,370 in 1940, and that the population in 1945, assuming the rate of increase for the last ten years was continued and allowing nothing for the increase in population due to war production, was approximately 497,500.

"VII.

"The court finds that there has been an increasing demand during the years since World War I for more recreational facilities. That many petitions from various parts of the city have been presented to the Board of Park Commissioners asking for additional playgrounds and more recreational facilities, a large number of which have had to be denied for lack of funds. There was some evidence introduced as to the increase in the amount of juvenile delinquency.

"VIII.

"From the testimony presented, and from two important surveys made a considerable number of years apart, the last one being in 1944, it appears that the main activity and practically the only activity of the Board of Park Commissioners is various forms of recreation. That the general park fund arising from a levy of one and one-half mills, which is authorized by the charter, in addition to the amount authorized by the law in question, has in recent years all been used for maintaining recreational activities, and the recreational facilities in the City of Minneapolis, and that due to the decreasing tax base, the increase in population, and the increase in labor cost, the City of Minneapolis has had in effect less and less funds to take care of more and more people with the result that in recent years there has had to be a radical curtailment of service to the public in maintaining recreational facilities and supervision thereof.

"IX.

"There are twenty-two lakes and lagoons in the City of Minneapolis, the waters and shorelines of which have all been taken into the park system of the City of Minneapolis, except part of the shorelines of Cedar Lake, and the Park Board has maintained recreational activities on the shores and on the lakes as far as its funds will permit.

"X.

"It therefore appears from the facts proven in this case and by the facts of which the court will take judicial notice that the reasonable demand of the citizens of said city for increased recreational facilities cannot be furnished by the said Board of Park Commissioners, and that each year the Park Board has less and less money to carry on the said activities with the continued demand for more and more of the same, . . ."

These findings are not challenged as unsupported and could not be attacked here, because there is no settled case. We would take judicial notice of substantially all of them. It is too obvious to require discussion that the facts as found by the trial court are amply sufficient to sustain the classification made by the legislature.

The judgment is affirmed.

NOTES

1. Two articles concerned with the problems of special legislation peculiar to Minnesota, are Anderson, "Special Legislation in Minnesota," 7 Minn.L.Rev. 133, 187 (1923), Dawley, "Recent Developments in Special Legislation and Municipal Home Rule in Minnesota," 16 Minn.L.Rev. 659 (1932).

2. As may be seen from the principal cases, the problem of special or general legislation is generally reduced by the courts to a question of classification. In Board of Education of San Francisco v. Alliance Assurance Co., 159 F. 994, 999 (1908) the court said: "These general rules have been aptly stated thus: (1) An act applying uniformly to the whole of any single class of individuals or objects, where the classification is founded upon some natural intrinsic or constitutional distinction, is a general law. (2) In order to make the law general, the classification must not be arbitrary, but must be founded upon some natural intrinsic or constitutional distinction, and some reason must appear why the act is not made to apply generally to all classes. (3) Although a law is general when it applies equally to all individuals of a class founded upon a natural intrinsic or constitutional distinction, it is not general if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions in the exercise of a common right upon a class arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law." The court then continues: "There must be some relation between the differences in class and the difference in the rule of practice involved." That is to say, in a procedural act there must be something in the nature of the action to justify the distinction. See also In re Becker's Estate, 20 Cal.App. 513, 129 P. 795 (1912); In re Elm Street in the City of New York, 240 N.Y. 72, 158 N.E. 24 (1927).

3. That the classification must be based upon some substantial difference, see Cooper v. State, 226 Ala. 288, 147 So. 432 (1933); Prescott Courner v. Moore, 35 Ariz. 26, 274 P. 163 (1929); Crews v. Lundquist, 361 Ill. 193, 197 N.E. 768 (1935).

4. Statements to the effect that the classification must have some relation to the subject on which the legislation is effective are found in United States v. Mullendore, 74 F.2d 286 (1934); Knowlton v. Walton, 189 Ark. 901, 75 S.W.2d 811 (1934); Adler v. Deegan, 251 N.Y. 467, 167 N.E. 705 (1929).

5. Read, "Congestion in the Minnesota Legislature Caused by Requirements of Local Government", 23 Minn.Munic. 405 (1938), says:

"Special legislation has resulted in evils in state legislative practices since long before the Civil War, and Minnesota did not escape from them. As a consequence the Constitution was amended in 1881 and again in 1892, resulting in the present Sections 33 and 34 of Article IV. By a line of decision commencing with the well known Cooley case in 1893, the Supreme Court has enabled what are in effect special laws to be enacted under the guise of classified general laws. . . .

"Prior to the 1892 amendment two-thirds of all statutes passed in Minnesota were special laws. As compared with that situation, a survey of the legislation of the last five regular sessions, 1929 to 1937 inclusive, shows that out of a total of 2,185 acts comprised in the session laws, 653 or approximately thirty per cent were in substance though not in form special. Most of the laws in that thirty per cent were so classified as to be unassailable on constitutional grounds, but most of them are decidedly objectionable on other bases; they crowded the calendar and diverted the time and attention of legislators from matters of statewide concern and importance.

"Grouped according to subject matter, these special laws from 1929 to 1937 included: (a) 179 dealing with municipalities; (b) 393 with counties; (c) 83 with courts; (d) 61 with school districts; and (e) 38 with miscellaneous matters. Classifications under group (a) were either as permitted by Section 36 of Article IV of the Constitution or some sub-classification thereof. Classifications within group (b) comprised a great variety, mostly combinations of population, area and assessment values, and reflected both artifice and ingenuity. Analysis of the statutes in group (b) which contains approximately fifty-five per cent of all special laws, shows: the majority dealt with salaries of county officers or miscellaneous matters of a distinctly administrative or managerial character, a few authorized bond issues, a few granted special privileges, and a very few enacted what could properly be called rules of law. Obviously, government of the state cannot be carried on unless some law-making agency enacts this sort of special legislation. But owing to the local character of the matters covered and the varying conditions and needs of different localities, and owing to the serious burden and handicap which state legislators testify is thus imposed on them, it is a grave question whether it is either desirable or necessary that the state legislature should continue to do it. Should not local governing bodies handle this kind of business themselves?

"As Professor William Anderson has pointed out on several occasions, on the whole municipal home rule in Minnesota has worked satisfactorily and has operated to reduce considerably the amount of special legislation concerning municipalities. However, with regard to the 179 classified laws applying to cities and towns from 1929 to 1937, examination leads to the conclusion that pressure upon the Legislature to enact most of them was the consequence of lack of sufficient power in the charters. Only a few of them appear to bear on their faces signs that they were taken to the Legislature because their proponents were reluctant to run the risk of opposition to their passage by the people of the localities to which they applied. It seems to be a safe inference that pressure on the legislature for enactment of special laws concerning municipalities can be relieved (1) by amending Section 36 of Article IV to facilitate amendment of home rule charters; (2) by amending the general laws applying to villages and cities which have no home rule so as, with proper safeguards, to increase their powers; and (3) by placing some restriction upon the legislature with respect to the process of enactment of laws classified according to Section 36.

"Study of the classified acts applying to counties indicates that pressure to enact them results from insufficient power in the county boards and an inevitable inability to adapt the provisions of the general laws governing counties to the various requirements peculiar to each of many different types of localities within the state. It seems to be plain that the general laws governing counties should be amended so as to give county boards greater power than they have now, particularly with regard to county appropriations and salaries. Proper safeguards must, of course, be devised. No real solution of the problem seems likely, however, without setting up at least some measure of county home rule. . . ."

SECTION 7. UNIFORM LAWS

REPORT OF THE MINNESOTA BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS
ON UNIFORM STATE LAWS TO THE MINNESOTA STATE LEGISLATURE AT ITS 1933 SESSION

I.

National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws

The statute . . . (Minn.Laws 1911, c. 68) prescribes as follows:

"It shall be the duty of said board to examine the subjects . . . upon which uniformity is desirable; to confer with the commissioners appointed for the same purpose by other states in drafting uniform laws to be submitted for approval and adoption by the several states; and said board of commissioners shall meet annually with the conference of commissioners on uniform state laws for the promotion of uniformity of legislation in the United States, and join with it in such measures as may be deemed by the said board most expedient to advance the objects of said conference."

The Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws referred to in the above statute is now known as the "National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws." It is an organization effected by commissioners appointed by the various states for the promotion of uniformity of legislation in the different states on all subjects where uniformity is deemed desirable and practicable. Its conferences are held annually at the place of meeting of the American Bar Association and immediately preceding, and its proceedings are briefly reported in the American Bar Association Report, and they are more fully reported in the annual volume of its own proceedings.

The organization drafts bills to make uniform the laws of the different states on various subjects on which uniformity seems practicable and desirable, and recommends them for adoption by the various legislatures.

The National Conference is an organization, legislative in character, in which each of the forty-eight states and five territories is represented by three or more legislative members. Its work is confined to the drafting of model uniform acts for submission to the respective state legislatures. Its 160 or more delegates are appointed on standing and special committees for investigation and report to the general conference; and when the recommendation of a committee is adopted favoring the drafting of a uniform act upon a given subject, the best special talent in the country is enlisted to draft a tentative model act. The tentative act is then submitted to the members and to the country at large for criticism and amendment; and, if it does not meet with general satisfaction, is redrafted and resubmitted, until a final draft is at length produced that meets the general requirements of a model uniform act. These uniform acts are also approved by the American Bar Association.

One of the best recommendations of the Uniform Acts is the fact that with . . . 580 enactments, no state has ever repealed any Uniform Act which it has once enacted. The acts show their real value by the way in which they meet the test of actual experience and use.

The Uniform Acts . . . approved by the National Conference, are by it recommended for passage in all the states and are also approved by the American Bar Association.

III.

Movement for Uniform State Laws and Their Advantages. Uniformity and Comity. Interstate Compacts.

The natural growth of diversity in the laws of the various states in the nineteenth century was developing to be a serious handicap to the trade and commerce of the country and undesirable in other ways. It was felt that there should be an organization in which the states would all be represented, to consider subjects where uniformity of law was desirable and frame uniform or standard Acts for the states to adopt, and that this would promote uniformity of state laws. As a result, in 1890, the American Bar Association passed a resolution recommending that each state pass a law for the appointment of commissioners to confer with commissioners from other states on the subject of uniformity in the laws of the states. New York was the first state to pass such a law, and provide State Commissioners to promote uniformity. In 1892 the first National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws was held, at which nine states were represented. An annual meeting has been held in each year since then, the number of states represented increasing; and since 1912 all the states, territories and insular possessions have been officially represented. Minnesota joined the National Conference by the Act of 1911 (Chapter 68, Laws 1911) above referred to.

The Uniform Acts are drafted to serve as well framed legislation as well as to promote uniformity. They represent the best legislative thought in the particular subjects covered. The Commercial Acts, for example, put in well arranged statutory form specific parts of the commercial law, thus giving to business and commerce clear and definite statements of the law in subjects where those qualities are specially desirable, and avoiding the uncertainty and difficulty of ascertainment of the common law, as well as furnishing uniformity. But they do something more, they are modern and up-to-date as well as clear and orderly. They follow the best considered of the more recent cases in stating the law, and indeed sometimes follow mercantile thought in going beyond the decided cases and making desirable changes in the law, which is the proper function of legislation. The need for uniform state laws and their nature are more fully discussed in our 1931 Report on pages 6 to 12.

The advantages of the Uniform Acts may be summarized as follows:

(a) They furnish well drafted models on important subjects, providing good laws for the states to adopt. The experience of men familiar with the laws of all states is utilized to frame the best possible law.

(b) They furnish the advantages of uniformity of law in the states, which could be secured in no other way.

(c) They save the states from federal encroachments by providing to the people the benefit of uniform laws without the need of having the Federal Government step in and extend its activities, correspondingly reducing those of the states. . . .

The Uniform Acts are framed with a view to the general welfare of the people at large, and do not appeal to any special interest. The weakness of our cause in not appealing to any special interest should be its strength in the legislature, and by recognizing the immense importance of the cause of uniform state laws, it can render the state a great service.

Uniformity and Comity

The strength, prosperity and happiness of the United States depend in large degree upon its unity, upon close relations and easy communication and trade between the different states. Uniform laws, like a uniform language, help greatly to bind the country together and make easier the dealings between the people in different sections.

However comity in state laws is necessary, as well as uniformity, in order to secure the essential facility of interstate trade and communications. "Comity" is used here in a broad sense to mean laws friendly and accommodating to the other sister states and not hostile, including of course the technical meaning of "comity" in conflict of laws, as the recognition and enforcement of rights acquired under the laws of another state. Thus if each state adopted laws that were hostile to the other states, interstate relations would be disrupted although such hostile laws were uniform in character. Much of comity in state laws is guaranteed by the United States constitution, there being a wide range of hostile laws which a state cannot constitutionally enact. But there remains a considerable scope for the exercise of comity within permissible state legislation. A number of the Uniform Acts have this principle of comity particularly in view. These include the Uniform Foreign Executed Wills Act, Foreign Probated Wills Act, and Proof of Statutes Act, providing respectively for recognizing the validity of a will when valid under the law of the state where executed, or of the testator's domicile, for admitting a will to probate on presentation of an authenticated copy of the will and of its probate in another state, and for proving the statutes of another state by presenting a printed copy thereof purporting on its face to be published under the authority of the other state.

In some cases the comity is reciprocal only. Thus in the Act to Secure the Attendance of Witnesses from Without the State in Criminal Cases the right granted to another State to compel attendance of witnesses found in the State, depends on the other State reciprocating and granting a similar right.

At the present time the National Conference has under consideration the matter of an Act providing for greater comity in the subject of powers of foreign executors and administrators, especially with regard to their rights to collect and receive assets of the deceased, but with due regard to the rights of local creditors. The initiative in this matter came from the American Law Institute, which in connection with its Restatement of the Law of Conflict of Laws, came to realize the unsatisfactory situation caused by the common law of that subject in forcing numerous unnecessary probatings of estates in different states to collect assets, causing undue trouble and expense especially to small estates. An Act seemed desirable increasing comity between the states.

Interstate Compacts

The important matter of compacts and agreements between states, while separate from uniform legislation in most respects, yet is related to it in that both are efforts by the states, working together, to achieve results without calling for action by the Federal Government. A large range of action is afforded to the states by interstate compacts, giving them the power to deal with river and harbor development, interstate bridges, joint public works, forestation, fishing and hunting regulations and many other matters, where an entire region is affected, including several states, without the necessity of resort to Washington. A regional control and solution of regional problems, not national in scope, is thus afforded through the interstate compact and the affected states acting together. The vigor of the state governments is retained and the national government not called upon. The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws through its Committee on Interstate Compacts has put out two comprehensive reports on the subject, one in 1921 prepared by Prof. Wigmore, and one in 1932 prepared by Prof. Landis, giving the present status of the subject. . . .

IV.

Other Organizations in the United States Interested in Uniform State Laws

In addition to the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, there are a number of other organizations in the United States specially interested in such uniformity, to three of which we shall now refer.

(1) American Law Institute

The American Law Institute was organized in 1923, consisting of leading judges, lawyers and professors of law from all parts of the United States, for the purpose of preparing authoritative Restatements of fundamental parts of the common or non-statutory law. The main purpose of preparing the Restatements may have been to make the common law clearer, simpler and better, by stating it in definite and comprehensive form for each subject in a single book, so that it would not be necessary to go through endless decisions to find the law, the restatement to be authoritative and followed by the courts, but not of the binding nature of a statute, the common law's elasticity to meet new conditions being retained. An important purpose of the work, however, was to improve the uniformity of the common law in the various states. The common law has tended to remain much more uniform in the states than statutory law, due to various factors, including its origin for the great majority of states in one source, the common law of England, and the fact that the courts in deciding cases consult in different states the same textbooks and other authoritative works and the decisions of courts in other states. However there has been considerable drifting apart of the states in the common law also, as evidenced by the diverse decisions of their courts on many points; and the Restatement of this law by the American Law Institute is calculated to keep the state courts together by offering them a single authoritative statement of the law which they would be inclined to follow in the absence of a previous decision or statute in the particular state to the contrary. The first of these Restatements, that of the Law of Contracts, is now completed.

The Institute in the careful study which it makes of the law of a particular subject, finds places in that law, where the common law is well established but is not suited to the present times through changes in conditions or other causes, and a change is desirable which can only be accomplished by statute. Also it finds cases where parts of the common law have already been put into statutory form in many states, but with unnecessary and undesirable diversity in the statutes, such as those relating to estates and interests in land. In a number of such instances, the matter has, formally or informally, been called to the attention of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, which has taken it up with a view to framing a Uniform Act covering the matter, in cooperation with the Institute or with the aid of the legal experts of the Institute working on the subject in question. This cooperation, formal or informal, of the Institute and the National Conference in the framing of Uniform Acts for general adoption by the States in subjects related to the Restatement of the common law by the Institute, is increasing. Included, at present, in addition to the subjects of powers of foreign representatives and estates in land, above referred to, are trust administration, intestate succession and powers of representatives over real estate of the deceased. As the Institute completes the Restatement of a particular subject, the group working on that subject is in a better position to give an opinion as to where and how the common law as set forth in the Restatement may be improved by supplementary statutes, and to make the appropriate recommendations to the National Conference for the framing of Uniform Acts. Cooperation between the Institute and National Conference is facilitated by the fact that a number of persons are members of both organizations. Uniform Acts already put out as a result of the cooperation of the two organizations include, Written Obligations Act, Interparty Agreement Act, Joint Obligations Act and Act to Secure the Attendance of Witnesses from Without the State in Criminal Cases. The first three mentioned relate to the law of contracts and were drafted by Prof. Samuel Williston who was Reporter for the Institute in the Restatement of the Law of Contracts and also Commissioner on Uniform State Laws from Massachusetts.

The efforts of the Institute towards uniformity of laws in its framing of a Model Code of Criminal Procedure, should also be noted.

(2) Governors' Conference

The Governors' Conference is an organization the membership of which consists of the governors of the forty-eight states. Former governors are honorary members. It was organized in 1908 on the call of President Roosevelt, the immediate occasion being to secure cooperation by the governors in a policy of Conservation of Natural Resources. It has met annually since then.

The Articles of Organization, which are short, contain the following:

Article III. "The functions of the Governors' Conference shall be to meet yearly for an exchange of views and experiences on subjects of general importance to the people of the several States, the promotion of greater uniformity in State legislation and the attainment of greater efficiency in State administration."

Part of Article IX. "He (the Secretary) shall, also, so far as possible, cooperate and keep in touch with organizations, societies and other agencies designed to promote uniformity of legislation."

It thus appears that promotion of uniformity of state legislation is one of the important purposes of the Governors' Conference for which it was organized.

The Governors' Conference meets annually for discussion and to hear addresses and exchange views. It does not pass any resolutions; and the governors do not bind the states.

(3) American Legislators' Association

This organization of state legislators throughout the country, formed in recent years, has members from both House and Senate in each state. Its general purpose is to improve legislative conditions through cooperation of legislators in different states; and one of its chief projects is a meeting of delegates from each state concerned primarily with proposals for interstate compacts and uniform laws. The Director of the Association, is also a member of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws.

V.

Movement for Uniform Laws in Other Countries

. . . .
Canada has a Conference of Commissioners on Uniformity of Legislation in Canada composed of commissioners from each province, similar to that of the United States, whose example it followed. This Conference has put out a series of important Uniform Acts which have been widely adopted in Canada; and in view of Canada's close proximity to and extensive dealings and relations with the United States and especially Minnesota, we believe that a more extended statement about uniform laws in Canada will be of interest and value.

The Canadian Conference on Uniformity of Legislation was organized in 1918, the various provinces providing for the appointment of commissioners to attend the Dominion Conference on recommendation of the Council of the Canadian Bar Association. The Conference consists of commissioners from each of the nine provinces, and has met annually since 1918 at the same place as and just preceding the meeting of the Canadian Bar Association.

The following quotation from the Preface of the 1931 Proceedings of this Canadian Conference indicates its problem, origin and purpose:

"The independent action of the several provincial legislatures naturally results in a certain diversity of legislation. In some cases diversity is inevitable, as, for instance, when the province of Quebec legislates upon subjects within the purview of the Civil Code of Lower Canada and according to principles derived from the law of France, and the other provinces legislate upon similar subjects according to principles derived from the common law of England. In such cases the problem of securing uniformity is confined to the common law provinces. There are, however, many other cases in which no principle of either civil law or common law is at stake, with regard to which the problem of securing uniformity is the same in all the provinces. Both these classes of cases include subjects of legislation as to which it is desirable, especially from the point of view of merchants doing business in different parts of Canada, that legislation should be made uniform throughout the provinces to the fullest extent possible.

"In the United States work of great value has been done by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. Since the year 1892 these commissioners have met annually. They have drafted uniform statutes on various subjects, and the subsequent adoption of these statutes by many of the state legislatures has secured a substantial measure of uniformity. The example set by the state commissioners in the United States was followed in Canada when, on the recommendation of the Council of the Canadian Bar Association, several of the provinces passed statutes providing for the appointment of commissioners to attend an inter-provincial conference for the purpose of promoting uniformity of legislation.

"Statutes have been passed in some of the provinces providing both for contributions by the provinces towards the general expenses of the Conference and for payment by the respective provinces of the travelling and other expenses of their own commissioners. The commissioners themselves receive no remuneration for their services.

"The appointment of commissioners or participation in the meetings of the Conference does not of course bind any province to adopt any conclusions reached by the Conference, but it is hoped that the voluntary acceptance by the provincial legislatures of the recommendations of the Conference will secure an increasing measure of uniformity of legislation."

. . . .

The procedure of the Canadian Conference in putting out Uniform Acts, or Model Statutes as they prefer to call them, is similar to that employed in the United States. A committee is appointed to draft an Act on a subject where uniformity is deemed desirable, and reports back the following year with a tentative draft. This is considered at the annual meeting, revised and usually referred back to the Committee for further consideration. After several years of perfecting it, the Act in final form is approved and recommended to the provinces for adoption. Each year the Proceedings of the Conference are issued in printed form and include the Reports of Committees, the final form of Acts approved and the draft form of Acts still under consideration. . . .

NOTES

1. Saeta, "Unified Legislation Cited as Goal of Conference on Uniform State Laws", 15 Calif. State Bar Jour. 359 (1940), states [Footnotes are omitted. Ed.]:

As a result of an "experience" meeting last year, the Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws will make a determined drive, in 1941, when 43 State Legislatures meet, to place the maximum number of uniform acts on the statute books.

As for California, that means the adoption not only of the two acts approved by the Conference this year, namely, the Pistol and the Simultaneous Death Acts but such other acts, for example, as Absence as Evidence of Death, Criminal Extradition, Federal Tax Lien Registration, Fiduciaries, Conditional Sales, Narcotic Drug, and Flag, to cite but a few.

The President of the Conference, William A. Schnader, former Attorney-General of Pennsylvania, besides being a scholar is a stern realist. He was not satisfied with the Conference meeting year in and year out and painstakingly presenting act after act. He wanted to know why the states were not adopting them, why such a disparity existed in the adoption of the acts, from thirty-five in South Dakota to three in Texas (California has adopted seventeen of the Uniform Acts).

As a result of these queries, an afternoon session was set aside to discuss this problem and the Commissioners "let their hair down." It was truly an "experience" meeting; each Commissioner spoke out of the fullness of his heart. They reviewed their work for the past 50 years and found that though the Conference had approved 70 acts, the states had adopted only a small portion of them.

Like the mills of the gods which grind slowly but exceedingly fine, they had turned out only a few acts; but that was because of the infinite patience and loving care that they had lavished upon these 70 brain children. They were proud of the men who fathered their offspring, some of the most distinguished names in jurisprudence, such as Woodrow Wilson, Louis D. Brandeis, James Barr Ames, Samuel Williston, William Draper Lewis and Roscoe Pound. They were also proud of their successors who were carrying on in the high tradition—men who gave freely of their time, effort and skill without compensation and without fanfare; who only asked that the results of their labor be approved.

Despite an era of brass and publicity, these men still believed in the Emersonian dictum of the mouse trap—that somehow or other the public would learn of their efforts to remove friction between states, to level trade barriers, to preserve the independence of states and yet make our dual system of state and federal government work more harmoniously; in other words, to promote unity. Present day orators have just discovered the magic word "unity" but the Conference has been trying realistically to bring about unity during the last 50 years.

They thought that the public would learn that they had no axe to grind, no special interest to serve when they met annually and drafted and redrafted their acts, putting into their work the varied and accumulated experience gathered from Bench, Bar and Law School. Though they claimed no perfection for their acts, indeed a committee was at work trying to eliminate such acts that had become outmoded, yet they felt that their acts represented the sound work of patient disinterested public servants who worked in a judicial climate and would compare most favorably with the results that flowed from the average State Legislature which was hurried, harassed and pressured. Yes, they could look with pardonable pride upon the work of their hands and say—it was good! But alas, they were mistaken! The public was hardly aware of their existence. In the shuffle and turmoil of present complex life they had been overlooked. Bar, business and trade associations who all stood to profit from their work knew little of the effort which went into it, and used the results even less. From that discussion there clearly emerged the conclusion that their product was good but that their method of distribution was bad—that they were poor salesmen. The problem was to move the merchandise from the shelves and place it where it belonged—on the statute books. How? They first turned to the Council of State Governments, their support was sought and obtained. They will cooperate in securing the enactment of the various acts. If this is done a great step will have been taken to secure that unity which is essential in this vast country of ours, operating as it does on a federal and state basis.

Let us not deceive ourselves. The public is becoming aware of the Balkanization of our states, of the existence of trade barriers. Any force that will make trade and commerce flow more smoothly between states, that will reconcile the jealousies and parochialism of the states, that will preserve the balance between federal and state governments, is a force making for unity. . . .

SUTHERLAND v. MEAD

Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, 1903.
80 App.Div. 103, 80 N.Y.S. 504.

HATCH, J. This action was brought to recover upon a promissory note made by the defendant Deshong, upon which the appellants were accommodation indorsers. It appeared upon the hearing of the motion that the defendant Palleske was indebted to the appellants upon a promissory note for the sum of $1,000; that as such note was about falling due, and on the 15th day of April, 1902, Palleske requested the appellants to accept in payment of such note the promissory note executed by Deshong, set forth in the complaint in the action; that they refused so to accept the same unless Palleske could procure it to be discounted, and would deliver the proceeds thereof to the appellants, and for such purpose the appellants indorsed said note in their firm name, and the defendant Palleske took the same, and agreed to return the proceeds thereof to the appellants. Instead of discounting the note, Palleske transferred the same to the plaintiff in the action, who paid thereon the sum of $150 cash, and, as further consideration, took and held the same as collateral security for an indebtedness then due and owing by Palleske to the plaintiff in a sum exceeding $3,000, the whole of which still remains due and unpaid. This action was brought by the plaintiff to enforce the note. . . . It is said . . . that the negotiable instrument law has changed the rule in respect to what constitutes consideration for a promissory note; it being claimed that a pre-existing indebtedness is a good consideration, and renders the holder thereof a holder for value of a note taken as security therefor, as against accommodation indorsers, even though the note has been fraudulently diverted from the purpose for which it was given, and the indorsers have received no value. Since 1822, when Coddington v. Bay, 20 Johns. 636, 11 Am.Dec. 342, was decided, it has been the settled law of this state that accommodation makers or indorsers of negotiable paper were not liable to a holder thereof, where the same had been fraudulently diverted from the purpose for which it was made, or the indorsement given, and the holder had received it solely as collateral security for an antecedent debt. . . .

Whatever may have been the rule with respect to this question in other jurisdictions, it has been the law of this state, uniformly enforced during this period of time, and still is the law, unless the negotiable instrument law has changed the same. Section 51 of such act provides:

"Value is any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract. An antecedent or pre-existing debt constitutes value; and is deemed such whether the instrument is payable on demand or at a future time."

Standing alone, this provision has not changed the existing law. It was always the law of this state that a consideration sufficient to support a simple contract constituted a good consideration for the instrument. This declaration, therefore, upon this subject, added nothing whatever to the law as it existed and had existed from time immemorial. So, also, an antecedent or pre-existing debt constituted value, and was sufficient in consideration of an instrument, either negotiable or otherwise, as between the parties thereto. Moreover, it was always the law that the actual payment and discharge of a pre-existing debt constituted the same a valuable consideration for the transfer of commercial paper, and shut off prior equities existing against it. Such was the rule announced in Coddington v. Bay, supra, and has since been enforced by the courts of this state. There is nothing contained in this enactment, therefore, which has changed the rule of law respecting the consideration of commercial paper, as it had previously existed; and the language of the statute is quite insufficient to annul the rule which has obtained with respect to the fraudulent diversion of commercial paper, as against accommodation indorsers thereon. Such rule, therefore, cannot be considered as changed, unless it be by virtue of the other provisions of the statute, showing that such defense is cut off, and indicating a clear intent to change the rule.

Section 52 of the negotiable instruments law defines what constitutes a holder for value:

"Where value has at any time been given for the instrument, the holder is deemed a holder for value in respect to all parties who became such prior to that time."

And by section 55 an accommodation party is made liable on the instrument to a holder for value, although such holder at the time of taking the instrument knew him to be only an accommodation party. Section 91 defines a holder in due course to be a person who has taken the instrument under the following conditions:

"(1) That it is complete and regular upon its face; (2) that he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonored, if such was the fact; (3) that he took it in good faith and for value; (4) that at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it."

Section 94 defines when the title is defective in the person who has negotiated the instrument as follows:

"When he obtained the instrument, or any signature thereto, by fraud, duress or force and fear, or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to a fraud."

Section 95 provides that the holder must have "actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith." By section 96 the rights of a holder in due course are defined to be:

"A holder in due course holds the instrument free from any defect of title of prior parties and free from defenses available to prior parties among themselves, and may enforce payment of the instrument for the full amount thereof against all parties liable thereon."

By section 98 it is provided:

"Every holder is deemed prima facie to be a holder in due course; but when it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he or some person under whom he claims acquired the title as a holder in due course."

It is evident from these provisions that the Legislature did not intend to wipe out the defenses to a promissory note where the same had been procured from the maker by fraud, or where the indorsement has been given for a specific purpose, and a fraudulent diversion of the paper has been had. If the holder took the same with notice of such facts or circumstances as charged him with notice, or if he parted with no value, it constitutes a good defense to such note. As the definition of value for a promissory note has not added anything to the law upon that subject beyond such as was previously recognized, we ought not to conclude that the Legislature intended to change the rule with respect thereto, nor to permit frauds to be perpetrated thereunder. When the Legislature defines a defective title, it states in express terms that a fraudulent diversion is such. All of these sections can be harmonized, in their entirety, without any subtle refinement of reasoning, by construing section 51 to mean that, to constitute an antecedent or pre-existing debt a valuable consideration in support of a promissory note that has been fraudulently diverted, as valid in the hands of a bona fide holder, the latter must have canceled, and, in legal effect, paid and discharged, the antecedent or pre-existing debt. By still holding the debt, he in fact parts with no value. It was not intended thereby that where a debt continued to remain in existence, and enforceable as such, and the note is taken as collateral security for its payment, such debt, undischarged, constitutes a valuable consideration, or the holder of the note one in due course, as against the accommodation maker or indorser who has been defrauded by the negotiation of the instrument. We are not to impute to the Legislature an intent to change a rule of law which has existed in uniform course of enforcement for over three-quarters of a century, without a clear and unequivocal expression so to do. The rules of law which have been laid down in England, covering such question, or the reasons assigned for a different rule in other jurisdictions in this country, do not furnish controlling reasons for changing the law of this state so as to bring it into harmony with such views, in face of the fact that in the commercial center of this country these rules have been applied for this length of time without damage to business interests or harm to commercial usages, and during its operation a period of commercial activity and prosperity has existed, heretofore unknown in the world's history. We may take judicial notice that the commission appointed to revise and codify the statutes was created, in the main, to codify existing laws, and not make new rules; and certainly it was never intended that settled usages in respect of commercial paper, founded upon decisions covering a period of 80 years, and uniform in application, should be overthrown in the construction of ambiguous and obscure expressions used by such body. The harmony of these provisions of the statute is in no measure disturbed by a construction which causes them to read that an antecedent and pre-existing debt must be paid and discharged, in order to constitute the holder of commercial paper, which has been fraudulently diverted, a bona fide holder, and, as such, capable of enforcing the same as against the accommodation maker or indorser. Merely taking such paper as collateral security for the payment of a pre-existing or antecedent debt does not constitute such debt value, within the meaning of this statute. This matter does not seem to have been the subject of discussion, beyond that had at Special Term in the case of Brewster v. Shrader, 26 Misc. 480, 57 N.Y.S. 606, where a different rule was laid down. The authority cited therefor in the opinion is contained in the reviser's note by the author of the law, in which it is stated that section 51 was designed to change the rule in Coddington v. Bay, supra, and the opinion of James W. Eaton, Esq., instructor upon the law of bills and notes in the Albany Law School, wherein he says, in his published edition of the negotiable instruments law, in referring to section 51, "It is to be inferred that the above statute extends the New York rule to include instruments given merely as collateral security." We are not disposed to adopt this construction of the law. Settled principles ought not to be overturned by imputing a legislative intent where the language upon which it is based is equivocal in expression, and when the language used which it is claimed changes the rule may be naturally harmonized with the decisions of the courts, which have settled the law plainly and conclusively, and with respect to which commercial dealings have been governed in this state for over 80 years. . . .

If these views be correct, it follows that the order should be reversed.

NOTE

The principal case does not represent the present attitude of the New York courts toward the Uniform Negotiable Act. See McKinney, Statutes, Bk. 37, § 51, p. 83. In Kelso & Co. v. Ellis, 224 N.Y. 528, 121 N.E. 364 (1918), the court speaks of "the habit of bench and bar to look to cases rather than statutes for principles of commercial law until attention is sharply directed to the extent to which the movement for uniformity of laws through legislation has been successful in New York and many other states".

For other examples of the tendency to treat uniform acts as merely declaratory of the common law of the state or to ignore them, see Farrington v. Fleming Commission Co., 91 Neb. 108, 142 N.W. 297 (1913), McLain and Norvet v. Torkelson, 197 Iowa 202, 174 N.W. 42 (1919).

UNION TRUST CO. v. MCGINTY

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1912.

212 Mass. 205, 98 N.E. 679, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 525.

RUGG, C. J. The single question presented in this case is whether the accommodation maker of a promissory note is discharged, if the holder, knowing that the note was made for the accommodation of the payee and indorser, by agreement with the indorser upon a valuable consideration, without the maker's consent, extends the time of payment.

Before the enactment of the Negotiable Instruments Act (St. 1898, c. 533; R.L. c. 73, §§ 18-212) one who made a promissory note for the accommodation of another was as between the parties a surety. The holder, who had knowledge of the true relation of the parties, was bound to act toward such accommodation maker as toward a surety in order to preserve his rights against him. Under such circumstances an extension of time to the person ultimately liable, without the consent of the surety, that is the accommodation maker, released the latter. Guild v. Butler, 127 Mass. 386, and cases cited at page 389; Jennings v. Moore, 189 Mass. 197, 75 N.E. 214. The precise point is whether this rule of law has been changed by the Negotiable Instruments Act.

It is matter of common knowledge that the Negotiable Instruments Act was drafted for the purpose of codifying the law upon the subject of negotiable instruments and making it uniform throughout the country through adoption by the Legislatures of the several states and by the Congress of the United States. The design was to obliterate state lines as to the law governing instrumentalities so vital to the conduct of interstate commerce as promissory notes and bills of exchange, to remove the confusion or uncertainty which might arise from conflict of statutes or judicial decisions amongst the several states, and to make plain, certain and general the controlling rules of law. Diversity was to be moulded in uniformity. This act in substance has been adopted by many states. While it does not cover the whole field of negotiable instrument law, it is decisive as to all matters comprehended within its terms. It ought to be interpreted in such a way as to give effect to the beneficent design of the Legislature in passing an act for the promotion of harmony upon an important branch of the law. Simplicity and clearness are ends especially to be sought. The language of the act is to be construed with reference to the object to be attained. Its words are to be given their natural and common meaning, and the prevailing principles of statutory interpretation are to be employed.

Care should be taken to adhere as closely as possible to the obvious meaning of the act, without resort to that which had theretofore been the law of this commonwealth, unless necessary to dissolve obscurity or doubt, especially in instances where there was a difference in the law in the different states. Approaching the act from this point of view, it is apparent that no relation of principal and surety is established or contemplated by any of its sections. It determines the liability of the various parties to the negotiable instrument on the basis of that which is written on the paper. The obligation of all makers, whether for accommodation or otherwise is to pay to the holder for value according to the terms of the bill or note. Their obligation is primary and absolute. Sections 77 and 208. The act makes no provision for the proof of another and different relation than that expressly undertaken and defined by the tenor of the instrument signed. The fact that one is an accommodation maker gives rise to a duty no less or greater or different to the holder for value than that imposed upon a maker who received value. This is expressly provided by the act, even though such holder knew at the time of making that the maker was an accommodation maker. Section 46. The act further provides in definite terms that the instrument and hence one primarily liable is discharged in one of five different ways (section 136); that is, by payment by the principal debtor, or by the party accommodated, by cancellation, by any other act which would discharge a simple contract, and by the principal debtor becoming the owner at or after maturity. There is no mention here of a discharge of an accommodation party by extension of time. But among the ways in which a party secondarily liable may be discharged is (section 137) an agreement by the holder to extend the time of payment or to postpone his right to enforce the instrument "unless made with the assent of the party secondarily liable or unless the right of recourse against such party is expressly reserved." Whatever force might attach to the enumeration of ways in which the instrument and consequently parties primarily liable might be discharged, if this provision stood alone, the inference arising from the omission of extension of time from such enumeration and its inclusion among the ways in which persons secondarily liable may be discharged is almost irresistible that the Legislature did not intend that persons primarily liable should be discharged in that manner. These two sections standing side by side, both dealing with the subject of discharge of liabilities of parties, the one mentioning, the other not mentioning, extension of time by the holder as a means of working discharge of liability, cannot be treated as accidental or without significance. It is strong proof of a legislative purpose to change the pre-existing law of the commonwealth. These considerations outweigh the argument adduced from the fact that the "instrument" rather than "parties primarily liable" is the language used in section 136 and from the phrase of clause 4 to the effect that the instrument may be discharged "by any other act which will discharge a simple contract." The act establishes a liability on the part of an accommodation maker, which is not affected by an extension of time given by the holder to any other party to the note, even though as between such party and the accommodation maker a different relation may subsist in fact from that appearing on the face of the paper. The result is to render somewhat more rigid the rights of the parties as set forth in the written instrument, and so far as the holder is concerned to establish liability to him upon a firm basis, not easily shaken by parol evidence. . . .

This appears to be the view taken without exception by the courts of other jurisdictions which have considered the point. In the interpretation of a statute widely adopted by the states to the end of securing uniformity in a department of commercial law, we should be inclined to give great weight to harmonious decisions of courts of other states, even if we were less clear than we are in this instance as to the soundness of our own conclusion. 1. In Commercial Nat. Bank v. Canal-Louisiana Bank & Trust Co., 239 U.S. 520, 36 S.Ct. 194, 60 L.Ed. 417, Ann.Cas.1917E, 25 (1915). Hughes J., said: "It is apparent that if these uniform acts are construed in the several states adopting them according to former local views upon analogous subjects, we shall miss the desired uniformity, and we shall erect upon the foundation of uniform language separate legal structures as distinct as were the former varying laws. It was to prevent this result that the uniform warehouse receipts act expressly provides (§ 57): 'This act shall be so interpreted and construed as to effectuate its general purpose to make uniform the law of those states which enact it.' This rule of construction requires that in order to accomplish the beneficent object of unifying, so far as this is possible under our dual system, the commercial law of the country, there should be taken into consideration the fundamental purpose of the uniform act, and that it should not be regarded merely as an offshoot of local law. . . . We think that the principle of the uniform act should have recognition to the exclusion of any inconsistent doctrine which may have previously obtained in any of the states enacting it. . . ."

3. See Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 102 Va. 753, 47 S.E. 837 (1904); and Wettlaufer v. Baxter, 137 Ky. 362, 125 S.W. 741 (1910). In the latter case the issue was whether a note which had not been made payable to "order" or to "bearer" was negotiable. The court held that it was not, saying: "The negotiable instrument act is not a new law. It is with few exceptions merely the codification of old laws that were in force and effect by virtue of judicial pronouncement or legislative enactment, and generally uniform. In many of the states, including our own, there was very little statutory law on the subject of bills and notes previous to the passage of this act. Some of these statutes were not uniform, nor indeed were the opinions of the courts altogether in harmony. And so, to remove the confusion and uncertainty that was caused in commercial affairs by the lack of uniformity in legislative enactments and harmony in judicial opinions, a committee of gentlemen learned in the commercial law prepared the negotiable instrument act, not with a view of making any radical changes in the law as generally understood and administered, but to remove the doubt as well as conflict that had in some instances come into existence from difference in statutory laws as well as court opinions. The result of their labors was the present Act, which has become the law in a large majority of the states. And looking to the intention of the law and the purpose of its preparation and enactment; if there is doubt about the meaning of any of its provisions, and that doubt can be solved by a reference to the law merchant as it was heretofore administered, this law should be looked to, and the act if practicable given such a construction as will make it harmonize with the general principles of commercial law in force before its enactment." But cf. Holliday State Bank v. Hoffman, 85 Kan. 71, 116 P. 239 (1911), in which a note containing a promise to furnish additional security if the original security depreciated in value was held nonnegotiable. The court said: "The adoption in recent years of the Negotiable Instruments Law by so many of the states was in response to the general desire for uniformity in respect to commercial paper. The application, however, by the courts of legal principles to particular facts has not reached scientific exactness, and never will. It is hardly to be expected, therefore, that the courts of the different states which have adopted the act will always agree in the construction and application of its provisions. Actual uniformity in the law of negotiable instruments will remain a dream more or less iridescent; substantial uniformity is all that can be hoped for. The conclusions we have reached with respect to the instrument in question are in harmony with the former decisions of this court and accord with our view of the proper construction to be given to the language of the statute."

ROGER SHERMAN HOAR, UNIFORMITY OF UNIFORM LAWS

28 Marq.L.Rev. 32 (1944).

A recent amendment of section 11 of the Uniform Conditional Sales Act, Sec. 122.11 of the Wisconsin Statutes, by the Legislature, for the apparent purpose of destroying its uniformity, has run counter to the judicial principle of uniformity of uniform laws, and hence may have failed to achieve non-uniformity.

The principle of uniformity is stated as follows in a very recent opinion of the U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals of the Seventh Circuit, which Circuit embraces Wisconsin:

"In the interpretation of . . . uniform laws, the decisions of other jurisdictions on such points as have not been decided by the courts of the forum, are not merely persuasive, but are as binding as would be a decision of the highest court of the forum."

So important do the Courts consider this principle of uniformity, that it has even been applied to restore to uniformity a section of uniform law which had been mutilated by a legislature.

An example of this occurred in Arizona. Under the authority of Chap. 35 of the Session Laws of 1925, the statutes of that State were codified, and the codifiers unfortunately made no distinction between uniform laws and non-uniform laws in their attempts at "improving" the language. Sec. 5 of the Uniform Conditional Sales Act provided that a contract of conditional sale is void as against rights of certain third parties which attach before the contract is filed, but that filing within ten days after making the sale shall relate back as to intervening rights. The revisers either wholly misinterpreted this ten-day proviso or thought that an idea of their own was better. At any rate, they changed it to read that the contract would be void as to all persons except the buyer, unless filed within the ten days.

The first necessity for judicially interpreting this change arose in a suit in Kansas, rather than in Arizona. A conditional sale contract of an automobile sold in Arizona had been filed in the proper county of Arizona, but not until fourteen days after the sale. The car was then illegally sold by the conditional vendee outside Arizona, and eventually found its way into Kansas, in the hands of a person from whom an assignee of the original vendor sought to replevy it.

The Supreme Court of Kansas applied the principle of uniformity to the Arizona law, in spite of its perfectly clear and categorical non-uniform language, held that the filing had been timely, and awarded the car to the plaintiff.

The same question later came up in another suit, this time in Arizona itself. The Supreme Court of Arizona cited the above Kansas opinion, quoting the syllabus thereof as follows:

"Notwithstanding statute making conditional sale void as to others than buyer if not recorded within ten days, belated recording protects rights of holder as against one acquiring interest after recordation."

The Arizona Court then purported to find an ambiguity in the amended section, and hence an opportunity to construe the section in the interests of uniformity, instead of cutting the Gordian knot as the Kansas Court had done.

The effect of the Castenada case is considerably weakened by the fact that the Arizona revisers did such a poor job that the Supreme Court of Arizona has repeatedly felt called upon to restore the original meaning of the statutes, even as to non-uniform laws. However, I believe that these cases can be distinguished in two respects: (1) the Castenada opinion expressly mentioned and relied upon the doctrine of uniformity; (2) in all the cases the Court asserted that a clearly intended change would stand, and that they would revert to the original meaning only in event of ambiguity, and yet in the Castenada case the pressure of the doctrine of uniformity caused the Court to call ambiguous an instance of clear change. . . .

1 Ark.L.Rev. 122-124, 128, 131-134, 137-140 (1947).

The Uniform Sales Act became effective in Arkansas nearly six years ago.¹ On only one occasion has the Arkansas Supreme Court made reference to the Act. The case, decided in 1946, was Hydrotex Industries v. Floyd,² in which the seller sued for the price of some roofing supplied to the buyer, and the buyer counter-claimed for damages on the ground that the roofing was unfit for the purpose for which it was sold. The seller's attorney contended that the clause of the Uniform Sales Act, providing for the implication of the warranty of fitness, was unconstitutional as an impairment of the obligation of the contract sued upon. The Court disposed of this contention by pointing out that the warranty of fitness for purpose in the particular case could just as well be implied at common law as under the Sales Act. The Court added, however, that it knew of no case in any jurisdiction holding any provision of the Uniform Sales Act unconstitutional and referred to a Michigan case³ as holding that the Act did not interfere with the right to contract.

One might wonder why the Act has thus far been referred to so infrequently by the highest court, since in most states adopting the Act, especially the larger commercial states like New York, courts have cited provisions of the Act much more frequently. One explanation might be simply the habit of lawyers of looking to common law principles. In support of such an explanation it is interesting to note that in several other recent cases the Court applied general principles of the law of sales, recognized in the Sales Act and at common law alike, without express reference to the applicable sections of the Act. Of course, should counsel fail to call the Court's attention to an applicable provision of the Act, the Court might see no occasion to refer to the provision in its opinion. A somewhat different avenue of conjecture suggests that lack of litigation concerning various provisions of the Act does not necessarily point to its lack of usefulness. On the contrary, in many instances reference to a definite and clear provision in the statute (really a codification and clarification of existing, though sometimes rather vague and uncertain, principles already developed by the courts) might conceivably have avoided litigation, or, perhaps, needless appeal to the highest court from an unfavorable determination below. . . .

Minn.Stat.1945, § 645.22, reads: "Laws uniform with those of other states shall be interpreted and construed to effect their general purpose to make uniform the laws of those states which enact them."

SECTION 8. INTERSTATE COMPACTS

RICHARD HARTSHORNE, INTER-GOVERNMENTAL CO-OPERATION—THE WAY OUT

2 U. of New Jersey L.Rev. 1 (1930).

Some Legal Aspects of Inter-Governmental Cooperation.—There are few unique legal questions raised by the use of the methods of voluntary administrative interaction and uniform reciprocal legislation. However, due largely to the compact and contract clauses in the United States Constitution,⁷ many such points arise in the use of the compact method and such points seem largely unknown alike to the ordinary practitioner of the law and the student of political economy.

Since the foundation of this country there have been some eighty-six separate interstate compacts negotiated. Of these, sixty-eight were with express congressional consent, eighteen without such express consent, of which note will be taken later. Of these compacts, thirty-seven dealt with interstate boundaries, the remainder with the control of navigation, conservation of natural resources, crime, taxation, and certain other joint projects.

It would unduly extend the length of this article to attempt to set forth all of the compacts entered into under all of the above topics. Moreover, this is unnecessary, since lists of such compacts have been set forth in the past in various publications.⁸ But it may be helpful to allude to certain features in existing or proposed compacts, particularly as they affect, or may affect New Jersey.⁹ In the first place the courts have repeatedly stated their views as to the great value of interstate compacts as a means for efficient governmental control. When, after ten years of litigation, the United States Supreme Court finally had before it the case brought by New York against New Jersey, as to the dumping of the Passaic Valley sewer output into New York Bay, that tribunal said that the problem was "One more likely to be wisely solved by cooperative study and by conference and mutual concession on the part of representatives of the states which are vitally interested, than by proceedings in any court however construed."¹⁰ This view has been several times expressed in other cases before that court.¹¹ From the practical standpoint, when it comes to carrying out a course of action, it should be quite evident that all that litigation can do is to have the court determine a set of principles. When it comes to action—the carrying out of principles—then the parties themselves must be guided; and not only an agreement in regard to the principles which are so to guide, but the setting up of an authority so to act, is the most efficient and practical means known. This may be done best by compact.

In ascertaining the legal principles upon which interstate compacts are based, we must primarily revert to the provisions of the federal Constitution which permits them. It is there provided in Article 1, Section 10, clause 1, "No state shall enter into any treaty, alliance or confederation . . .," and in clause 3, "No state shall without the consent of Congress . . . enter into any agreement or compact with another state or with a foreign power." We thus see that a treaty is forbidden, while a compact, with congressional consent, is permitted, in view of the settled doctrine that the states retain the residuum of power not otherwise covered by the Constitution.

The distinction between a prohibited treaty and a permitted compact was well brought out in the leading case of Virginia v. Tennessee,¹² where the court had before it the validity of a compact between the two states as to their boundary line. It there said, that the prohibition against treaties, alliances and confederations was directed against "the formation of any confederations tending to the increase of political power in the states, which may encroach upon or interfere with the just supremacy of the United States." Conversely "compacts not compromising the supremacy of the United States over the several states or the equality of the states among themselves may be made with the consent of Congress."¹³ Congress can, of course, grant or withhold its assent within its discretion, so that the federal government has the final word as to the effectuation of any true compact. Of course, there are decisions in certain state courts, which seem to indicate that under some circumstances the assent of Congress to a compact is unnecessary.¹⁴ But none of these cases reached the federal courts, and in those cases in the United States Supreme Court, where there is language indicating that such congressional consent is in certain instances unnecessary, such language is pure dicta, made unnecessary to the decision, by the fact that congressional consent actually existed by implication.¹⁵ In addition, in several of such cases, the facts apparently indicate that there was no real contract or agreement, but merely executive interaction between the states of a cooperative nature, without the creation of any binding obligation. In any event the doctrine, that even in a very limited class of cases congressional consent is unnecessary, is an extremely dangerous one, as it may perchance invalidate a compact when otherwise fully negotiated. Finally, such a doctrine is to all intents and purposes of purely academic interest, because Congress has never refused, as yet, to ratify or assent to any compact proposed by the states.

Ordinarily, the consent of Congress is given after the compact has itself been negotiated and ratified by the states, so that its terms may be known to the Congress before its cooperation is asked. However, there is apparently nothing in the language of the Constitution which prevents such consent being given in advance, and such consent has been so given by the Congress on more than one occasion. Note to this effect the Crime Control Consent Act,¹⁶ the Federal Forest Conservation Consent, and the federal consent to interstate compacts dealing with boundaries and interstate criminal jurisdiction over boundary waters.¹⁷ It is peculiar that neither of these two latter acts have ever been taken advantage of by the states.

However, such consent need not be express, but may be implied from federal action in other respects. Such was held to be the case in the decision of Virginia v. Tennessee,¹⁸ where previous congressional action, creating federal district courts and setting up post offices in the disputed area, was held sufficient to show the intent of Congress to adopt the boundary line, as fixed by the compact between the two states, so that such compact had thus been validly assented to by Congress, even in the absence of any express federal legislative assent. To the same effect see the case of Wharton v. Wise,¹⁹ as to the fisheries compact between Maryland and Virginia.

Since, as seen above, ordinary legislation creating post offices and federal judicial districts, which does not expressly refer or consent to a compact, may by implication constitute a valid consent thereto; a fortiori, if ordinary legislation does directly refer to a compact, showing assent thereto, it should constitute a valid consent thereto. Moreover, the Supreme Court has already held that this matter of congressional consent is not a mere matter of form, but is an act by the federal government which is to be effective, if it is to be anything at all.²⁰ If then, in order to make the compact between the states effective, federal aid in the form of supporting legislation is deemed necessary, clearly such legislation will constitute a valid congressional consent to the compact. That federal legislative aid is valid in the enforcement of state policies, has already been determined in a series of cases,²¹ though it would not seem that the mere federal power to consent to an interstate compact could add to the federal legislative power on a subject-matter otherwise outside congressional jurisdiction.

A compact between the states is a contract, the obligation of which the states are forbidden by the Constitution to impair.²² While the decision on this point was mere dicta, such was the very basis of the holdings in the series of cases between Virginia and West Virginia, requiring West Virginia to pay its proportion of the debts of the State of Virginia, as they originally stood, in accordance with the compact between the two states.²³ The question, of course, arises, as to whether or not the doctrine is applicable, that the police power is an implied term of any contract entered into by a state, and that, arguendo, the later exertion of the police power by the state, contrary to the express terms of the interstate compact, would not be an impairment of its obligations, but merely the enforcement of such implied term.²⁴ But all of these cases, as to the later exertion by a state of its police power, in apparent contradiction of the express terms of its contract, have been cases where such power was exerted, as to one who was subject to such police power, such as a resident of the state. It would hardly seem that a state's police power could apply to another state or to the United States, both of which are outside its jurisdiction. As to such other sovereignties, the police power of a state does not exist as a sovereign power, but as an ordinary power, such as that which one individual has in dealing with another. As to such powers, contractual obligations are binding. Moreover, the status of a state in regard to the fact that its compacts apply both internally and externally, would seem quite comparable to the status of the federal government in regard to the binding effect of its treaties with a foreign power. While as a matter of national law, the federal government can change its mind at its own volition, as a matter of international law, it is bound to live up to its treaty obligations with another power, and may be held responsible therefor, whether by warlike or peaceful means.²⁵ But, if a state impairs the obligation of an interstate compact, any action of such state accordingly, even within the state itself, would doubtless be held unconstitutional and void as in contravention of the contract clause.

Moreover, an interstate compact would seem to be binding, not only upon the states party thereto, but also upon parties whose rights are subject thereto. For instance, when Virginia and Pennsylvania entered into a compact as to their boundary line, the fixing of such boundary line affected the title to certain private lands. The United States Supreme Court held that such compact was binding in regard to such title.²⁶ However, this question as to the binding effect of such compact on the party states seems almost academic. For no compact will be wisely effectuated in the future without inserting terms providing for its continuance in effect for a fixed period of time, subject to an intermediate right of withdrawal by either party on due notice.

Finally, the right of one state, with congressional consent, to grant to another, jurisdiction, either civil or criminal, and either for the purposes of serving process or otherwise, within the territory of the first state, has been repeatedly adjudicated upon and upheld. Such has been the effect of the decisions of the courts as to the early compact in 1833 between New York and New Jersey as to the Hudson River boundary line,²⁷ and has also been held by the United States Supreme Court and a series of western state courts as to compacts concerning such boundary waters.²⁸

THE STATES COOPERATE

Foreword to The Handbook on Interstate Crime Control, prepared by the Interstate Commission on Crime (1912), 12-13.

More than three-fourths of our states have recently established an improved method of protecting their citizens from crime. This handbook presents that method.

The Interstate Commission on Crime was established on October 12, 1935. On that date, in Trenton, N. J., officially appointed representatives of the states and the federal government met together at the Interstate Conference on Crime. The purpose of the conference was to discuss ways and means of overcoming loopholes in the criminal laws which worked to the advantage of the criminal and against the interests of society. The existence of many of these loopholes in our law-enforcement structure had been brought out at the Attorney General's Conference on Crime held in Washington, D. C., in December of 1934, at the call of Attorney General Homer Cummings, whose active interest in crime control has been notable. Immediate attention was first paid to that vast field which has been so aptly dubbed the "No-Man's Land" of crime control, existing intermediate the jurisdiction of a single state and that of the federal government. Such is the case, for instance, in the extradition of defendants and the removal of witnesses from state to state, where the interests of two states are concerned, as distinguished from the interests of the federal government or of a single state. Similar is the situation regarding the control of firearms, where the acquisition of a pistol by a criminal in one state all too often results in its use in a holdup in another state. Both such separate anti-social acts are local, and thus under state, not federal, control, yet they cannot be controlled by a single state, as they occur in different jurisdictions.

At this, the first Interstate Conference on Crime to be held in this country, the official delegates from the states and the federal government agreed to establish the Interstate Commission on Crime as an official organization, representative of all forty-nine of the sovereignties. From that day to this everyone of the 48 states, as well as the Federal Government, has appointed its official representatives to serve on the Interstate Commission on Crime. These Commissioners serve without pay, the expenses of the Commission itself being borne solely by the states themselves. The federal government is actively represented on this commission because of its interest in cooperative crime control, not only among the states themselves, but between the states and the federal government. The point is, that the public cannot be properly protected from crime or other evils without the joint aid of all governmental agencies concerned, and, indeed, unless the interest and support is assured of the public itself.

As the work of the Commission has proceeded, it has become increasingly apparent that there is a definite need for a reference book in the field of interstate crime control, which will have within its covers copies of the uniform laws drafted and recommended by the Commission, the regulations called for thereunder, the legal forms for their proper enforcement, and other similar basic sources of information for ready reference by the great number of officials engaged in the field of crime control. This handbook places in the hands of Federal, State, and local officials, and other interested parties, the material developed along the above lines during the past few years. . . .

Without the pioneer work done in the field of uniform crime legislation by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, this book could not have recorded all the advances made to date. The uniform commissioners drafted the original uniform extradition act, the uniform witnesses act, the uniform firearms act, and the uniform narcotic drug act. The acts on such subjects, as they appear in this book, are based on these original acts, but embody important changes made in the light of actual experience throughout the United States since their original drafting. The cooperation of the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws and their generous attitude in accepting amendments to their basic legislation is but further evidence of the unselfishness of their service to the public during the past forty years.

In this connection the Commission should publicly record its gratitude to the many law schools of the country with whose aid the Commission was enabled to draft the legislation printed herein, to accord with present crime control conditions. Similarly there should be noted the aid afforded it along their respective lines by the advisory organizations to the Commission, which include the American Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology, American Judicature Society, American Law Institute, American Prison Association, National Probation Association, The Osborne Association, Inc., and The Western Parole and Probation Conference. Further, particular credit should go to the American Legion, the American Bar Association, and the National Association of Attorneys General, not only for their endorsement of the Commission's four-point program, but for their active aid in achieving the unique result of having the whole or part of this program enacted into law by more than half the states of the country within the short space of two years. . . .

THE UNIFORM ENABLING ACT

(Contains the exact wording of the Interstate Compact for Parolee and Probationer Supervision)

An Act providing that the state of ——— may enter into a compact with any of the United States for mutual helpfulness in relation to persons convicted of crime or offenses who may be on probation or parole.

Be it enacted, etc.:

Section 1. The governor of this state is hereby authorized and directed to execute a compact on behalf of the state of ——— with any of the United States legally joining therein in the form substantially as follows:

A Compact

Entered into by and among the contracting states, signatories hereto, with the consent of the Congress of the United States of America, granted by an act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to any two or more states to enter into agreements or compacts for cooperative effort and mutual assistance in the prevention of crime and for other purposes."

The contracting states solemnly agree:

(1) That it shall be competent for the duly constituted judicial and administrative authorities of a state party to this compact (herein called "sending state"), to permit any person convicted of an offense within such state and placed on probation or released on parole to reside in any other state party to this compact (herein called "receiving state"), while on probation or parole, if

(a) Such person is in fact a resident of or has his family residing within the receiving state and can obtain employment there;

(b) Though not a resident of the receiving state and not having his family residing there, the receiving state consents to such person being sent there.

Before granting such permission, opportunity shall be granted to the receiving state to investigate the home and prospective employment of such person.

A resident of the receiving state, within the meaning of this section, is one who has been an actual inhabitant of such state continuously for more than one year prior to his coming to the sending state and has not resided within the sending state more than six continuous months immediately preceding the commission of the offense for which he has been convicted.

(2) That each receiving state will assume the duties of visitation of and supervision over probationers or parolees of any sending state and in the exercise of those duties will be governed by the same standards that prevail for its own probationers and parolees.

(3) That duly accredited officers of a sending state may at all times enter a receiving state and there apprehend and retake any person on probation or parole. For that purpose no formalities will be required other than establishing the authority of the officer and the identity of the person to be retaken. All legal requirements to obtain extradition of fugitives from justice are hereby expressly waived on the part of states party hereto, as to such persons. The decision of the sending state to retake a person on probation or parole shall be conclusive upon and not reviewable within the receiving state: Provided, however, That if at the time when a state seeks to retake a probationer or parolee there should be pending against him within the receiving state any criminal charge, or he should be suspected of having committed within such state a criminal offense, he shall not be retaken without the consent of the receiving state until discharged from prosecution or from imprisonment for such offense.

(4) That the duly accredited officers of the sending state will be permitted to transport prisoners being retaken through any and all states parties to this compact, without interference.

(5) That the governor of each state may designate an officer who, acting jointly with like officers of other contracting states, if and when appointed, shall promulgate such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary to more effectively carry out the terms of this compact.

(6) That this compact shall become operative immediately upon its execution by any state as between it and any other state or states so executing. When executed it shall have the full force and effect of law within such state, the form of execution to be in accordance with the laws of the executing state.

(7) That this compact shall continue in force and remain binding upon each executing state until renounced by it. The duties and obligations hereunder of a renouncing state shall continue as to parolees or probationers residing therein at the time of withdrawal until retaken or finally discharged by the sending state. Renunciation of this compact shall be by the same authority which executed it, by sending six months' notice in writing of its intention to withdraw from the compact to the other state party hereto.

Sec. 2. If any section, sentence, subdivision or clause of this act is for any reason held invalid or to be unconstitutional, such decision shall not affect the validity of the remaining portions of this act.

Sec. 3. Whereas, an emergency exists for the immediate taking effect of this act, the same shall become effective immediately upon its passage.

Sec. 4. This act may be cited as the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision.

EX PARTE TENNER

Supreme Court of California, 1942. 20 Cal.2d 670, 128 P.2d 338.

EDMONDS, JUSTICE. The question presented for decision by the petitioner's application for a writ of habeas corpus concerns the constitutionality of the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision. (Stats. 1937, p. 469; Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 5783.) He is held by the respondent Chief of Police pursuant to the direction of the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles of the State of Washington as a convict whose parole has been revoked.

It appears that after his conviction of a felony and sentence to serve five years in the Washington State Penitentiary, the petitioner was granted a parole, and, in connection therewith, permission to come to this State. Later, the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles revoked his parole and ordered that he be returned to the penitentiary. Following his arrest upon the order of this board, he filed in the Superior Court a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Upon the denial of his petition, he applied to the United States Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari. That court denied the writ, but issued its order prohibiting the State of California from removing Tenner, or permitting him to be removed from the state, pending the filing by him of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus in this court and a determination of the issues presented by it.

The Constitution of the United States provides that, without its consent, no state shall enter into any agreement or compact with another state. (Art. 1, sec. 10). Recognizing this constitutional prohibition, in 1934, the Congress of the United States enacted a statute which reads as follows: "The consent of Congress is hereby given to any two or more States to enter into agreements or compacts for cooperative effort and mutual assistance in the prevention of crime and in the enforcement of their respective criminal laws and policies, and to establish such agencies, joint or otherwise, as they may deem desirable for making effective such agreements and compacts." (48 Stats. 909, 18 U.S.C.A. sec. 420, 1941 Supp.)

A majority of the states, including California and Washington, have enacted the Uniform Act for Out-of-State Parolee Supervision, supra,

The petitioner contends that the compact authorized by these statutes is unconstitutional in that it is repugnant to the provisions of Article IV, Section 2, clause 2 of the United States Constitution and to section 5278 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (18 U.S.C.A. sec. 662) providing for the extradition of fugitives from justice. More specifically, the petitioner contends that extradition is the sole means by which an alleged fugitive may be rendered up by one state to another. He also argues that the compact is contrary to the provisions of Article I, section 10, clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States providing that no state shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another state, and, finally, that it deprives the petitioner of his liberty without due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

The respondent takes the position that the legislation under attack does not violate any constitutional provision. On the contrary, he justifies the compact as one expressly authorized by the act of Congress relating to agreements between states (supra). He also argues that the congressional act may be deemed a statute empowering the states to enter into mutual compacts for the interstate transportation of criminals in aid of the enforcement of their penal laws under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. In addition, the respondent contends that the state has the right, under its police powers reserved by the Tenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, to exclude from its borders convicts and fugitives from justice.

The administration of parole is an integral part of criminal justice, having as its object the rehabilitation of those convicted of crime and the protection of the community. Unquestionably such rehabilitation of a parolee may often be facilitated by transferring him to another state, with new surroundings and better opportunities for employment. It is apparent, however, that the success of such out-of-state transfers requires adequate control and intelligent supervision of parolees during the period of their readjustment to civil life. And from the standpoint of the protection of society, there is sound reason for an agreement between states that the authority over parolees should follow them across state lines. The knowledge on the part of the out-of-state parolee that he may summarily be returned to prison for any violation of the rules which he has agreed to obey undoubtedly is an effective check upon any inclination to violate parole.

The compact represents the social policy of both California and Washington in this regard. It is an agreement for cooperative effort and mutual assistance in the prevention of crime and in the enforcement of the criminal laws of each state within the contemplation of the federal legislation and therefore does not violate the prohibition of the Constitution concerning compacts between states.

Nor does the act of the respondent deprive the petitioner of his liberty without due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. He had his day in court when he was tried and convicted of a felony and sentenced to a maximum term of five years in the Washington State Penitentiary. The parole which he accepted was granted upon the express condition that the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles "may at any time within its discretion and without notice cause the parolee to be returned to the said institution to serve the full maximum sentence or any part thereof." One convicted of crime has the right to reject an offer of parole, but once having elected to accept parole, the parolee is bound by the express terms of his conditional release. In re Peterson, 14 Cal. 2d 82, 92 P.2d 890.

The most serious question presented by the petitioner is his contention that Article IV, section 2, clause 2, of the United States Constitution providing for the extradition of criminals and the act of Congress carrying that constitutional provision into effect constitute the sole method by which a parolee whose parole has been revoked may be returned to the state in which he was convicted. . . .

It has been held that a convict whose parole has been revoked is a fugitive from justice within the meaning of this statute, even though he entered the asylum state with the consent of the paroling authorities, and is subject to return to the demanding state by extradition proceedings. In re McBride, 101 Cal.App. 251, 281 P. 651; for cases from other jurisdictions see notes in 78 A.L.R. 419, 8 A.L.R. 903.

The validity of legislation in aid of the act of Congress concerning extradition is now well established (Denison v. Christian, 196 U.S. 637, 25 S.Ct. 795, 49 L.Ed. 630, affirming 72 Neb. 703, 101 N.W. 1045, 117 Am.St.Rep. 817; Ex parte White, 49 Cal. 433; Kurtz v. State, 22 Fla. 36, 1 Am.St.Rep. 173; Ex parte Ammons, 34 Ohio 518; Ex parte Romanes, 1 Utah 23) and it has been held that a state may legislate upon a subject of extradition unprovided for because Congress failed to extend Section 5278 of the Revised Statutes to the full limits of constitutional power. Innes v. Tobin, 240 U.S. 127, 36 S.Ct. 290, 60 L.Ed. 562. . . .

Prior to the adoption of the Constitution, the states or colonies regulated the return of fugitives by agreement. If no compact existed between the demanding state and the asylum state, an escaped prisoner might remain in the asylum state with impunity. The question then is, did the framers of the Constitution intend to prevent the states from entering into agreements for the return of prisoners, or did they intend only to provide a federal procedure which would not necessarily be an exclusive one.

The Supreme Court of the United States succinctly stated the purpose of the constitutional provision concerning extradition in two early cases. In the first of these, after an exhaustive discussion of its history and purpose, the court said: "it is manifest that the statesmen who framed the Constitution were fully sensible, that from the complex character of the government, it must fail unless the states mutually supported each other and the general government; and that nothing would be more likely to disturb its peace, and end in discord, than permitting an offender against the laws of a state, by passing over a mathematical line which divides it from another, to defy its process, and stand ready, under the protection of the state, to repeat the offense as soon as another opportunity offered," (Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. 100, 16 L.Ed. 717.) "The sole object of the provision of the Constitution and the act of Congress to carry it into effect", the court reiterated a short time later, "is to secure the surrender of persons accused of crime, who have fled from the justice of a state, whose laws they are charged with violating. . . . No purpose or intention is manifested to afford them any immunity or protection from trial and punishment for any offenses committed in the state from which they flee." Lascelles v. Georgia, 148 U.S. 537, 542, 13 S.Ct. 687, 689, 37 L.Ed. 549.

Except for Section 2 of Article IV of the Constitution, there would be no question concerning the right of states to provide, by their joint agreement, for the return of a certain class of fugitives, subject, of course, to the constitutional provision regarding interstate compacts. The right created by Article IV, it has been held, is a guarantee of which a state may avail itself to secure the return of an offender against its law. State v. Parrish, Ala., 5 So.2d 828, 832; Ex Parte Roberts, 186 Wash. 13, 56 P.2d 703. And since the extradition provision is not for the benefit of the fugitive, an asylum state may require the governor to surrender a fugitive on terms less exacting than those imposed by the act of Congress. State ex rel. Treseder v. Remann, 165 Wash. 92, 4 P.2d 866, 78 A.L.R. 412. As authority to require the return of fugitives originally existed in the states and remains there except as expressly limited by the Constitution, even in the field of federal extradition, the act of Congress is not exclusive of state action which does not come within its express terms. On the contrary, said the Supreme Court of the United States, it must have been intended to leave subjects within the constitutional power and not provided for by that statute subject to the state authority which then controlled them. (Innes v. Tobin, supra.) Neither the terms of the constitutional provision nor the act of Congress making it effective indicate that the extradition procedure was intended to be exclusive. . . .

The existence of an independent method of securing the return of out-of-state parolees does not conflict with nor render ineffectual the Federal laws with relation to extradition. The federal method of extradition is always present and may be invoked when necessary to secure the right to return of the fugitive to the demanding state. Also states not party to the interstate compact are free to invoke that procedure to secure the return of fugitive parolees. And if a state has elected to follow the federal procedure and claim the constitutional guarantee, the fugitive of course has the right to insist, on habeas corpus, that the procedure conform to the federal law. Similarly the parolee detained under the interstate compact has the right to complain, by means of habeas corpus, if that law is not complied with by the authorities. But no right exists on the part of the parolee, whose parole has been revoked, to claim that he may only be removed by the method of his choosing. And since the statute applies uniformly to all parolees from states party to the compact, the petitioner may not complain that the statute deprives him of the equal protection of the laws. Caskey Baking Co. v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 313 U.S. 117, 61 S. Ct. 881, 85 L.Ed. 1223; Williams v. Arkansas, 217 U.S. 79, 30 S.Ct. 493, 54 L.Ed. 673, 18 Ann.Cas. 865; Field v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 194 U.S. 618, 621, 24 S.Ct. 784, 48 L.Ed. 1142; Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. May, 194 U.S. 267, 24 S.Ct. 638, 48 L.Ed. 971; *Tinsley v. VARIOUS MEANS FOR MAKING LAWS EFFECTIVE

SECTION 1. LIMITATIONS ON EFFECTIVE LAW MAKING

ROSCOE POUND, THE LIMITS OF EFFECTIVE LEGAL ACTION

3 A.B.A.Jour. 55, 27 Int.J.Eth. 150 (1917).

A student of the political institutions of republican Rome is continually impelled to wonder how any people could carry on a great government under a system involving so much division of authority, so many vetoes, so many collegiate magistracies, and so complex a system of checks. In less degree as one studies the British constitution, as it was in the last century, the unwritten constitution, the government by custom and precedent, the respect for traditional lines between authorities and magistracies with large potentialities of theoretical jurisdiction, he can but wonder how an empire could be governed in such loose fashion. Even our American separation of powers and local self-government as they existed in full vigor in the last century nowadays awaken similar reflections in the student of political science. And it must be noted that the Roman system was only possible among a homogeneous, law-abiding people, living a simple life, and broke down in the heterogeneous, undisciplined, luxurious world-state of the Roman empire. Likewise the British system shows signs of great strain under the unwonted conditions of the present century, and our own worked much better in rural, agricultural, pioneer America of the nineteenth century than in the urban, industrial America of today.

What is true of political institutions is no less true of legal institutions. One can but marvel how the Roman law of Cicero's time, with its crude enforcing agencies, its crude methods of reviewing decisions, its crude methods of instructing tribunals as to the law, could ever have maintained itself, much less have developed into a law of the world. It could not have done so, indeed, except among a disciplined, homogeneous people, zealous to know the law and to obey it. For when men demand little of law, and enforcement of law is but enforcement of the ethical minimum necessary for the orderly conduct of society, enforcement of law involves few difficulties. All but the inevitable anti-social residuum can understand the simple program and obvious purposes of such a legal system, and enforcement requires nothing more than a strong and reasonably stable political organization. On the other hand, when men demand much of law, when they seek to devolve upon it the whole burden of social control, they seek to make it do the work of the home and of the church, enforcement of law comes to involve many difficulties. Then few can comprehend the whole field of the law, nor can they do so at one glance. The purposes of the legal system are not all upon the surface, and it may be that many whose nature is by no means anti-social are out of accord with some or even with many of these purposes. Hence today, in the wake of ambitious social programs calling for more and more interference with every relation of life, dissatisfaction with law, criticism of legal and judicial institutions, and suspicion as to the purposes of the lawyer become universal.

Complaint of non-enforcement begins, indeed, in primitive law, when political authority is weak and there are persons or groups in the community too masterful for the nascent state to control effectively. This situation does not wholly disappear. Even today there are groups which at times prove able to over-awe administrative authorities and to thwart the equal administration of justice. But in general the causes of non-enforcement of law in modern times are more complex. Today, for the most part, they grow out of over-ambitious plans to regulate every phase of human action by law, they are involved in continual resort to law to supply the deficiencies of other agencies of social control, they spring from attempts to govern by means of law things which in their nature do not admit of objective treatment and external coercion.

Whatever ideas jurists may entertain as to law-making, at present the layman's philosophy of law-making is voluntaristic. The layman believes that law may be made. He believes that law is a product of the will of the law-maker. Accordingly, whenever he wills something that he would like to see enforced upon his neighbor, he essays to make law freely. We may grant that there is something to be said for the layman's views as to law-making as a needed reaction from the theories of legislative and juristic futility which prevailed in the nineteenth century. We may grant, if you will, that jurists would do well to acquire some part of the modern faith in the efficacy of conscious effort. Very likely if the lawyer were to acquire something of the layman's voluntaristic theory of law-making, and the layman to absorb some of the lawyer's reliance upon finding law and skepticism as to making law, it might be a useful exchange. But that is another story. The point for our present purpose is that the great activity of modern legislatures has made enforcement of law an acute problem. It has compelled us to turn to all manner of new enforcing agencies, such as inspectors, boards and commissions, while at the same time putting a severe strain upon our old enforcing agencies. In the past we have been much concerned with the abstract justice of legal rules but have been concerned little or not at all as to their enforcement. Today we are almost willing to throw over our hard-won justice according to law in order to bring about speedy and vigorous application of new types of rules securing new interests. For example, modern statutes setting up public service commissions or industrial commissions very generally reject the common-law rules of evidence. Not only this but some of them, at least as interpreted, seem to require commissions to found their awards upon testimony which no common-law court would regard as a sufficient basis for judicial action. Again we are reverting in some degree to the crude methods of rough-and-ready adjustment of controversies imposed on primitive law by the desire for peace at any price. We have to go back to the tariffs of compositions in primitive codes, to such provisions of the beginnings of law as the "for every nail a shilling" of Ethelbert's dooms, to find an example of mechanical valuations in advance such as form the staple of modern Workmen's Compensation Acts. But our enforcing machinery, staggering under a heavy burden as it is, was not equal to the task of speedy ascertainment of an exact reparation in every case under a novel theory of liability. In other words, the problem how to enforce the law is closely connected with the question how far all that we style law and seek to give effect as law is capable of enforcement; and when we look into the history of the subject we soon come to see that much of this problem of enforcing law is in reality a problem of the intrinsic limitations upon effective legal action.

As the chancellor would have the law of his court in no wise different from the law of God, and hence sought to make all moral duties into legal duties, so today the law-maker would protect all the wider human interests which are clamoring for recognition by putting legal rules behind them and would enact into law everything which an enlightened social program indicates as a desirable ideal. Accordingly, we begin to hear complaint that laws are not enforced and the forgotten problem of the limitations upon effective legal action once more becomes acute. Complaint of non-enforcement of law is nothing new. It is as old as the law and has been heard in this country from the beginning. But it is significant that in America such complaint has been heard chiefly in connection with the extravagant translations of Puritanical ideas of conduct into penal codes, known as blue laws, and the voluminous social legislation of today. It is significant also that the world over such complaint has been heard chiefly in periods when the law was seeking ambitiously to cover the whole field of social control, or in transitions to such periods. It is not an accident that the problem of application and enforcement of law has come to be regarded as the central one in the legal science of Continental Europe. If Anglo-American jurists are still thrashing the old straw of disputes as to the nature of law we must not be deceived. Those who must keep their eyes upon the law in action are discussing application and enforcement no less than the jurists of Europe. Such non-legal volumes as the proceedings of the Association for Labor Legislation and of the National Conference of Charities and Corrections tell the true tale of the significant question for the legal science of today. It is not a mere academic exercise therefore to set forth analytically the limitations inherent in administration of justice according to law, which preclude the complete securing through law of all interests which ethical considerations or social ideals indicate as proper to be secured.

One set of limitations grows out of the difficulties involved in ascertainment of the facts to which legal rules are to be applied. This is one of the oldest and most stubborn problems of the administration of justice. In primitive law there was the danger that debate over the facts would take the form of the very private war which the law was seeking to put down. Hence the law sought to settle the facts by some mechanical device—by ordeal, or casting lots, or even battle by champions—in other words, by some conclusive test that involved no element of personal judgment on the part of the magistrate and could not be challenged for partiality. The strict law relied on procedural forms for the same reason. Forms prevented dispute. The form was fixed and notorious. Men's ideas might differ as to whether there was something novel, called a substantial right, contained in or behind the form, and if so, as to what it was. But the form allowed no scope for such disputes, and in the beginnings of a legal system as well as in the primitive stage, a chief end is to avoid dispute. In any age or in any place where men are inclined on slight provocation to take the righting of wrongs into their own hands, the law that hesitates is lost. In time the legal system develops a rational mode of trial. Yet trial by jury was at first purely mechanical. And while we should not agree with the Year Books speaking from the days of verdicts on the common knowledge of the vicinage that a man's intent or a woman's age cannot be ascertained by legal trial, the exigencies of trial by jury impose many limitations upon legal securing of important interests. For example, the law is often criticised because it does not protect against purely subjective mental suffering, except as it accompanies or is incident to some other form of injury and within disputed limits even then. There are obvious difficulties of proof in such cases. False testimony as to mental suffering may be adduced easily and is very hard to detect. Hence the courts, constrained by the practical problem of proof to fall short of the requirements of the logical system of rights of personality, have looked to see whether there has been some bodily impact or some wrong infringing some other interest which is objectively demonstrable, and have put nervous injuries which leave no bodily record and purely mental injuries in the same category.

Another set of limitations grows out of the intangibility of duties which morally are of great moment but legally defy enforcement. I have spoken already of futile attempts of equity at Rome and in England to make moral duties of gratitude or disinterestedness into duties enforceable by courts. In modern law not only duties of care for the health, morals and education of children, but even truancy and incorrigibility are coming under the supervision of juvenile courts or courts of domestic relations. But note that the moment these things are committed to courts administrative agencies have to be invoked to make the legal treatment effective. Probation officers, boards of children's guardians and like institutions at once develop. Moreover, one may venture to doubt whether such institutions or any that may grow out of them will ever take the place of the old-time interview between father and son in the family woodshed by means of which the intangible duties involved in that relation were formerly enforced.

A third set of limitations grows out of the subtlety of modes of seriously infringing important interests which the law would be glad to secure effectively if it might. Thus grave infringements of individual interests in the domestic relations by talebearing or intrigue are often too intangible to be reached by legal machinery. Our law has struggled hard with this difficulty. But the result of our action on the case for criminal conversation and alienation of affections, which long ago excited the ridicule of Thackeray, do not inspire confidence nor does the sole American precedent for enjoining a defendant from flirting with the plaintiff's wife assure a better remedy. So also with the so-called right of privacy. The difficulties involved in tracing injuries to their source and in fitting cause to effect compels some sacrifice of the interests of the retiring and the sensitive.

A fourth set of limitations grows out of the inapplicability of legal machinery of rule and remedy to many phases of human conduct, to many important human relations and to some serious wrongs. One example may be seen in the duty of husband and wife to live together and the claim of each to the society and affection of the other. Formerly, so far as the husband was concerned, our legal system secured this interest in three ways, namely, (a) by a marital privilege of restraint and correction, (b) by a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, and (c) by a writ of habeas corpus directed to one who harbored the wife apart from her husband. But the privilege of restraint and correction is incompatible with the individual interests of personality of the wife and is no longer recognized. The suit for restitution of conjugal rights, in origin an ecclesiastical institution for the correction of morals, sanctioned by excommunication, has long been practically inefficacious and is now obsolete. And the writ of habeas corpus may now be used only when the wife is detained from the husband against her will. Today this interest has no sanction beyond morals and the opinion of the community. This was true also in the classical Roman law, and in modern countries ruled by the Roman law, as in those that are ruled by the common law, the chief security for the interest of husband and wife in the marital relation is simply the moral sense of the community. So little has been achieved in practice by the husband's actions against third parties who infringe this interest, tested in the law by centuries of experience, that the courts have instinctively proceeded with caution in giving them to the wife by analogy in order to make the law logically complete.

Law secures interests by punishment, by prevention, by specific redress and by substitutional redress; and the wit of man has discovered no further possibilities of judicial action. But punishment has of necessity a very limited field, and today is found applicable only to enforce absolute duties imposed to secure general social interests. The scope of preventive relief is necessarily narrow. In the case of injuries to reputation, injuries to the feelings and sensibilities—to the "peace and comfort of one's thoughts and emotions"—the wrong is ordinarily complete before any preventive remedy may be invoked, even if other difficulties were not involved. Specific redress is only possible in case of possessory rights and of certain acts involving purely economic advantages. A court can repossess a plaintiff of Blackacre, but it cannot repossess him of his reputation. It can make a defendant restore a unique chattel, but it cannot compel him to restore the alienated affections of a wife. It can constrain a defendant to perform a contract to convey land, but it cannot constrain him to restore the peace of mind of one whose privacy has been grossly invaded. Hence, in the great majority of cases substitutional redress by way of money damages is the only resource, and this has been the staple remedy of the law at all times. But this remedy is palpably inadequate except where interests of substance are involved. The value of a chattel, the value of a commercial contract, the value of use and occupation of land—such things may be measured in money. On the other hand, attempt to reach a definite measure of actual money compensation for a broken limb is at least difficult; and valuation of the feelings, the honor, the dignity of an injured person is downright impossible. We try to hide the difficulty by treating the individual honor, dignity, character and reputation, for purposes of law of defamation, as assets, and Kipling has told us what the Oriental thinks of the result. "Is a man sad? Give him money, say the Sahibs. Hath he a wrong upon his head? Give him money, say the Sahibs." It is obvious that the Oriental's point is well taken. But it is not so obvious what else the law may do. If, therefore, the law secures property and contract more elaborately and more adequately than it secures personality, it is not because the law rates the latter less highly than the former, but because legal machinery is intrinsically well adapted to securing the one and intrinsically ill adapted to securing the other.

Finally, a fifth set of limitations grows out of the necessity of appealing to individuals to set the law in motion. All legal systems labor under this necessity. But it puts a special burden upon legal administration of justice in an Anglo-American democracy. For our whole traditional polity depends on individual initiative to secure legal redress and enforce legal rules. It is true, the ultra individualism of the common law in this connection has broken down. We no longer rely wholly upon individual prosecutors to bring criminals to justice. We no longer rely upon private actions for damages to hold public service companies to their duties or to save us from adulterated food. Yet the possibilities of administrative enforcement of law are limited also, even if there were not grave objections to a general regime of administrative enforcement. For laws will not enforce themselves. Human beings must execute them, and there must be some motive setting the individual in motion to do this above and beyond the abstract content of the rule and its conformity to an ideal justice or an ideal of social interest. The Puritan conceived of laws simply as guides to the individual conscience. The individual will was not to be coerced. Every man's conscience was to be the ultimate arbiter of what was right and wrong at the crisis of action. But as all men's consciences were not enlightened, laws were proper to set men to thinking, to declare to them what their fellows thought on this point and that, and to afford guides to those whose consciences did not speak with assurance. Such a conception, suitable enough in a sparsely settled community of pioneers, is quite impossible in the crowded industrial community of today with its complex organization and clash of conflicting interests. Yet many still think of law after the Puritan fashion. One social reformer told us recently that the real function of law is to register the protest of society against wrong. Well, protests of society against wrong are no mean thing. But one may feel that a prophet rather than a law-maker is the proper mouthpiece for the purpose. It is said that Hunt, the agitator, appeared on one occasion before Lord Ellenborough at circuit, a propos of nothing upon the calendar, to make one of his harangues. After the Chief Justice had explained to him that he was not in a tribunal of general jurisdiction to inquire into every species of wrong throughout the kingdom, but only in a court of assize and jail delivery to deliver the jail of that particular county, Hunt exclaimed, "But, my Lord, I desire to protest." "Oh, certainly," said Lord Ellenborough. "By all means. Usher! Take Mr. Hunt into the corridor and allow him to protest as much as he pleases." Our statute books are full of protests of society against wrong which are as efficacious for practical purposes as the declamations of Mr. Hunt in the corridor of Lord Ellenborough's court.

Much advance has been making of late in the art of drafting legislation and in the study of comparative legislation. But in an age of legislative law-making much more is required. The life of law is in its enforcement. The common-law rule came into being through enforcement and application and the situations that brought about its existence determines its life. The statutory rule, on the other hand, is made a priori. It is not necessarily a living rule when it is put upon the books. Occasion to apply it judicially may not arise till long afterward. Moreover it is an abstract rule and the situation that led to its existence goes rather to its interpretation than to its validity as a rule. Hence it is not enough for the law-maker to study the form of the rule and the abstract justice of its content. He must study how far cases under the rule are susceptible of proof. He must study how far by means of his rule he may set up a tangible legal duty capable of enforcement objectively by legal sanctions. He must consider how far infringements of his rule will take on a palpable shape with which the law may deal effectively. He must study how far the legal machinery of rule and remedy is adapted to effect what he desires. Last, and most of all, he must study how to insure that someone will have a motive for invoking the machinery of the law to enforce his rule in the face of the opposing interests of others in infringing it.

MORRIS R. COHEN, POSITIVISM AND IDEALISM IN THE LAW

27 Colum.L.Rev. 237, 245-249 (1927).

"He who tries to determine everything by law will foment crime rather than lessen it." Spinoza, Tract. Theol. Polit., c. 20.

II

This brings us to our second limitation of legal idealism, the inevitable imperfections in the human beings that have to make, to enforce, and to obey the law.

We may view the limitations of imperfect human nature (1) from the point of view of the legislator, (2) from the point of view of those who have to obey the law, and (3) from the point of view of those who have to enforce it or operate the legal machinery.

(1) Inherent Limits of Legislative Power

The obvious fact which no glorification of law can obscure is that it is made by human beings subject to the limitations of human ignorance and of inadequate sympathy or good will.

(a) The ignorance of the legislator may relate to the end of the law which he helps to bring about. Moved by the demand for the redress of some grievance, the legislature enacts a statute. But changing the law is like making a change in the intricate plot of a highly organized drama. You cannot change one part without other parts being affected in unexpected ways. Legislatures thus seldom have an adequate idea of what they intend to bring about. The Napoleonic Code intended to guarantee that all the children shall have some part of the patrimony. Did its authors have any idea that they were erecting a check to the growth of population?

(b) Assuming that the legislator knows what effect he wants to produce, he may be ignorant of the natural circumstances involved. All sorts of scientific facts have to be assumed in modern legislation. Our southern legislatures feel competent to pass on the truths of biologic evolution and one of our western states came near decreeing some absurd value for W. All our state legislatures feel competent to pass on the truths of history to be taught in the public schools. Modern states all contain heterogeneous elements. Hence laws applicable to a vast majority may be absurd for some groups or regions—e.g., trial by jury in those United States possessions inhabited by Negritos. Rural legislators do not know or sympathize with urban industrial life and city legislators do not always understand the conditions of farm life.

(c) Of special importance is the imperfect power of the legislature to control the subsequent interpretation of its enactments. The legislature can express its intention only in general terms. It cannot foresee all actual cases. It cannot therefore completely control the interpretation and application of its statutes by courts and administrators bent on making the law serve other and wider purposes. The legislature generally looks to the removal of a specific abuse while the judge and the jurist must look upon any statute as a part of the whole legal system. Thus the first legislatures that wished to change the common law as to the property rights of married women were repeatedly defeated by courts that persisted in thinking of these statutes in terms of the traditional common law.

(2) Inherent Difficulties in Forcing Obedience to the Law

That in a democracy the law is the will of the people is a statement not of a fact but of an aspiration that ought to be true. A great deal of the law is and necessarily must be the work of legislatures, courts and jurists whose work is seldom fully known to the majority of the people. Indeed, as to rules of conduct on which people are fairly unanimous there is no need for the enactment of any law. Enacted law represents the will of some part of the community and the rest obey either out of respect or by force of habitual obedience to regular authority. Yet neither legislatures, courts, or jurists, nor all combined are omnipotent. There is no way of securing perfect obedience where there are strong human motives for disobedience or evasion.

The failure of the law to secure obedience has been historically shown in at least four fields of human life.

(a) In the field of religion. The persistence despite persecution of the Christian churches in the early Roman Empire, of the Jews and Christian dissenters in Russia, England, and elsewhere, shows how persistently small minorities may defy and defeat the law.

(b) In the field of personal morals. This has always been a favorite interest of the law, but its failures in this field are proverbial. It is true that sumptuary laws have often been generally obeyed, e.g., in the Middle Ages. But this happened only so long as they conformed to the general moral feeling of mediaeval society. When they cease to express a strong moral consensus they cease to be effective. Take for instance the case of the New York law which makes adultery a crime. Though many thousands of divorces have been granted for that offence there seem to have been hardly any convictions for the crime. As a criminal law it is a dead letter. Yet any proposal to repeal it would meet with widespread resentment. The majority of the people of New York State emphatically wish the statute book to express their disapproval of adultery. Why, then, has there been no enforcement of it? The answer is to be found in the inherent difficulty of enforcement. It is an unpleasant and unedifying thing to bring into court. Moreover it is extremely doubtful whether convictions would greatly reduce the number of actual offences, or result in more good than harm.

The experience of our national prohibition law and the many evils which its enforcement involves, especially the violation of the law by the very agents of the government, are too flagrant to need anything but bare mention here.

It is interesting, however, to reflect that these evils are not merely contemporary. Long ago a most detached philosopher, Spinoza, wrote the sentence at the head of this paper. He also observed:

"Many attempts have been made to frame sumptuary laws. But these attempts have never succeeded in their end. For all laws that can be violated without doing any one an injury are laughed at. Nay, so far are they from doing anything to control the desires and passions of men, that, on the contrary, they direct and incite men's thoughts the more towards those very objects; for we always strive for what is forbidden, and desire the things we are not allowed to have. And men of leisure are never deficient in the ingenuity needed to enable them to outwit laws framed to regulate things which cannot be entirely forbidden . . . My conclusion, then, is that those vices which are commonly bred in a state of peace . . . can never be directly prevented but only indirectly. That is to say, we can only prevent them by constituting the state in such a way that most men will not indeed live with wisdom (for that cannot be secured simply by law), but will be led by those emotions from which the state will derive most advantage."¹

(c) Similar failure can be seen in the field of economics. The repeated failures of attempts to regulate wages by law, to prohibit mergers or trusts, to prevent railroads from having an economic interest in the products they carry, all illustrate how difficult it is to prevent evasion of the law by those who have a strong interest in doing so.

(d) In the political sphere we need only mention the failure of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution to secure civil and political equality for the negro. Mr. Horwill² has recently called attention to the many ways in which Congress and the Executive evade the provisions of the Constitution, e.g., the failure to reapportion congressional representation after the census of 1920. The most interesting of these evasions is by what he calls "discreet nomenclature," e.g., evading the duty of submitting a law for presidential approval by calling it a concurrent resolution, etc.

There can be no doubt that the framers of the United States Constitution intended the Electoral College to serve as a barrier against the influence of political parties in the election of the president. This purpose has been defeated without changing the constitutional law, by the extra-legal device of the political convention.

(3) The Limits of Legal Machinery

Dean Pound has treated this topic with his usual thoroughness in an essay on "The Limits of Effective Legal Action"³ and I may add only a few remarks. Legal machinery, we must remember, never operates apart from human beings, judges, juries, police officials, etc. The imperfect knowledge or intelligence of these human beings is bound to assert itself. It is therefore vain to expect that the legal machinery will work with a perfection that no other human institution does. We cannot expect results too fine for the discrimination of the ordinary jurymen. A great deal of injustice cannot be prevented by law because the attempt to do so is bound to produce greater evil than it can cure. I think that the action for breach of promise to marry well illustrates this. Apart from the injury to public decency from the fact that this action is so often used purely for blackmail, it is a bad policy for the law to put a monetary value on the marriage promise and to seem in any way to force people into the marriage relation when the churches so strenuously insist that no matter what promises have passed between the two parties there shall be no marriage performed unless both parties are perfectly willing at the time of the ceremony.

¹ Tractatus Polit. 10, 4-6. The same protest against bringing the law into disrepute by saddling on it statutes which cannot be enforced has been eloquently made, by President Butler. See his address before the Ohio Bar Association, at Columbus, Ohio, on January 26, 1923.

³ (1917) 27 Int.J.Eth. 150.

It would be foolishness to contend that in the various fields mentioned, law has never been effective. Few injustices are absolutely beyond all human effort, if we are willing to make sufficient sacrifice to remove them. But it is folly to center our attention on some result desirable in itself and ignore the fearful cost of incidental consequences required to attain it.

We conclude then that in view of the necessary limitations of any legal system and the many insuperable difficulties in the way of enforcing all sorts of moral considerations, it is a wicked stupidity that insists on absolute justice regardless of consequences. Fiat justitia percat mundus is the device of the fanatic, too lazy to think out the consequences of his position. The more human wisdom is summed up in the saying, summum ius, summa injuria.

NOTE

In Eggleston, "Legal Development in a Modern Community," in Interpretations of Modern Legal Philosophies (1947), 168 at 172, the author concludes from his discussion of lawmaking in nineteenth-century England: "(i) That the legislative process of law-making in the modern sense is a scientific process; it is not the mere process of commanding, not the mere exercise of will. It is a particular kind of social act in which certain forces play a part, in which an objective is aimed at, which can be attained if appropriate means are used. Laws will not be made effectively unless we know how to bring about what we decide. (ii) The specific inquiry that we have to make as a starting point is into the existing body of relations which have formal legal expression and which are working as a going concern. (iii) The legislation must be so devised as to establish a new working order which the people accept and in which they act according to the new conditions. . . ."

WILLIAM H. TAFT, THE LEGISLATURE AND THE EXECUTION OF THE LAWS

12 Rep.Pa.Bar Ass'n 239, 240-245 (1906).

. . . We live in a practical work-a-day world, and our legislation must partake of this same character. The law should be a definite, concrete enunciation of rules of action which the most ignorant can apply to the every day occurrences in their own lives and which there is some reasonable probability that with the instrumentalities at hand, an executive of average energy and courage may be expected to enforce. . . .

. . . When a law is proposed to be enforced in a community a great majority of whom are opposed to its enactment and will be opposed to its enforcement, and when the officers whose duty it will become, to execute the law, are to be elected by that community, the Legislature should hesitate before it adopts it. Of course where a majority of the community is engaged in business or conduct which may be described as malum in se—something which is immoral and aimed at the destruction of society, there is no course open to the Legislature but to denounce the business or conduct by criminal laws and provide for their effective enforcement whatever the obstructing difficulties. Such a case was presented when the government of the United States determined to stamp out polygamy in Utah, but that is an extreme case. . . .

I am far from saying that no laws ought to be adopted which will not enforce themselves, or which will not be violated because nobody has a motive or desire to violate them; but the point which I wish to suggest is that legislators in adopting a law do not generally give sufficient consideration to the practical questions whether under all the conditions, it is likely to be enforced. In some cases, such considerations ought not to prevent the enactment of a law on the general subject, but may properly lead to such a re-framing of its provisions so as to provide a method of its enforcement which will make less probable its becoming a dead letter. In many communities, it is certain that the imposition of a tax or the requirement of a high license for the saloon business, will be much more effective to restrict the evil than absolute prohibition. One has to encounter, in questions of this character, the argument that it does not do for the State and the public in its laws to make "a covenant with hell or a league with the Devil," but such an argument appeals more to excellent high minded but impracticable idealists than to practical statesmen charged with carrying on a government and dealing with actual conditions. There is a decided difference between licensing prostitution or gambling which can not be at all justified, on the one hand, and prohibiting every one in a community from selling or taking a drink of beer, or wine or whiskey on the other. It is not the duty of the legislator in law to formulate an ideal system of morality and pass criminal statutes to punish those who do not live up to that high ideal. . . . The function of the Legislature is chiefly to restrain the evils arising from the interference with one man's pursuit of happiness by the act of another. It is to secure the greatest good for the greatest number. It is to lay down practical rules of action, easily comprehended, directed to restraining evils and injuries. It is to offer equal opportunities for the improvement of the people rather than to command it by positive law, to be enforced by threatened or actual punishment. It is to furnish the means of maintaining justice, and then to let individualism have its sway in working out character and in adding to the sum of human happiness. The theory that by legislation the State can successfully command people to be righteous in the higher sense is at the bottom of much unsuccessful and obsolete legislation that stands as a monument to the obstacle that hearts overflowing with enthusiastic love for their race but without practical judgment have offered to real progress. The making and operation of laws are not proper subjects for the consideration and action of a tyro, however high his aim or pure his motive. Successfully to understand the science of practical lawmaking requires close observation of the nature, customs and traditions of the people to be affected by the laws, the degree of efficiency of the persons to be charged with their execution, the method by which such executives are to be selected, the difficulties with which those violating the laws may be brought to justice, and many other circumstances bearing directly on the question whether the law enacted is to be thrown into the scrap heap of nugatory and defunct acts of the Legislature, or is to become a living force and instrumentality for the betterment of the people of the State. . . . The tendency of Legislatures in the enactment of such laws is to pass them and then rid themselves of the responsibilities for their enforcement by saying that the duty of enforcement rests on the executive and not on the legislative branch. It is a counterpart of the tendency of Legislatures of modern days to pass laws without much regard to the constitutional restrictions upon their powers on the theory that the question of the validity of the law has somehow been shifted from their shoulders to the judicial branch of the Government, as if the Constitution which they swear with uplifted hand to uphold was not as binding upon the legislators as it is upon the judges of the courts.

Before this audience of lawyers I need hardly dwell on the pernicious effect of the enactment of a law which is not to be constantly and uniformly enforced. It brings all laws into disrepute. It leads to fitful and sporadic efforts to execute it which, of course, make it operate unjustly because it is made to affect only the few exposed to its penalties during the spasm of virtue on the part of the executive. It offers to an unprincipled executive an opportunity to wreak vengeance on his enemies, or to blackmail the unfortunate. It makes those who violate it and escape its penalties indifferent to the observance of other laws which, but for the sense of immunity thus engendered, they would not be tempted to transgress. Ineffective laws are a serious danger to the body politic and social. . . .

JOHN DICKINSON, LEGISLATION AND THE EFFECTIVENESS OF LAW.

37 Rep.Pa.Bar Ass'n 337, 346-355 (1931).

II

First of all, as to whether some of the results that we are today attempting to accomplish by legislative regulation can be accomplished in that way. At this point we run squarely athwart another of those broad crystallizations of public opinion which, like the idea that we have too much legislation, is the common coin of discussion and debate, and forms the more or less unconscious premise of a great many views about legislative matters. I refer to the idea that a great deal of our regulatory legislation is not merely futile but harmful because, as we say, it is impossible to make men moral or honest or good by governmental fiat. Of course it is impossible to do so, but granting this, are we justified in going forward from this premise to the conclusion that all or much of our regulatory legislation attempts to accomplish the impossible? We need rather to ask whether the purpose of regulatory legislation is in fact to make men moral and honest, or whether it may not have other objects which fall more definitely within the range and scope of possible accomplishment.

If we examine the bulk of our regulatory legislation it should be abundantly clear that a great deal of it has no relation whatever to questions of morality or honesty, but is simply designed to insure that particular acts shall be done in a particular way, in one way rather than some other possible way, in order that other persons who are likely to be affected by the acts in question may have a basis for what to expect, may know what to count on, and may thus be enabled to shape their conduct accordingly. This is illustrated, for example, by the vast volume of traffic regulations. No question of morality is involved in whether it is to be lawful for the driver of an automobile to make a lefthand turn at a corner or whether the rear light of a vehicle is to be red or green. The driver is made to do one thing rather than another not because one is morally good and the other morally evil, but in order that other persons may have a reasonable basis for expectation as to which of the two things he will in fact do, and may thus keep out of his way. The same purpose underlies many of the requirements of our corporation laws and laws regulating the marketing of agricultural and manufactured products. Their design is not to make men good but to supply individuals with a basis of expectation, and therefore with reasonable grounds of action in a world where methods of action change so rapidly that standard types of conduct upon which others can rely have slight chance to grow up and acquire the force of customs.

In a simple society where most men are engaged in the same types of activity and where these remain stereotyped from generation to generation, standards of conduct can become rooted as customs so that no deliberate and artificial regulations are necessary. But in a changing society where individuals are constantly shifting from one narrowly specialized activity to another, and where the methods and technique of any given activity are subject to constant change and improvement, customs have small opportunity to become well-established and individuals are not in a position to have customs ingrained in them by habit. We often hear it said that many matters which we attempt to deal with by law should properly be left to custom. So far as custom can operate it is certainly a more reliable and effective agency for guiding expectations of conduct than law can ever be, but we do not sufficiently realize that custom is essentially the product of a slow-moving and static society and that its effectiveness is paralyzed when change goes forward at such a rate that customs have no time to form, much less to take root.

So far we have been speaking of legislative regulations which have no direct reference to issues of morality, but much of our regulatory legislation does go further and concerns itself with questions of fair dealing, justice, honesty, carefulness and the like. Admitting that these moral qualities cannot be legislated into human beings by fiat of the State, does it necessarily follow that such legislation is futile and meddling? In other words, where legislation holds men to certain standards of conduct which have moral implications, must it be said that the purpose of such legislation is to instill into them the moral qualities on which such standards are based, and that since moral qualities cannot be created by law, the legislation is therefore bad? I know of no subject on which there is more widespread confusion than this, or where over-simplification of thought is more in evidence.

Perhaps the most direct way of clarifying the issue is to consider the ordinary common law rules as to fraud and negligence. The conception of fraud certainly carries with it strong moral implications, just as the conception of negligence carries with it an implication of the mental attitude which we describe as carefulness. Is it proper to say that the object of the legal rules which establish liability for fraud and negligence is to instill into individuals the qualities of honesty and carefulness? Even if indirectly and in the long run they may possibly have some tendency to promote that result, it seems clear that their primary object is a different one. Primarily their object is simply to provide that certain types of external conduct shall be followed by certain legal consequences of a deterrent character. They do not aim, in other words, to produce an honest frame of mind on the part of dishonest persons, or a careful frame of mind on the part of careless persons. They merely give notice that if conduct does not measure up to a certain external standard of honesty or carefulness, consequences will ensue of a character probably regarded as undesirable by the person who fails to meet the prescribed standard. In other words, the aim of the law is not to accomplish the hopeless task of altering human character, but merely to insist on conformity of conduct to a standard deemed advisable for the protection of the other individuals who compose the community. If an individual fails or refuses to measure up to that standard, all that the law can do and all that it undertakes to do is to make him pay a penalty. There is no reason to suppose that this task is impossible or that the resulting protection to the community is rendered nugatory simply because it happens to be impossible for the law to instill morality into the culprit.

The problem of the legislator is therefore misconceived, and the central difficulty of regulatory legislation obscured, by simply saying that law cannot make men honest or moral, and letting the matter go at that. The real difficulty is a different one. It is the difficulty of determining how high a standard of conduct regulatory legislation can reasonably require with any hope of being effective. It is impossible for law to hold men to conformity with a standard so much more strict than that to which they are willing to conform that the difficulties of enforcement will prove insuperable. This is the problem of what may be called the effectiveness of law. Are there any considerations which enable the legislator to determine in advance what standards of conduct can be made effective by governmental action and what standards on the other hand men will refuse to conform to in spite of the threat of penalties?

On this point it is usual to say that no legal standard will or can be effective which is in advance of the general and customary habits and practices of the community—that law, in other words, cannot be in advance of usage. I suggest that here again we are in the presence of an over-simplification. In a rough way, the view just stated is sound, but only if reduced to the tautology that a law cannot be enforced if it cannot be enforced. Consider the difficulty of determining what we mean when we talk of the existing practice or usage beyond which law cannot advance. In a complex modern society, made up of numerous layers of individuals differing widely in training, intelligence and occupation, there is the widest range of usage on many of the matters with which law has to deal, and a wide variety of views and opinions as to what is just and fair and careful in any given set of circumstances. How shall we tell which special brand of usage or opinion out of this variety and diversity is the “normal” one beyond which law may not advance? Shall we try to count noses and allow a temporary majority always to prevail? Is not the usage of an active and aggressive minority often on the way to being imitated and thus becoming the usage of next year’s majority? How shall we say that there is a usage at all where the matter in question concerns only a small part of the community and where there are differences of usage within even that restricted group? In short, when we talk of usage we are dealing not with something fixed and stable, but with a fluid, changing, complex phenomenon which alters under our eyes while we are attempting to ascertain it, and this is why we get so little real or substantial aid when we seek the proper standard for the effectiveness of law in a supposed normal standard of extra-legal practice. . . .

Nor need the practice to which the law lends its aid and which it seeks to enforce necessarily be the practice which at the moment is the practice of the majority. The practice of the numerical majority at any given moment is often hopelessly in the rear of the soundest and best considered practice. If all that law could ever effectively accomplish were to put its force behind the practice of the numerical majority, its influence in perhaps the largest number of instances would be to obstruct rather than promote improvement. Whether or not and how far law can effectively lend its support to enforce standards in advance of the usage of the numerical majority is not a question which can be solved by a formula, but one which depends for its solution on all the circumstances of the particular case. If for one reason or another the practice of the majority is not something seriously insisted on, but rather casual, superficial, and unassociated with positive conviction, law can undertake to insist on a higher standard with excellent prospects of successful enforcement. Again, where there is a determined and powerful minority insisting on the legal enforcement of the new standard, the enforcement can often be made successful even in the face of somewhat determined resistance by the majority. In other words, to put the matter in the form of what looks like a truism, but a truism the full meaning of which often fails to be appreciated, the possibility of the successful enforcement of a law depends on the comparative strength of the forces supporting or opposing the particular law at the time. The thing which is often overlooked is that there are other forces besides the force of mere numbers, for example the force of economic power and social position, and above all the shifting forces of ideas and opinions, which, either accidentally or as a result of manipulation, may convert a majority of resistance today into a majority of acquiescence tomorrow, or vice versa. The influence of these forces frequently makes possible in the course of time the effective enforcement of a law which was at variance with majority practice when it was adopted; and it is this possibility, and this possibility alone, which enables law to be an instrument of social improvement and progress.

From what I have said it follows that some resistance to law is to be expected as a frequent and natural occurrence. Too often it seems to be assumed as a result of our dislike for some particular statute that if a law arouses resistance it is ipso facto a failure and that the measure of non-enforcement resulting from resistance to a law is a conclusive argument that the law has no place on the statute books. To take such a view is to succumb once more to the fallacy of over-simplification. No law is or can be enforced 100 per cent. If it could be, it would indicate such perfect conformity to the standard prescribed by the law that the law would be entirely superfluous. The enactment of a law prescribing a particular standard indicates that there are individuals whose conduct does not conform to that standard and who can be expected to employ all means in their power to evade conforming to the law. Such efforts are bound in many instances to be successful as long as law has to be administered by fallible human beings. The question of the effectiveness of a law is therefore always one of degree. It depends upon a balance between the skill of the enforcement agency and the social and economic forces supporting the law on the one hand as compared with the strength of the forces opposing the law on the other. Sometimes this balance is so much in favor of the latter forces that there is a comparatively low degree of enforcement. Where this is the case today it is not necessarily true that it will also be the case tomorrow. Propaganda, education, changes in men's interests and methods of acting may lead in time to the fairly complete enforcement of a statute which at the outset met with much successful resistance. Or the same process may work in the opposite direction. Thus Sunday laws which a hundred years ago were enforced with a high degree of effectiveness are enforced much less effectively today.

If we grasp the fact that no law can properly be expected to meet with full and complete enforcement, but that enforcement is always a matter of degree, the whole problem of enforcement is set in a somewhat different light from that in which it is commonly viewed in public discussion. It means in the first place that no law can be expected to accomplish precisely the purpose and results which it was enacted to accomplish. Non-enforcement, to the extent that it is present, operates as a deflecting force producing a result somewhere intermediate between the situation existing prior to the enactment of the law and the result which would be produced by complete enforcement. This intermediate result varies from time to time with the varying degrees of enforcement which follow from shifts in the balance between the forces favoring and the forces opposing the law. No law produces precisely the same results today that it produced yesterday or will produce tomorrow. This means, for one thing, that even a law that is very badly enforced does not leave the situation exactly as it found it. Take for example laws against gambling and vice. No one can doubt that the percentage of enforcement of such laws is comparatively low. On the other hand, no one can doubt that the situation with respect to gambling and vice is different under such laws from what it would be in the absence of the laws. The practices at which the laws are aimed are conducted in a different way and to a different extent because of the laws. This operation of a partially enforced law to deflect a practice into a new form may create a situation which satisfies the dominant forces in the community somewhat better than the situation which would exist in the absence of the law. On the other hand it may bring with it what are regarded as new evils. Whether the good outbalances the evil is always a question which has to be answered for each particular case at a particular time and moment of enforcement and the answer always depends on the nature of the forces which happen at that time to be operating for and against the law in the particular community.

It is sometimes assumed that legislation of certain definite kinds is doomed in advance to meet with so much resistance and to be so difficult of enforcement that it is bound to produce more evil than good. Thus it is no doubt true that legislation which undertakes to regulate practices that can be indulged in by anyone and everyone, like gambling, or spitting on the streets, is more difficult to enforce than legislation affecting the conduct of only a small part of the community like banks and insurance companies. Nevertheless experience indicates that it is too much to assume that the former sort of legislation is always futile. Everything depends on the balance of forces at work within the community for or against the legislation. Thus within the last few years Turkey has apparently succeeded in effecting by legislation a complete revolution in the usages of the people in matters of dress and religion, precisely the kind of matters which it would be most plausible to argue lie completely beyond the sphere of legislative effectiveness. Of course the reason is that this legislation has been supported by vast social changes and by a revolutionary wave of opinion which has undermined and paralyzed the forces of opposition. The same thing was true in France at the time of the French Revolution. On the other hand in India where such forces have not yet been able to work successfully, it has proved futile or inadvisable to attempt on any considerable scale to eradicate popular customs by law.

If we thus come to the conclusion that in the last analysis the effectiveness of law depends not so much on the nature of the subject-matter dealt with as on the particular forces of support or opposition which from time to time make for or against the enforcement of the law, it seems impossible to say that legislation is futile merely for the reason that it deals with this or that subject-matter. One potent argument for the proposition that we have too much legislation thus falls to the ground because it is no longer possible to say that all legislation dealing with certain classes of subject-matter is ipso facto futile. What we need rather is to say that legislation is useless if no honest and sincere attempt is made to enforce it; but when that is the case the blame belongs to the administrative departments charged with enforcing the law, and not to the Legislature which enacted it.

1. George W. Wickersham, "The Program of the Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement," 16 A.B.A.Jour. 654, 655-656 (1930):

Reasons for Lawless Attitude of the American Public

It must be confessed that the general attitude of mind of the average American is not law-abiding. Perhaps this is not unnatural. With forty-eight states, besides the Federal Congress, grinding out laws annually, or biennially; with statute laws already in existence filling some thirty-five hundred volumes of more than a million and a half pages (according to a writer in the Journal of this Association), any general acceptance of statute law as imposing a moral obligation upon the citizen could hardly be expected.

Suggestion More Potent Than Compulsion

Yet with proper guidance, an extraordinary degree of cooperation with authority in securing general observance of statutory requirements can be developed in the American public. The art of suggestion may be more potent than legislative mandates bristling with penalties for disobedience. We all can recollect the amazing acceptance of Mr. Hoover's request during the war that the public on certain days abstain from the use of their automobiles in order to conserve gasoline for war purposes, and the self-imposed restriction made in response to his request as Food Administrator, in the use of sugar and wheat flour, to the same end. In these cases, no law was enacted. Public thought was focalized on the problem of winning the war. The authorities suggested a means whereby all might contribute to that great end, and almost without exception, every one fell in with the suggestion and sacrificed personal taste, convenience or pleasure to help achieve the desired result. My ordinary daily life furnishes me constantly with a more recent example of similar response to suggestion: As trains on the Long Island Railroad bearing their load of regular commuters coming from country or suburban homes to the city of New York, approach the tunnels leading under the East River, a guard hurries through the cars calling out: "All windows down, please"; sometimes without the "please." Whereupon, the complaisant passengers themselves close the windows, an operation which is not always easy, and sit in a close and stuffy atmosphere, five, ten, sometimes more minutes, until the train plunges into the darkness of the tunnel. None of them are employes of the railroad company. There could be no compulsion laid upon any of them to comply with a request which otherwise would require the services of several trainmen; but, recognizing that closing the windows is a reasonable measure of safety, they respond promptly to the demand.

Do not these examples suggest the possible effect of educating public opinion to the need of particular legislation, and the value of endeavoring to develop on the part of the community at large an attitude of cooperation with the authorities in observance of the laws of the land? It requires no argument to convince the larger part of our people of the moral forces of the laws against murder, assault, robbery, theft and other fundamental enactments for the protection of life, liberty and property. But the complexities of modern life require much more regulation than these in order that the intricate mechanism of civilized society shall function. . . .

Prevailing Spirit of Lawlessness

That the individual and minority groups must accept and abide by the restraints so imposed is obvious. Otherwise, lawful government breaks down and we have anarchy. The remedy of those who object, is to appeal to the same authority as that which enacts, for rescission or modification. There can be no individual right to elect what laws one will or will not obey. A crime is the violation of a law. But there seems to be a spirit abroad among our people, very manifest at times, to "beat the law" so long as they "can get away with it." One sees it constantly in the drivers of motor cars who slip by when the stop signal has flared; who speed across a railroad track when the warning bell is ringing and the gates lowered; or who "step on the gas," when no officer of the law is in sight, despite the clearly advertised speed limit of 35 miles an hour. One sees it when returning European travelers try to slip through the customs lines without declaring watches or jewelry they are carrying in pockets, and in many other instances. All this results from the fallacious notion that the individual may freely disregard any law he doesn't like. Yet the whole theory of our law necessarily rests upon the right of the state to subordinate the individual to the public weal.

Liberty and Law

"Public policy," Justice Holmes once said, "sacrifices the individual to the general good"; and, he added, "No society has ever admitted that it would not sacrifice individual welfare to its own existence." In the last analysis, public opinion operating upon the law makers must determine when the general welfare requires legislative restraint upon individual action. And good citizenship must acquiesce in the law as it is for the time being.

After all, as Judge Cardozo has so clearly demonstrated in lectures from which I have already quoted, "Liberty in the most literal sense is the negation of law, for law is restraint and the absence of restraint is anarchy. On the other hand, anarchy by destroying restraint would leave liberty the exclusive possession of the strong or the unscrupulous. . . . So once more we face a paradox."

The solution of this paradox should not be left wholly to the social philosophers and the economists. It falls more directly within the ambit of legal philosophy. Judge Cardozo in his lectures, and in his judicial opinions has done much to clarify thought on the subject. There can be nothing more unsound scientifically than merely to denounce statutes as unwarranted invasions of private personal rights, without analysis of the reasons for the enactment, the causes which induced legislative action; the need of some regulation of conduct, or the absence of it. On the other hand, there can be nothing less reasonable than for lawmakers to assume that the American public will accept and obey all statutes merely because the legislature has enacted them. To secure the maximum compliance with law, it must be reasonably adapted to its purpose and the need for its enactment must be made clear.

3. Arnold, "Law Enforcement—An Attempt at Social Dissection," 42 Yale L.J. 1, 8-12 (1932), states (footnotes have been omitted): . . .

"The first important thing to be noted about "Law Enforcement" is that while it always appears to be very closely related to the problem of public order and safety, actually it has very little to do with it. Its effect is rather on the public utterances of those interested in the criminal law and on the appearance of the judiciary to the public. In order to understand this we must recognize that there are two very distinct problems of Criminal Administration: (1) the keeping of order in the community, and (2) the dramatization of the moral notions of the community.

"The first is primarily a police and prosecutor's problem, little concerned with and only incidentally affected by any governmental philosophy. General satisfaction with or acceptance of the economic system plus a good set of policemen is probably more important in preserving peace than any code of criminal law. Given reasonable approximation of such a condition, the problem of the police and prosecutor is the suppression of the occasional dangerous individual. For this purpose the ideal that all laws should be enforced without a discretionary selection is impossible to carry out. It is like directing a general to attack the enemy on all fronts at once. It conveys no idea whatever as to the next appropriate action. The prosecutor therefore must look at the criminal law, not as something to be enforced because it governs society, but as an arsenal of weapons with which to incarcerate certain dangerous individuals who are bothering society. He will be confronted with a long line of offenders caught in the net who are unimportant, but who must be disposed of. His choice will be either to make reasonable compromises with them, or else to clog the machinery with relentless prosecution of comparatively harmless persons. There also will be dangerous and important criminals who are sentenced under some minor count because there is not sufficient evidence to convict them of the crime for which they are apprehended, and whose ignorance of the strength of the prosecutor's case makes them believe a guilty plea to a lesser offense is a wise compromise. Or they may be restrained under some entirely different law, or vagrancy statutes. The fact that there are more laws than he can ever enforce is not a handicap, but an aid to the prosecutor because it gives him so many offensive weapons against any particular individual. Obsolete laws may be revived and used for purposes that their authors never dreamed of, to sink into obscurity again when the particular individual has been put behind the bars. The prosecutor wants to win cases, and to restrain individuals. The ideal of Law Enforcement, distrustful bargaining, demanding uniform sentences, and putting the emphasis on laws rather than on individuals, sinks into the background.

"The second function of Criminal Law administration, to dramatize the moral notions of the public, is probably the most important function of the criminal courts, as distinguished from the prosecutor, because they work in the limelight of public observation. We may illustrate this by two cases, one in which Al Capone, against whom no sufficient evidence of bootlegging or racketeering had been found, was sentenced under a tax law; and another in which an admitted whiskey ring, against whom there were all sorts of evidence was freed by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the Capone case a compromise was at first reached on perfectly justifiable grounds, known to the Federal Judge and approved by the Attorney General of the United States. Subsequent advertisement of his good fortune by Capone himself made this compromise impossible because it conflicted with the ideal of law enforcement. It became necessary and under the circumstances quite justifiable for the Federal Judge to repudiate the compromise and to announce from the bench that there could be no bargaining with the Federal Court. The expediency of this announcement from the point of view of the dramatic function of criminal courts is obvious in spite of the fact that statistical studies indicate that it would be quite impossible to conduct the criminal business of the Federal Court without something which can only be distinguished from bargaining by logical hairsplitting. Capone was then sentenced for violation of the income tax laws, but the penalty was obviously based on his supposed violations of other laws. The prestige of the state seemed somehow involved in his conviction. There was a general impression that an acquittal would cause respect for the law to suffer a very serious setback leading to all sorts of vaguely imagined calamities. The actual incarceration of Capone may have had some effect on the criminal situation in Chicago, but certainly very little elsewhere. Yet the case was considered of the utmost importance on the criminal problem all over the country; it was hailed as a triumph of Law Enforcement. People generally felt better because of the emotional significance of this vindication of 'Law' against its enemies. It was as important as a spectacular victory in a war, in which some one who wore epaulettes and bore the title of general had been captured.

"In the same way when the admitted whiskey ring was freed by the Supreme Court of the United States because of an invalid search, we were furnished with a symbol of the conflicting ideal that government should not enforce laws by unreasonable searches no matter what they find. A moment's reflection would indicate that the temper of the police commissioner is of much more significance on governmental interference with rights of respectable citizens than appellate court utterances. The testimony of any district attorney will bear out the assertion that persons who consciously rely upon these utterances are almost always criminals who deserve to be convicted. Third degree methods may flourish even in an atmosphere of appellate court condemnation. But the function of courts here is not directed toward the practical solution of the problem with which they can have little to do. They are engaging in a public ceremonial in celebration of an ideal. For this purpose, the more deserving the accused is of punishment, the more striking is the exemplification of the emotional lesson. Thus the prestige of the government in enforcing laws is vindicated in one case while a ceremonial in memory of individual freedom from law enforcement is celebrated in another. The task of keeping these two shows going at the same time without losing the patronage or support of the constitution for either is then left to the legal scholar. The result is the development of substantive criminal law with conflicting details which are puzzling to persons who do not understand the unexamined popular assumptions which lie in the background.

"The dramatic ideal of 'Law Enforcement' as it has become part of the political consciousness of today shares the frailty of all ideals in that when reduced to logical statement instead of being expressed emotionally or poetically it disappears. The best statement which we can make of it would run about as follows. Laws (particularly criminal laws) are peculiarly sacred things. Whatever their merit intrinsically or by whatever political chicanery they may have been passed, they must be respected or enforced. Laws must be respected so that they may be enforced and enforced so that they may be respected. If any single law is not enforced it leads to disrespect for all laws, which in turn leads to the non-enforcement of all laws. The original notion of respect for a 'Law' which is above the King was invented as a justification for revolt against constituted authority acting in an arbitrary way. Today it becomes the emotional compulsion not to revolt against constitutional authority acting in an arbitrary way.

"These circular notions, sometimes learnedly and at other times oratorically or poetically expressed, are constantly moulding our criminal administration and our ideas of its reform. In the struggle over prohibition they have compelled the wets as well as the drys to demand enforcement. So fixed is the notion in the popular mind that parents often hide commonplace liquor violations from their children because they are unable to formulate a philosophy which will justify their conduct even to themselves. They do not want to be a 'malign influence' causing disrespect for government as Lord Coke was when he made his famous statement that there was a law above any constituted authority. A politician who today would publicly advocate the disregard of any law would be a dangerous radical, because such an open statement of a well known fact would disturb the structure of our government.

"It is curious to note that as the ideal of Law Enforcement becomes more and more abstract and mystical it has less and less to do with actual enforcement. This is illustrated by the fact that it attaches itself to some laws and not to others in a way which seems almost accidental. Generally, the laws or the instances which cause the most violent emotions of law enforcement in the public mind are those of the least social significance. The creed is notably absent in so-called civil cases, and even from criminal penalties in the field usually designated as civil law. We do not find it attached to negligence, breaches of contract, public utility rate-making, corporate mergers, unfair competition, etc. Attorneys who arrange devices by which their incorporated clients may avoid the implications of such laws are able to maintain positions of impregnable respectability. If they assisted in the operations of a bootlegging syndicate, their social positions would be much less secure. To a man from Mars, however, unaccustomed to our emotional atmosphere, it might seem that the prestige of the state might just as well be involved in public utility rate making provisions as in the occasional incarceration of a bootlegger. The important difference which he would fail to see is that the case of the bootlegger is much simpler, less important, and more easily understood by the man on the street, and therefore offers better material for drama in which conflicting ideals are alternately demonstrated."

SECTION 2. A SPECIMEN REGULATORY STATUTE

AN ACT

To provide full and fair disclosure of the character of securities sold in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, and to prevent frauds in the sale thereof, and for other purposes. (1933, c. 38, 48 Stat. as amended by 1934, c. 404, 48 Stat.; 15 U.S.C.A. § 77a et seq.)

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, TITLE I

Short Title

Section 1. This title may be cited as the "Securities Act of 1933."

Sec. 2. Definitions

When used in this act, unless the context otherwise requires—

(1) The term "security" means any note, stock, treasury stock, bond, debenture, evidence of indebtedness, certificate of interest or participation in any profit-sharing agreement, collateral-trust certificate, preorganization certificate or subscription, transferable share, investment contract, voting-trust certificate, certificate of deposit for a security, fractional undivided interest in oil, gas, or other mineral rights, or, in general, any interest or instrument commonly known as a "security", or any certificate of interest or participation in, temporary or interim certificate for, receipt for, guarantee of, or warrant or right to subscribe to or purchase, any of the foregoing.

(2) The term "person" means an individual, a corporation, a partnership, an association, a joint-stock company, a trust, any unincorporated organization, or a government or political subdivision thereof. As used in this paragraph the term "trust" shall include only a trust where the interest or interests of the beneficiary or beneficiaries are evidenced by a security. . . .

Sec. 3. Exempted securities

(a) Except as hereinafter expressly provided, the provisions of this act shall not apply to any of the following classes of securities:

(1) Any security which, prior to or within sixty days after May 27, 1933, has been sold or disposed of by the issuer or bona fide offered to the public, but this exemption shall not apply to any new offering of any such security by an issuer or underwriter subsequent to such sixty days;

(2) Any security issued or guaranteed by the United States or any Territory thereof, or by the District of Columbia, or by any

State of the United States, or by any political subdivision of a State or Territory, or by any public instrumentality of one or more States or Territories, or by any person controlled or supervised by and acting as an instrumentality of the Government of the United States pursuant to authority granted by the Congress of the United States, or any certificate of deposit for any of the foregoing, or any security issued or guaranteed by any national bank, or by any banking institution organized under the laws of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, the business of which is substantially confined to banking and is supervised by the State or Territorial banking commission or similar official; or any security issued by or representing an interest in or a direct obligation of a Federal Reserve bank;

(9) Any security exchanged by the issuer with its existing security holders exclusively where no commission or other remuneration is paid or given directly or indirectly for soliciting such exchange;

Exempted Transactions

Sec. 4. The provisions of section 5 shall not apply to any of the following transactions:

(1) Transactions by any person other than an issuer, underwriter, or dealer; transactions by an issuer not with or through an underwriter and not involving any public offering; or transactions by a dealer (including an underwriter no longer acting as an underwriter in respect of the security involved in such transaction), except transactions within one year after the last date upon which the security was bona fide offered to the public by the issuer or by or through an underwriter (excluding in the computation of such year any time during which a stop order issued under section 8 is in effect as to the security), and except transactions as to securities constituting the whole or a part of an unsold allotment to or subscription by such dealer as a participant in the distribution of such securities by the issuer or by or through an underwriter.

(2) Brokers' transactions, executed upon customers' orders on any exchange or in the open or counter market, but not the solicitation of such orders.

Sec. 5. Prohibitions relating to interstate commerce and the mails

(a) Unless a registration statement is in effect as to a security, it shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly—

(Licensing effect)

(1) to make use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or of the mails to sell or offer to buy such security through the use or medium of any prospectus or otherwise; or

(2) to carry or cause to be carried through the mails or in interstate commerce, by any means or instruments of transportation, any such security for the purpose of sale or for delivery after sale.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly—

(1) to make use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or of the mails to carry or transmit any prospectus relating to any security registered under this subchapter, unless such prospectus meets the requirements of section 10, or

(2) to carry or to cause to be carried through the mails or in interstate commerce any such security for the purpose of sale or for delivery after sale, unless accompanied or preceded by a prospectus that meets the requirements of section 10.

Sec. 6. Registration of securities and signing of registration statement

(a) Any security may be registered with the Commission under the terms and conditions hereinafter provided, by filing a registration statement in triplicate, at least one of which shall be signed by each issuer, its principal executive officer or officers, its principal financial officer, its comptroller or principal accounting officer, and the majority of its board of directors or persons performing similar functions (or, if there is no board of directors or persons performing similar functions, by the majority of the persons or board having the power of management of the issuer), and in case the issuer is a foreign or Territorial person by its duly authorized representative in the United States; except that when such registration statement relates to a security issued by a foreign government, or political subdivision thereof, it need be signed only by the underwriter of such security. Signatures of all such persons when written on the said registration statements shall be presumed to have been so written by authority of the person whose signature is so affixed and the burden of proof, in the event such authority shall be denied, shall be upon the party denying the same. The affixing of any signature without the authority of the purported signer shall constitute a violation of this subchapter. A registration statement shall be deemed effective only as to the securities specified therein as proposed to be offered.

(b) At the time of filing a registration statement the applicant shall pay to the Commission a fee of one one-hundredth of 1 per centum of the maximum aggregate price at which such securities are proposed to be offered, but in no case shall such fee be less than $25.

(c) The filing with the Commission of a registration statement, or of an amendment to a registration statement, shall be deemed to have taken place upon the receipt thereof, but the filing of a registration statement shall not be deemed to have taken place unless it is accompanied by a United States postal money order or a certified bank check or cash for the amount of the fee required under subsection (b).

(d) The information contained in or filed with any registration statement shall be made available to the public under such regulations as the Commission may prescribe, and copies thereof, photostatic or otherwise, shall be furnished to every applicant at such reasonable charge as the Commission may prescribe.

Sec. 7. Information required in registration statement

(Publicity—Specific regulations authorized)

The registration statement, when relating to a security other than a security issued by a foreign government, or political subdivision thereof, shall contain the information, and be accompanied by the documents, specified in Schedule A, and when relating to a security issued by a foreign government, or political subdivision thereof, shall contain the information, and be accompanied by the documents, specified in Schedule B; except that the Commission may by rules or regulations provide that any such information or document need not be included in respect of any class of issuers or securities if it finds that the requirement of such information or document is inapplicable to such class and that disclosure fully adequate for the protection of investors is otherwise required to be included within the registration statement. If any accountant, engineer, or appraiser, or any person whose profession gives authority to a statement made by him, is named as having prepared or certified any part of the registration statement, or is named as having prepared or certified a report or valuation for use in connection with the registration statement, the written consent of such person shall be filed with the registration statement. If any such person is named as having prepared or certified a report or valuation (other than a public official document or statement) which is used in connection with the registration statement, but is not named as having prepared or certified such report or valuation for use in connection with the registration statement, the written consent of such person shall be filed with the registration statement unless the Commission dispenses with such filing as impracticable or as involving undue hardship on the person filing the registration statement. Any such registration statement shall contain such other information, and be accompanied by such other documents, as the Commission may by rules or regulations require as being necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

Sec. 8. Taking effect of registration statements and amendments thereto

(Stop orders)

(d) If it appears to the Commission at any time that the registration statement includes any untrue statement of a material fact or omits to state any material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, the Commission may, after notice by personal service or the sending of confirmed telegraphic notice, and after opportunity for hearing (at a time fixed by the Commission) within fifteen days after such notice by personal service or the sending of such telegraphic notice, issue a stop order suspending the effectiveness of the registration statement. When such statement has been amended in accordance with such stop order, the Commission shall so declare and thereupon the stop order shall cease to be effective.

(Power to investigate)

(e) The Commission is hereby empowered to make an examination in any case in order to determine whether a stop order should issue under subsection (d). In making such examination the Commission or any officer or officers designated by it shall have access to and may demand the production of any books and papers of, and may administer oaths and affirmations to and examine, the issuer, underwriter, or any other person, in respect of any matter relevant to the examination, and may, in its discretion, require the production of a balance sheet exhibiting the assets and liabilities of the issuer, or its income statement, or both, to be certified to by a public or certified accountant approved by the Commission. If the issuer or underwriter shall fail to cooperate, or shall obstruct or refuse to permit the making of an examination, such conduct shall be proper ground for the issuance of a stop order.

(f) Any notice required under this section shall be sent to or served on the issuer, or, in case of a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, to or on the underwriter, or, in the case of a foreign or Territorial person, to or on its duly authorized representative in the United States named in the registration statement, properly directed in each case of telegraphic notice to the address given in such statement.

NOTE

In Jones v. Securities and Exchange Comm., 298 U.S. 1, 56 S.Ct. 654, 80 L.Ed. 1015 (1936), it was held that a proceeding by the Securities Exchange Commission to determine whether a stop order should be issued is analagous to a suit in equity for an injunction, and should be governed by like considerations. Id.

Sec. 9. Court review of orders

(a) Any person aggrieved by an order of the Commission may obtain a review of such order in the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, within any circuit wherein such person resides or has his principal place of business, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, by filing in such court, within sixty days after the entry of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Commission be modified or be set aside in whole or in part. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Commission, and thereupon the Commission shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the record upon which the order complained of was entered. No objection to the order of the Commission shall be considered by the court unless such objection shall have been urged before the Commission. The finding of the Commission as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Commission, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Commission and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Commission may modify its findings as to the facts by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive, and its recommendation, if any, for the modification or setting aside of the original order. The jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive and its judgment and decree, affirming, modifying, or setting aside, in whole or in part, any order of the Commission, shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification as provided in sections 346 and 347 of Title 28.

(b) The commencement of proceedings under subsection (a) shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Commission's order.

Sec. 10. Information required in prospectus

(Publicity requirement. Omitted. Ed.)

Sec. 11. Civil liabilities on account of false registration statement

(a) In case any part of the registration statement, when such part became effective, contained an untrue statement of a material fact or omitted to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, any person acquiring such security (unless it is proved that at the time of such acquisition he knew of such untruth or omission) may, either at law or in equity, in any court of competent jurisdiction, sue—

(1) every person who signed the registration statement;

(2) every person who was a director of (or person performing similar functions) or partner in the issuer at the time of the filing of the part of the registration statement with respect to which his liability is asserted;

(3) every person who, with his consent, is named in the registration statement as being or about to become a director, person performing similar functions, or partner;

(4) every accountant, engineer, or appraiser, or any person whose profession gives authority to a statement made by him, who has with his consent been named as having prepared or certified any part of the registration statement, or as having prepared or certified any report or valuation which is used in connection with the registration statement, with respect to the statement in such registration statement, report, or valuation, which purports to have been prepared or certified by him;

(5) every underwriter with respect to such security.

If such person acquired the security after the issuer has made generally available to its security holders an earning statement covering a period of at least twelve months beginning after the effective date of the registration statement, then the right of recovery under this subsection shall be conditioned on proof that such person acquired the security relying upon such untrue statement in the registration statement or relying upon the registration statement and not knowing of such omission, but such reliance may be established without proof of the reading of the registration statement by such person.

(Clauses (b) to (d) are omitted. Ed.)

(e) The suit authorized under subsection (a) may be to recover such damages as shall represent the difference between the amount paid for the security (not exceeding the price at which the security was offered to the public) and (1) the value thereof as of the time such suit was brought, or (2) the price at which such security shall have been disposed of in the market before suit, or (3) the price at which such security shall have been disposed of after suit but before judgment if such damages shall be less than the damages representing the difference between the amount paid for the security (not exceeding the price at which the security was offered to the public) and the value thereof as of the time such suit was brought: Provided, That if the defendant proves that any portion or all of such damages represents other than the depreciation in value of such security resulting from such part of the registration statement, with respect to which his liability is asserted, not being true or omitting to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, such portion of or all such damages shall not be recoverable. In no event shall any underwriter (unless such underwriter shall have knowingly received from the issuer for acting as an underwriter some benefit, directly or indirectly, in which all other underwriters similarly situated did not share in proportion to their respective interests in the underwriting) be liable in any suit or as a consequence of suits authorized under subsection (a) for damages in excess of the total price at which the securities underwritten by him and distributed to the public were offered to the public. In any suit under this or any other section of this subchapter the court may, in its discretion, require an undertaking for the payment of the costs of such suit, including reasonable attorney's fees, and if judgment shall be rendered against a party litigant, upon the motion of the other party litigant, such costs may be assessed in favor of such party litigant (whether or not such undertaking has been required) if the court believes the suit or the defense to have been without merit, in an amount sufficient to reimburse him for the reasonable expenses incurred by him, in connection with such suit, such costs to be taxed in the manner usually provided for taxing of costs in the court in which the suit was heard.

Sec. 12. Civil liabilities arising in connection with prospectuses and communications

Any person who—

(1) sells a security in violation of section 5; or

(2) sells a security (whether or not exempted by the provisions of section 3, other than paragraph (2) of subsection (a) thereof), by the use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or of the mails, by means of a prospectus or oral communication, which includes an untrue statement of a material fact or omits to state a material fact necessary in order to make the statements, in the light of the circumstances under which they were made, not misleading (the purchaser not knowing of such untruth or omission), and who shall not sustain the burden of proof that he did not know, and in the exercise of reasonable care could not have known of such untruth or omission, shall be liable to the person purchasing such security from him, who may sue either at law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction, to recover the consideration paid for such security with interest thereon, less the amount of any income received thereon, upon the tender of such security, or for damages if he no longer owns the security.

Sec. 13. Limitation of Actions

(Omitted. Ed.)

Sec. 14. Contrary Stipulations Void

Any condition, stipulation, or provision binding any person acquiring any security to waive compliance with any provision of this title or of the rules and regulations of the Commission shall be void.

Sec. 15. Liability of Controlling Persons

Every person who, by or through stock ownership, agency, or otherwise, or who, pursuant to or in connection with an agreement or understanding with one or more other persons by or through stock ownership, agency, or otherwise, controls any person liable under section 11 or 12, shall also be liable jointly and severally with and to the same extent as such controlled person to any person to whom such controlled person is liable, unless the controlling person had no knowledge of or reasonable ground to believe in the existence of the facts by reason of which the liability of the controlled person is alleged to exist.

Sec. 16. Additional remedies

The rights and remedies provided by this act shall be in addition to any and all other rights and remedies that may exist at law or in equity.

Sec. 17. Fraudulent interstate transactions

(a) It shall be unlawful for any person in the sale of any securities by the use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or by the use of the mails, directly or indirectly—

(1) to employ any device, scheme, or artifice to defraud, or

(2) to obtain money or property by means of any untrue statement of a material fact or any omission to state a material fact necessary in order to make the statements made, in the light of the circumstances under which they were made, not misleading, or

(3) to engage in any transaction, practice, or course of business which operates or would operate as a fraud or deceit upon the purchaser.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any person, by the use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or by the use of the mails, to publish, give publicity to, or circulate any notice, circular, advertisement, newspaper, article, letter, investment service, or communication which, though not purporting to offer a security for sale, describes such security for a consideration received or to be received, directly or indirectly, from an issuer, underwriter, or dealer, without fully disclosing the receipt, whether past or prospective, of such consideration and the amount thereof.

(c) The exemptions provided in section 3 shall not apply to the provisions of this section.

Sec. 18. State control of securities

Nothing in this act shall affect the jurisdiction of the securities commission (or any agency or office performing like functions) of any State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, over any security or any person.

Sec. 19. Special powers of Commission

(Authority to make regulations and forms—Publication of regulations—Immunity for conformity)

(a) The Commission shall have authority from time to time to make, amend, and rescind such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, including rules and regulations governing registration statements and prospectuses for various classes of securities and issuers, and defining accounting, technical, and trade terms used in this act. Among other things, the Commission shall have authority, for the purposes of this act, to prescribe the form or forms in which required information shall be set forth, the items or details to be shown in the balance sheet and earning statement, and the methods to be followed in the preparation of accounts, in the appraisal or valuation of assets and liabilities, in the determination of depreciation and depletion, in the differentiation of recurring and nonrecurring income, in the differentiation of investment and operating income, and in the preparation, where the Commission deems it necessary or desirable, of consolidated balance sheets or income accounts of any person directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by the issuer, or any person under direct or indirect common control with the issuer; but insofar as they relate to any common carrier subject to the provisions of section 20 of Title 49, the rules and regulations of the Commission with respect to accounts shall not be inconsistent with the requirements imposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission under authority of such section 20. The rules and regulations of the Commission shall be effective upon publication in the manner which the Commission shall prescribe. No provision in this act imposing any liability shall apply to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any rule or regulation of the Commission, notwithstanding that such rule or regulation may, after such act or omission, be amended or rescinded or be determined by judicial or other authority to be invalid for any reason.

(Oaths and subpoenas)

(b) For the purpose of all investigations which, in the opinion of the Commission, are necessary and proper for the enforcement of this act, any member of the Commission or any officer or officers designated by it are empowered to administer oaths and affirmations, subpoena witnesses, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, or other documents which the Commission deems relevant or material to the inquiry. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States or any Territory at any designated place of hearing.

Sec. 20. Injunctions and prosecution of offenses

(a) Whenever it shall appear to the Commission, either upon complaint or otherwise, that the provisions of this act, or of any rule or regulation prescribed under authority thereof, have been or are about to be violated, it may, in its discretion, either require or permit such person to file with it a statement in writing, under oath, or otherwise, as to all the facts and circumstances concerning the subject matter which it believes to be in the public interest to investigate, and may investigate such facts.

(b) Whenever it shall appear to the Commission that any person is engaged or about to engage in any acts or practices which constitute or will constitute a violation of the provisions of this act, or of any rule or regulation prescribed under authority thereof, it may in its discretion, bring an action in any district court of the United States, United States court of any Territory, or the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia to enjoin such acts or practices, and upon a proper showing a permanent or temporary injunction or restraining order shall be granted without bond. The Commission may transmit such evidence as may be available concerning such acts or practices to the Attorney General who may, in his discretion, institute the necessary criminal proceedings under this subchapter. Any such criminal proceeding may be brought either in the district wherein the transmittal of the prospectus or security complained of begins, or in the district wherein such prospectus or security is received.

(c) Upon application of the Commission the district courts of the United States, the United States courts of any Territory, and the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia, shall also have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person to comply with the provisions of this act or any order of the Commission made in pursuance thereof.

Sec. 21. Hearing by Commission

(Records)

All hearings shall be public and may be held before the Commission or an officer or officers of the Commission designated by it, and appropriate records thereof shall be kept.

Sec. 22. Jurisdiction of offenses and suits

(Judicial enforcement)

(a) The district courts of the United States, the United States courts of any Territory, and the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction of offenses and violations under this title and under the rules and regulations promulgated by the Commission in respect thereto, and, concurrent with State and Territorial courts, of all suits in equity and actions at law brought to enforce any liability or duty created by this act. Any such suit or action may be brought in the district wherein the defendant is found or is an inhabitant or transacts business, or in the district where the sale took place, if the defendant participated therein, and process in such cases may be served in any other district of which the defendant is an inhabitant or wherever the defendant may be found. Judgments and decrees so rendered shall be subject to review as provided in sections 225 and 347 of Title 28. No case arising under this act and brought in any State court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any court of the United States. No costs shall be assessed for or against the Commission in any proceeding under this act brought by or against it in the Supreme Court or such other courts.

(Proceedings for contempt)

(b) In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to any person, any of the said United States courts, within the jurisdiction of which said person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey is found or resides, upon application by the Commission may issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission, or one of its examiners designated by it, there to produce documentary evidence if so ordered, or there to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

(Amnesty)

(c) No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, contracts, agreements, and other documents before the Commission, or in obedience to the subpoena of the Commission or any member thereof or any officer designated by it, or in any cause or proceeding instituted by the Commission, on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him, may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no individual shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, except that such individual so testifying shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

Sec. 23. Unlawful representations(Prevention of misuse of registration)

Neither the fact that the registration statement for a security has been filed or is in effect nor the fact that a stop order is not in effect with respect thereto shall be deemed a finding by the Commission that the registration statement is true and accurate on its face or that it does not contain an untrue statement of fact or omit to state a material fact, or be held to mean that the Commission has in any way passed upon the merits of, or given approval to, such security. It shall be unlawful to make, or cause to be made to any prospective purchaser any representation contrary to the foregoing provisions of this section.

Sec. 24. Penalties

Any person who willfully violates any of the provisions of this act, or the rules and regulations promulgated by the Commission under authority thereof, or any person who willfully, in a registration statement filed under this act, makes any untrue statement of a material fact or omits to state any material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Sec. 25. Jurisdiction of other Government agencies over securities

(Saving clause)

Nothing in this act shall relieve any person from submitting to the respective supervisory units of the Government of the United States information, reports, or other documents that are now or may hereafter be required by any provision of law.

Sec. 26. Separability of provisions

If any provision of this act, or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this act, or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

SECTION 3. SANCTIONS GENERALLY

A. Definitions

SIR JOHN W. SALMOND, JURISPRUDENCE

London: 1930. 8th ed. by Manning. Sweet & Maxwell, Ltd. 23.

The instrument of coercion by which any system of imperative law is enforced is called a sanction, and any rule so enforced is said to be sanctioned. Thus physical force in the various methods of its application is the sanction applied by the state in the administration of justice. Censure, ridicule, and contempt are the sanctions by which society (as distinguished from the state) enforces the rules of positive morality. War is the last and most formidable of the sanctions which in the society of nations maintains the law of nations. Threatenings of evils to flow here or hereafter from Divine anger are the sanctions of religion, so far as religion assumes the form of a regulative or coercive system of imperative law.

A sanction is not necessarily a punishment or penalty. To punish law-breakers is an effective way of maintaining the law, but it is not the only way. The state enforces the law not only by imprisoning the thief, but by depriving him of his plunder and restoring it to the true owner; and each of these applications of the physical force of the state is equally a sanction.

SIR WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, 1 COMMENTARIES

Oxford: 1765. The Clarendon Press. Intro. Sec. 2, p. 56.

With regard to the sanction of laws, or the evil that may attend the breach of public duties, it is observed, that human legislators have for the most part chosen to make the sanction of their laws rather vindictory than remunatory, or to consist rather in punishments, than in actual particular rewards. Because in the first place, the quiet enjoyment and protection of all our civil rights and liberties, which are the sure and general consequence of obedience to the municipal law, are in themselves the best and most valuable of all rewards. Because also, were the exercise of every virtue to be enforced by the proposal of particular rewards, it were impossible for any state to furnish stock enough for so profuse a bounty. And farther, because the dread of evil is a much more forcible principle of human actions than the prospect of good. For which reasons, though a prudent bestowing of rewards is sometimes of exquisite use, yet we find that those civil laws, which enforce and enjoin our duty, do seldom, if ever, propose any privilege or gift to such as obey the law; but do constantly come armed with a penalty denounced against transgressors, either expressly defining the nature and quantity of the punishment, or else leaving it to the discretion of the judges, and those who are entrusted with the care of putting the laws in execution.

TIGNER v. STATE OF TEXAS

Supreme Court of the United States, 1940.

310 U.S. 141, 60 S.Ct. 879, 84 L.Ed. 1124; rehearing denied 310 U.S. 659, 60 S.Ct. 1092, 84 L.Ed. 1422.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is an appeal under § 237(a) of the Judicial Code, as amended, 28 U.S.C. § 344(a), 28 U.S.C.A. § 344(a), to review a judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas sustaining the constitutionality of a Texas anti-trust law, and therefore upholding an indictment under it. Appellant was charged with participation in a conspiracy to fix the retail price of beer. Such a conspiracy is made a criminal offense by Title 19, Chapter 3, Art. 1632 et seq., of the Texas Penal Code. Because the provisions of this law do not "apply to agricultural products or live stock * * * in the hands of the producer or raiser", Art. 1642, Tigner challenged the validity of the entire statute and sought release in the local courts by habeas corpus. His claim has been rejected by the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals. 132 S.W.2d 885. Essentially his contention is that the exemption granted by the Texas statute falls within the condemnation of Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 184 U.S. 540, 22 S.Ct. 431, 46 L.Ed. 679, as offensive to "the equal protection of the laws" which the Fourteenth Amendment safeguards. If that case controls, appellant contends, the Texas Act cannot survive and he must go free.

The court below recognized that the exemption was identical with that deemed fatal to the Illinois statute involved in Connolly's case. But it felt that time and circumstances had drained that case of vitality, leaving it free to treat the exemption as an exercise of legislative discretion. A similar attitude has been reflected by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, Northern Wis. Co-operative Tobacco Pool v. Bekkedal, 182 Wis. 571, 593, 197 N.W. 936, and appears to underlie much recent state and federal legislation. Dealing as we are with an appeal to the Constitution, the Connolly case ought not to foreclose us from considering this exemption in its own setting.

The problem, in brief, is this: May Texas promote its policy of freedom for economic enterprise by utilizing the criminal law against various forms of combination and monopoly, but exclude from criminal punishment corresponding activities of agriculture?

Legislation, both state and federal, similar to that of Texas had its origin in fear of the concentration of industrial power following the Civil War. Law was invoked to buttress the traditional system of free competition, free markets and free enterprise. Pressure for this legislation came more particularly from those who as producers, as well as consumers, constituted the most dispersed economic groups.¹ These large sections of the population—those who labored with their hands and those who worked the soil—were as a matter of economic fact in a different relation to the community from that occupied by industrial combinations. Farmers were widely scattered and inured to habits of individualism; their economic fate was in large measure dependent upon contingencies beyond their control. In these circumstances, legislators may well have thought combinations of farmers and stockmen presented no threat to the community, or, at least, the threat was of a different order from that arising through combinations of industrialists and middlemen. At all events legislation like that of Texas rested on this view, curbing industrial and commercial combinations, and did not visit the same condemnation upon collaborative efforts by farmers and stockmen because the latter were felt to have a different economic significance.²

Since Connolly's case was decided, nearly forty years ago, an impressive legislative movement bears witness to general acceptance of the view that the differences between agriculture and industry call for differentiation in the formulation of public policy. The states as well as the United States have sanctioned cooperative action by farmers; have restricted their amenability to the anti-trust laws; have relieved their organizations from taxation. See, e.g., Capper-Volstead Act, 42 Stat. 388, 7 U.S.C. § 291, 7 U.S.C.A. § 291; Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, 731, 15 U.S.C. § 17, 15 U.S.C.A. § 17; § 101 (1) of the Internal Revenue Code, 53 Stat. 33, 26 U.S.C.A.Int.Rev.Code, § 101 (1). expressions of legislative policy have withstood challenge in the courts. Liberty Warehouse Co. v. Burley Tobacco Growers, 276 U.S. 71, 48 S.Ct. 291, 72 L.Ed. 473.³ Congress and the states have sometimes thought it necessary to control the supply and price of agricultural commodities within their respective spheres of jurisdiction, and the constitutional validity of these measures has been sustained. Mulford v. Smith, 307 U.S. 38, 59 S.Ct. 648, 83 L.Ed. 1092; United States v. Rock Royal Co-op., 307 U.S. 533, 59 S.Ct. 993, 83 L.Ed. 1446; Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 54 S.Ct. 505, 78 L.Ed. 940, 89 A.L.R. 1469.

At the core of all these enactments lies a conception of price and production policy for agriculture very different from that which underlies the demands made upon industry and commerce by anti-trust laws.⁴ These various measures are manifestations of the fact that in our national economy agriculture expresses functions and forces different from the other elements in the total economic process. Certainly these are differences which may be acted upon by the lawmakers. The equality at which the "equal protection" clause aims is not a disembodied equality. The Fourteenth Amendment enjoins "the equal protection of the laws", and laws are not abstract propositions. They do not relate to abstract units A, B and C, but are expressions of policy arising out of specific difficulties, addressed to the attainment of specific ends by the use of specific remedies. The Constitution does not require things which are different in fact or opinion to be treated in law as though they were the same. And so we conclude that to write into law the differences between agriculture and other economic pursuits was within the power of the Texas legislature. Connolly's case has been worn away by the erosion of time, and we are of opinion that it is no longer controlling.

Another feature of Texas anti-trust legislation is relied on by Tigner to invalidate the criminal statute under which he is being prosecuted. Beginning with the first enactment in 1894, the Texas anti-trust laws have had a complicated and checkered history. At present there are two statutes directed at combination and monopoly; the one under which Tigner was indicted, and another, subjecting to civil penalties the same conduct at which the challenged criminal law is aimed. 126, Revised Civil Statutes, Vernon's Ann.Civ.St.Tex. art. 7426 et seq. From such civil proceedings, which the Attorney General initiates, no exemption is given to farmers and stockmen. Appellant urges that the divergence between civil and criminal laws relating to the same conduct undermines the validity of the exemption in the criminal statute and thus invalidates the whole of it. This argument is but a minor variation on appellant's main theme. It amounts to a claim that differences substantial enough to permit substantive differentiation in formulating legislative policy do not permit differentiation as to remedy.

How to effectuate policy—the adaptation of means to legitimately sought ends—is one of the most intractable of legislative problems. Whether proscribed conduct is to be deterred by qui tam action or triple damages or injunction, or by criminal prosecution, or merely by defense to actions in contract, or by some, or all, of these remedies in combination, is a matter within the legislature's range of choice. Judgment on the deterrent effect of the various weapons in the armory of the law can lay little claim to scientific basis. Such judgment as yet is largely a prophecy based on meager and uninterpreted experience. How empiric the process is of adjusting remedy to policy, is shown by the history of anti-trust laws in Texas and elsewhere. The Sherman Law originally employed the injunction at the suit of the government, private action for triple damages, criminal prosecution and forfeiture. Later the injunction was made available to private suitors.⁵ In the case of combinations of common carriers the Sherman Law is qualified by the Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 1 et seq., Keogh v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 260 U.S. 156, 43 S.Ct. 47, 67 L.Ed. 183, and in the case of shipping combinations, by the Merchant Marine Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 861 et seq., United States Nav. Co. v. Cunard S. S. Co., 284 U.S. 474, 52 S.Ct. 247, 76 L.Ed. 408. In its own groping efforts to deal with the problem of monopoly, the Texas legislature has in the course of nearly half a century invoked a dozen remedies.⁶ When Iowa superimposed upon its general anti-trust law an additional penalty in the case of fire insurance combinations, this Court sustained the validity of the statute. Carroll v. Greenwich Insurance Co., 199 U.S. 401, 26 S.Ct. 66, 50 L.Ed. 246.

Legislation concerning economic combinations presents peculiar difficulties in the fashioning of remedies. The sensitiveness of the economic mechanism, the risks of introducing new evils in trying to stamp out old, familiar ones, the difficulties of proof within the conventional modes of procedure, the effect of shifting tides of public opinion—these and many other subtle factors must influence legislative choice. Moreover, the whole problem of deterrence is related to still wider considerations affecting the temper of the community in which law operates. The traditions of a society, the habits of obedience to law, the effectiveness of the law-enforcing agencies, are all peculiarly matters of time and place. They are thus matters within legislative competence. To say that the legislature of Texas must give to farmers complete immunity or none at all, is to say that judgment on these vexing issues precludes the view that, while the dangers from combinations of farmers and stockmen are so tenuous that civil remedies suffice to secure deterrence, they are substantial enough not to warrant entire disregard. We hold otherwise. Here, again, we must be mindful not of abstract equivalents of conduct, but of conduct in the context of actuality. Differences that permit substantive differentiations also permit differentiations of remedy. We find no constitutional bar against excluding farmers and stockmen from the criminal statute against combination and monopoly, and so holding, we conclude that there was likewise no bar against making the exemption partial rather than complete.

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE McREYNOLDS is of opinion that the judgment below should be reversed.

SECTION 4. PENALTIES

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION. REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATIVE DRAFTING; APPENDIX B

40 Rep.A.B.A. 569-594 (1915).

1. INTRODUCTION

Recent legislation in this country discloses a commendable tendency to provide for its enforcement through administrative education of and co-operation with the persons affected instead of relying upon the fear of prosecution for its violation as the sole stimulus to compliance.

In some instances discretionary power to extend the time for compliance with a statutory requirement has been conferred upon an administrative board or commission. Such a provision gives greater opportunity for the use of co-operative methods of enforcement and if not abused tends to mitigate the hardship frequently involved in strict compliance with the letter of regulatory legislation. For an example, see the Federal Car Coupling Act (United States Stats. L, Vol. 36, 238).

The fact remains, nevertheless, that it is the potential power of the penalty or other means of compelling compliance or punishing violation that invests with authority those upon whom is imposed the duty of enforcement, and insures respectful attention and obedience to their orders and suggestions. The importance of the penalty cannot be measured by the frequency with which it is imposed. Indeed, the necessity for its use as a means of enforcement tends to vary almost in inverse ratio to its effectiveness.

The term "penalty" is used throughout this topic in its broader sense of punishment of any sort, from forfeiture of money to imprisonment or death; but the scope of the topic is limited to the consideration of drafting problems. The comparative desirability of various ways and means of securing the most effectual enforcement of statutes, including such modified forms of penalties as condemnation, abatement, avoidance of contracts, or forfeiture of licenses and charters, are discussed only incidentally.

The obvious importance of the penalty suggests the need for careful phraseology of its provisions, but the difficulties of the drafter of such provisions are greatly increased by the fact that his work must stand not only the tests applied to all statutes, but also the much more rigorous scrutiny under the rule of strict construction which the courts apply to penal statutes.

2. AMOUNT OF PENALTY.

A full discussion of the considerations which go to determine the amount or size of a particular penalty is beyond the scope of this report. There is, however, a broad principle which determines the limits within which should fall the amount of the penalty for the violation of any legislative mandate. The maximum should exceed by a sufficient margin any possible advantage which might accrue to the offender from a violation of the law, and should not be so low as to permit its being looked upon as a mere license or price for the privilege of violation. On the other hand, the minimum, if any, should not be so high as to be under any circumstances incommensurate with the gravity of the offense, thus offering a strong inducement to a court or jury to seize upon a possibly insufficient justification for finding in favor of a defendant.

If the amount of the penalty is or may, through increase or accumulation, become very large, the constitutional guarantee of due process of law must be kept in mind. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that there is an unconstitutional denial of due process if the right to an adequate judicial review can be exercised only at the risk of having to pay penalties so great that it is better to yield to orders or requirements of uncertain validity than to ask the protection of the law. Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 28 S.Ct. 441, 52 L.Ed. 714, 13 L.R. A., N.S., 932, 14 Ann.Cas. 764; Wadley Southern Railroad v. Georgia, . . . 235 U.S. 651, 35 S.Ct. 214, 59 L.Ed. 405.

3. FIXED OR FLEXIBLE PENALTY.

The advantages of a flexible over a fixed penalty are obvious. The legislator can take into consideration only abstract culpability, and only a person familiar with the circumstances of each particular case is in a position to know the possible modifying or extenuating circumstances of that case and to make the most advantageous use of such knowledge in effecting the ultimate purposes of the law. . . .

The very advantage of the flexible penalty, viz., variation of its amount under circumstances of varying culpability, necessitates, however, a determination by some one as to its amount in each case. In the case of the criminal penalty the drafter will find no need to provide for such a determination because criminal procedure is well adapted to the administration of flexible penalties, and it is within the well-recognized powers of the judge to fix the amount of such a penalty. . . .

If a flexible civil penalty is found advisable, the means for the determination of its amount must be thoroughly considered. The most obvious alternatives are either to leave to the prosecuting attorney or other officer charged with its administration the determination of the amount by bringing an action for an amount within the maximum and minimum limits fixed by the statute, or to expressly confer upon the court having jurisdiction of the action the power to determine the amount in much the same manner as a criminal court imposes a sentence. . . .

Where an offense is of a kind that may be committed by either a person or a corporation and the punishment includes imprisonment, the amount of the fine should be made sufficiently flexible to permit the court to impose upon a corporate offender a fine commensurate with the imprisonment to which an individual may be sentenced. . . .

4. INCREASED PENALTY FOR SECOND AND SUBSEQUENT OFFENSES.

The principle of increasing the penalty for violations repeated after a penalty has once been incurred is well established. Its justification is found in the evident insufficiency of their warning already given; the contempt of the offender in persisting in violation shows the need of greater severity. Many problems are involved, however, in providing an effective system of increasing penalties for successive violations.

What constitutes a "second" or "subsequent" offense? Is it a second "violation" or a second "conviction"? It has been held that the manifest purpose of such provisions is to increase the penalty for offenses because of persistence in violating the law and that the term "second offense" must mean "second conviction" Carey v. State, 70 Ohio St. 121. The term "offense" has been so generally used and interpreted in this sense of "conviction" that it has probably acquired that technical meaning for the purpose of such provisions; but the careful drafter will leave no room for doubt as to the nature of the previous violation which is to justify a future increase in the penalty. In addition to the possibility of doubt as to whether offense means conviction, distinctions might also be drawn and are in fact drawn in some European countries between a conviction, followed by sentence and execution of the sentence, and a conviction without sentence or a conviction and sentence without execution. . . .

Where the penalty is made to vary for several classes of successive offenses as first, second, third, etc., care must be taken to avoid such description of the last class as might leave subsequent offenses unpunished; e.g., section 1275 of the New York Penal Law, providing penalties for violation of the labor law after specifying a penalty for first and second offenses, proceeds—"for a third offense, by a fine of not less than $250 or by imprisonment, etc.," without indicating any punishment for a fourth or subsequent violation. There should be inserted in the description of the class subject to the maximum penalty, some such word as "subsequent" or "succeeding"; e.g., in the statute just quoted, the language should have been "a third or subsequent offense."

5. CUMULATIVE PENALTIES.

In addition to, or as a substitute for, increased penalties for subsequent violations after a penalty has been imposed for a first violation, the legislature may want to impose a cumulative penalty for several distinct violations or for a continuing violation arising from a course of action or from a condition maintained in defiance of the statute. The term "cumulative penalty" is here used to indicate a multiple or aggregate penalty computed by multiplying the penalty prescribed for one offense by the number of separate offenses.

The "cumulative penalty" involves two principal problems: (1) whether the alleged offense constitutes one or several violations of the statute, i.e. whether the offense described by the statute is, in the language of the courts, continuing or separate, and (2) whether, admitting that there have been several distinct violations, there can be a recovery of but one penalty or of that penalty cumulated by multiplying it by the number of distinct offenses.

Whether the offense is continuing or separate, and hence whether one or several penalties have been incurred prior to a given time, depends entirely upon the language of the statute. The legislature has the power to specify definitely what constitutes a violation of the provisions of a statute, and it may provide that each such violation shall incur a separate penalty and that such penalty shall be cumulative. . . .

Where the drafter is assured that the legislature desires to impose a cumulative penalty, he can make the legislative intention effective by observing the following rules:

(1) It should be distinctly stated that the penalty is to be imposed for "each" or "each and every" offense or violation.

(2) The provisions defining the requirement or prohibition of the statute should be so drafted as to clearly indicate just what constitutes such an offense or violation. The importance of this rule is indicated by a recent statute which carefully provides "that each act of dentistry shall be deemed a separate offense," but fails to indicate what constitutes an "act of dentistry."

(3) Where the act or omission penalized is in its nature continuing, some such provision as that "each day during which the violation continues shall constitute a separate offense" should be used to indicate when an offense is completed for the purpose of incurring the penalty. . . .

6. COMPARATIVE DESIRABILITY OF CIVIL OR CRIMINAL PENALTY.

Penalties may be divided into two great classes, civil and criminal, and a decision between these two forms must always be made by the careful legislator. Many considerations, such as local conditions, the general character of the persons or corporations which are subject to the particular law, the established practice or custom in the jurisdiction, etc., will inevitably enter into the determination, but there are some considerations which indicate the comparative desirability of one form or the other.

A criminal penalty, especially if it permits a sentence of imprisonment, may prove a greater deterrent and more to be feared. A civil penalty, or even a fine, if not too large in amount and seemingly commensurate with the gravity of a minor offense, is sometimes treated as a mere license for the privilege of violating the law. Regulatory legislation very often applies particularly to persons or corporations to whom a money penalty means little as compared with personal imprisonment for even a short period. This consideration, however, also has its limitations, for it must be remembered that if an offense is one which may appear to the average court or jury as technical or formal and not particularly culpable, so that they are reluctant to brand a defendant as a criminal, judgment may more readily be obtained against him in a civil action. . . .

On the other hand, however, the practice in civil actions may increase the chances of a recovery. The slightest preponderance of evidence is sufficient to support a verdict in a civil case, while in a criminal case the evidence must be such as to convince beyond reasonable doubt. In some jurisdictions an added advantage is afforded by the fact that a less than unanimous agreement of a jury is sufficient for a verdict in a civil case.

There can be no remission or suspension by the court of a penalty recovered in a civil action; and in only a few of our constitutions does the pardoning power of the executive extend to the remission of civil penalties or forfeitures. Even under these constitutions, it would probably be construed as limited to penalties recovered directly by the state. The importance of this consideration has been shown in cases where minor courts not in sympathy with the purposes of a law have had jurisdiction of offenses under it. In certain counties in New York during the canning season, sentences for violations of the law regulating hours of labor have been remitted or suspended as soon as imposed.

A civil penalty insures to the department or official charged with the enforcement of a law, the right of appeal and an opportunity to secure a determination of disputed questions of constitutionality, validity and interpretation. In the case of criminal penalties, it is sometimes difficult to obtain such a final determination from the highest court in jurisdictions in which the state has no appeal from an acquittal, and it has happened not infrequently that the enforcement of a law which has eventually been upheld has been practically nullified for a long period through the adverse decisions of lower courts in directing verdicts of acquittal.

A requirement of the keeping of account books, time books, etc., and of the making of reports by those subject to the provisions of a regulatory statute is frequently an important part of the machinery for its enforcement. On the other hand, most of our constitutions contain the guarantee that no person shall in a criminal case be compelled to be a witness against himself, and if the penalty for the violation of such an act is a criminal one, there exists the possibility that important provisions essential to the administration of the act may be held unconstitutional. People ex rel. Ferguson v. Reardon, 197 N.Y. 236, 90 N.E. 829, 27 L.R.A.,N.S., 141, 134 Am.St.Rep. 871. This constitutional guarantee is expressly limited to criminal cases in the Constitution of the United States and in all but about six of the state constitutions.

It may sometimes happen that the interests of the public or of those who have been damaged by an offense might be furthered by a compromise (e. g., full restitution if prosecution is discontinued) more than the interests of justice would be furthered by pushing the prosecution. A provision for a civil penalty gives the prosecuting officer an opportunity to make such a compromise not afforded under a criminal penalty.

While it may at times be difficult to decide the question of policy as between a civil and a criminal penalty, there is no excuse for failing to clearly indicate the form of the penalty and thus passing on to the courts an unnecessary problem of interpretation. In the present development of our jurisprudence, every action or prosecution must fall on one side or the other of the line dividing civil and criminal procedure, and it is inexcusable that penalty provisions of such a hybrid nature as those referred to in subdivision eight of this topic should be so frequently found in our legislation.

7. CRIMINAL PENALTIES.

In drafting a provision which includes criminal penalties any inconsistency or failure to conform with the general criminal law and procedure of the jurisdiction should be avoided. From the very nature of the case it is impractical in this report to treat exhaustively this phase of the subject; but it is possible to point out briefly how an entirely different and unintended effect may result from such disregard on the part of the draftsman. . . .

In drafting a criminal penalty it is probably advisable to state that the person violating the statutory provisions "is guilty of a misdemeanor (or felony)." This precludes the possibility of a question whether the offense is criminal, and if so, of what grade, and of incidental questions as to the jurisdiction of the court, the manner of choosing a jury, etc.

In the construction of penalty provisions the question frequently arises whether a violation of a statute is punishable without proof of knowledge or intent on the part of the offender. The necessity for including the words "knowingly" or "wilfully" in defining the offense, or on the other hand expressly providing that knowledge or intent is immaterial, depends largely on such considerations as the nature and seriousness of the offense, its status at common law, the language of the statute in which it is defined, and the nature of the penalty which is imposed. The omission of such a provision defining the exact nature of the offense may necessitate a judicial interpretation, which in turn may materially affect the operation of the statute and contravene its most effective provisions. . . .

8. CIVIL PENALTIES.

In the case of a criminal penalty it is of course unnecessary to provide by whom the prosecution is to be brought; but a provision for a civil penalty should indicate upon whom the right of action is conferred—whether the state or a specified officer charged with the administration of the particular law, or a common informer or the party suffering damage on account of the violation.

It is in provisions for civil penalties that draftsmen have not infrequently committed a most flagrant breach of good form—at least it is such in most jurisdictions. Although in a few jurisdictions the courts have held to the contrary, the term "fine" ordinarily implies a criminal penalty and is for example defined by Bouvier as "a pecuniary punishment imposed by a lawful tribunal upon a person convicted of a crime or misdemeanor." The mode in which fines and penalties are to be recovered is a matter of legislative discretion and a statutory provision that a "fine" is to be recovered in a civil action would, of course, be enforced by the courts. Such wording is, to say the least, bad form, and at the worst may give rise to ambiguities as to just what procedure was intended. The use of any such terms as "fine," "guilty" or "conviction" should be strictly avoided in the drafting of any penalty provision not criminal in its nature. . . .

10. ILLUSTRATIVE PROVISIONS.

The following drafts of typical penalty provisions have been prepared in illustration of the principles here discussed:

"(a) Any person who violates any provision of this act or of the regulations made in pursuance thereof is guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished for a first offense by a fine of not less than $20 nor more than $100; for a second offense by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $250, or by imprisonment for not more than thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and for a third or subsequent offense by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment. A violation constitutes a second offense if committed after one conviction of the same person for a violation of the same or any other provision of this act or of the regulations made in pursuance thereof, and constitutes a third or subsequent offense if committed after two or more such convictions. (The term 'person' is used in these drafts on the assumption that it is elsewhere defined as including also corporations, associations, etc. In this connection note the use throughout the Criminal Code of the United States of the term 'whoever.')

"(b) Any person who violates any provision of this act or of the regulations made in pursuance thereof, shall, for each violation, be liable to a penalty of $50, to be recovered in a civil action by the people of the state.

"(c) Any person who sells or gives a cigarette to any minor under the age of sixteen years, shall for each cigarette so sold or given forfeit any pay to the parent or guardian of such a minor the sum of $10, to be recovered in a civil action by the person entitled thereto.

"(d) Any person who violates any provision of this act shall for each violation forfeit to the people of the state the sum of $100, to be recovered in a civil action. When the violation consists of the manufacture or production of any article or substance, or the maintenance of any condition, or the continuance of any course of action, each day during any part of which such manufacture or production is carried on, or such condition or course of action is maintained or continued, constitutes a separate violation. When the violation consists of the sale or exchange or the offering or exposing for sale or exchange of any article or substance, the sale or exchange of each one of several packages shall constitute a separate violation, and each day on any part of which any such article or substance is offered or exposed for sale or exchange constitutes a separate violation. When the use or furnishing for use of any such article or substance is prohibited, each day during any part of which such article or substance is so furnished for use constitutes a separate violation, and the furnishing of the same for use constitutes a separate violation as to each person to whom it is furnished." "The changes recommended are as follows: . . . II. The amendment of Sections 524 and 525 of the Real Property Law to do away with treble damages for waste and to limit the right of forfeiture to cases where the damage equals or exceeds the value of the estate in possession. The rule as to treble damages for waste was introduced by the Statute of Gloucester in 1278, but has not been used in England for 250 years, was repealed in effect in 1833 and in fact in 1879. The rule of the Statute of Gloucester was enacted in New York in 1787, and still survives. Those who might use it choose generally to sue instead only for compensatory damages. There is no public policy to sustain the ancient rule, and it is out of keeping with general rules of damages in actions for injuries to property." The recommended statute was adopted, N.Y. In this document, two bills were recommended: the first relating to treble damages for injuries to property (1944 N.Y.Sen.Int. 55, Pr. 55, Ass.Int. 46, Pr. 46) not enacted; the second relating to treble damages for waste by guardian became N.Y.Laws 1944, c. 287.

SECTION 5. CONTEMPT PROCEEDINGS

PENFIELD CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

Supreme Court of the United States, 1947.

330 U.S. 585, 67 S.Ct. 918, — L.Ed. —.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Securities and Exchange Commission, acting pursuant to its authority under § 20(a) of the Securities Act of 1933, 48 Stat. 74, 86, 15 U.S.C. § 77t, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77t(a), issued orders directing an investigation to determine whether Penfield Company had violated the Act in the sale of stock or other securities. In the course of that investigation it directed a subpoena duces tecum to Young, as an officer of Penfield, requiring him to produce certain books of the corporation covering a four year period ending in April, 1943. See § 19(b) of the Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77s(b). Upon Young's refusal to appear and produce the books and records, the Commission filed an application with the District Court for an order enforcing the subpoena. After a hearing, the court ordered Young, as an officer of Penfield, to produce them. Young persisted in his non-compliance. The Commission then applied to the District Court for a rule to show cause why Young should not be adjudged in contempt—a proceeding which, as we shall see, was one for civil contempt. The District Court delayed action on the motion until after disposition of a criminal case involving Young, Penfield, and others. When that case was concluded, the court, after hearing, adjudged Young to be in contempt. It refused, however, to grant any coercive relief designed to force Young to produce the documents but instead imposed on him a flat, unconditional fine of $50.00 which he paid.³

[Footnotes 1 and 2 are omitted. Ed.]

³ The request of the Commission and the ruling of the court are made clear by the following colloquy:

"Mr. Cuthbertson: So far as the punishment which the Court might see fit to impose, that is up to the Court. We are still anxious to get a look at these books and records, so I suggest to the Court, if he be so disposed, whatever punishment the Court might see fit to impose would be in connection with or so long as he refuses to produce his books and records for our inspection.

"The Court: I don't think that I am going to be disposed to do anything like that. I sat here for six weeks and listened to books and records. The Government

That was on July 2, 1945. On September 24, 1945, the Commission filed a notice of appeal in the District Court and subsequently a statement of points challenging as error the action of the District Court in imposing the $50.00 fine, instead of a remedial penalty calculated to make Young produce the documents. The Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, holding that the District Court erred in imposing the fine and directing that Young be ordered imprisoned until he produced the documents. 9 Cir., 157 F.2d 65. The case is here on a petition for a writ of certiorari filed by Penfield Co. and Young. Neither the District Court nor the Circuit Court of Appeals rendered judgment against Penfield. Nor is any relief sought by or against it here. Accordingly the writ is dismissed as to Penfield.

First. It is argued that since no application for an allowance of an appeal was made, the Circuit Court of Appeals had no jurisdiction to entertain it. If the appeal was in a suit of a civil nature, the filing of the notice of appeal with the District Court was adequate under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

It is the nature of the relief asked that is determinative of the nature of the proceeding. Lamb v. Cramer, 285 U.S. 217, 220, 52 S.Ct. 315, 316, 76 L.Ed. 715. This was not a proceeding in which the United States was a party and in which it was seeking to vindicate the public interest. See Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U.S. 418, 445, 31 S.Ct. 492, 499, 55 L.Ed. 797, 34 L.R.A.,N.S., 874. The contempt proceedings were instituted as a part of the proceedings in which the Commission sought enforcement of a subpoena. The relief which the Commission sought was production of the documents; and the only sanction asked was a penalty designed to compel their production. Where a fine or imprisonment imposed on the contemnor is "intended to be remedial by coercing the defendant to do what he had refused to do", Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., supra, 221 U.S. at page 442, 31 S.Ct. at page 498, 55 L.Ed. 797, 34 L.R.A.,N.S., 874, the remedy is one for civil contempt. United States v. United Mine Workers, 330 U.S. 258, 67 S.Ct. 677. Then "the punishment is wholly remedial, serves only the purposes of the complainant, and is not intended as a deterrent to offenses against the public." McCrone v. United States, 307 U.S. 61, 64, 59 S.Ct. 685, 686, 83 L.Ed. 1108. One who is fined, unless by a day certain he produces the books, has it in his power to produced people from all over the United States in connection with the Penfield matter.

"Mr. Cuthbertson: I might say, your Honor, that we have in mind that these books and records may disclose certain acts other than those charged in the indictment. We don't propose to go over the same matter that the Court went over in connection with the criminal case.

"The Court: The Court can take judicial notice of its own books and records, and in that trial the evidence was clear and definite and positive from all of the Government's witnesses, that during one period of time this defendant had nothing whatsoever to do with the Penfield Company. Whether that period of time is covered by what the Securities and Exchange Commission seeks or not, I don't know.

"The judgment and sentence of the Court is that the defendant pay a fine of $50, and stand committed until paid."

avoid any penalty. And those who are imprisoned until they obey the order, "carry the keys of their prison in their own pockets." In re Nevitt, 8 Cir., 117 F. 448, 461. Fine and imprisonment are then employed not to vindicate the public interest but as coercive sanctions to compel the contemnor to do what the law made it his duty to do. See Doyle v. London Guarantee Co., 204 U.S. 599, 27 S.Ct. 313, 511 L.Ed. 641; Oriel v. Russell, 278 U.S. 358, 49 S.Ct. 173, 73 L.Ed. 419; Fox v. Capital Co., 299 U.S. 105, 57 S.Ct. 57, 81 L.Ed. 67; McCrone v. United States, supra.

The Act gives the Commission authority to require the production of books and records in the course of its investigations. And in absence of a basis for saying that its demand exceeds lawful limits (Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 66 S.Ct. 494), it is entitled to the aid of the court in obtaining them. A refusal of the court to enforce its prior order for the production of the documents denies the Commission that statutory relief. The issue thus raised poses a problem in civil, not criminal, contempt. . . .

Second. The question on the merits is two-fold: (1) whether the Circuit Court of Appeals erred in granting the Commission remedial relief by directing that Young be required to produce the documents; and (2) whether that court exceeded its authority in reversing the judgment which imposed the fine and in substituting a term of imprisonment conditioned on continuance of the contempt.

As we have already noted, the Act requires the production of documents demanded pursuant to lawful orders of the Commission and lends judicial aid to obtain them. There is no basis in the record before us for saying that the demand of the Commission exceeded lawful limits. There is, however, a suggestion that the District Court was warranted in denying remedial relief since the contempt hearing came after a criminal trial of petitioners in another case, during the course of which many of Penfield's books and records were examined. The thought apparently is that the Commission had probed enough into Penfield's affairs. But the District Court did not hold that the Commission's request had become moot, that the documents produced satisfied its legitimate needs, or that the additional ones sought were irrelevant to its statutory functions.⁸ We agree with the Circuit Court of Appeals that at least in absence of such a finding, the refusal of the District Court to grant the full remedial relief which the Act places behind the orders of the Commission was an abuse of discretion. The records might well disclose other offenses against the Securities Act of 1933 which the Commission administers. The history of this case reveals a long, persistent effort to defeat the investigation. The fact that Young paid the fine and did not appeal indicates that the judgment of contempt may have been an easy victory for him. On the other hand, the dilatory tactics employed suggest that if justice was to be done, coercive sanctions were necessary.

⁸ As will be seen from note 3, supra, the court, immediately prior to rendering its sentence, noted that there was one period during which Young was not connected with Penfield Co. But the court added: "Whether that period of time is covered by what the Securities and Exchange Commission seeks or not, I don't know."

When the Circuit Court of Appeals substituted imprisonment for the fine, it put a civil remedy in the place of a criminal punishment. For the imprisonment authorized would be suffered only if the documents were not produced or would continue only so long as Young was recalcitrant. On the other hand, the fine imposed by the District Court, unlike that involved in Fox v. Capital Co., supra, 299 U.S. at pages 106, 107, 57 S.Ct. at page 58, 81 L.Ed. 67, was unconditional and not relief of a coercive nature such as the Commission sought. It was solely and exclusively punitive in character. Cf. Nye v. United States, 313 U.S. 33, 42, 43, 61 S.Ct. 810, 812, 813, 85 L.Ed. 1172.

As already noted, Young did not appeal from the order holding him in contempt and subjecting him to a fine. Young maintains, however, that once the fine was imposed and paid, the jurisdiction of the court was exhausted; that the Circuit Court of Appeals was without authority to substitute another penalty or to add to the one already imposed and satisfied. That argument rests on the statute granting federal courts the power to punish contempts of their authority, Judicial Code § 268, 28 U.S.C. § 385, 28 U.S.C.A. § 585, and the decisions construing it. The statute gives the federal courts power "to punish, by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, contempts of their authority," including violations of their lawful orders. At least in a criminal contempt proceeding both fine and imprisonment may not be imposed since the statute provides alternative penalties. In re Bradley, 318 U.S. 50, 63 S.Ct. 470, 87 L.Ed. 500. Hence if a fine is imposed on a contemnor and he pays it, the sentence may not thereafter be amended so as to provide for imprisonment. The argument here is that after a fine for criminal contempt is paid, imprisonment may not be added to, or substituted for the fine, as a coercive sanction in a civil contempt proceeding. If that position is sound, then the statutory limitation of "fine or imprisonment" would preclude a court from imposing a fine as a punitive measure and imprisonment as a remedial measure, or vice versa.

The dual function of contempt has long been recognized—(1) vindication of the public interest by punishment of contemptuous conduct; (2) coercion to compel the contemnor to do what the law requires of him. Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., supra, 221 U.S. at pages 441 et seq., 31 S.Ct. at page 498, 55 L.Ed. 797, 34 L.R.A.,N.S., 874; United States v. United Mine Workers, supra. As stated in Bessette v. W. B. Conkey Co., 194 U.S. 324, 327, 24 S.Ct. 665, 666, 48 L.Ed. 997, "The purpose of contempt proceedings is to uphold the power of the court, and also to secure to suitors therein the rights by it awarded."

We assume, arguendo, that the statute allowing fine or imprisonment governs civil as well as criminal contempt proceedings. If the statute is so construed, we find in it no barrier to the imposition of both a fine as a punitive exaction and imprisonment as a coercive sanction, or vice versa.⁹ That practice has been approved. Kreplik v. Couch Patents Co., 1 Cir., 190 F. 565, 571. And see Phillips Sheet & Tin Plate Co. v. Amalgamated Ass'n, D.C., 208 F. 335, 340. When the court imposes a fine as a penalty, it is punishing yesterday's contemptuous conduct. When it adds the coercive sanction of imprisonment, it is announcing the consequences of tomorrow's contumacious conduct. At least in that situation the offenses are not the same. And the most that the statute forbids is the imposition of both fine and imprisonment for the same offense.

Young raises objections that go to the merits of the judgment of contempt. These were considered and determined against him by the District Court. Since he did not appeal from that adverse judgment, he is precluded from renewing the objections at this stage. Le Tulle v. Scofield, 308 U.S. 415, 421, 422, 60 S.Ct. 313, 316, 317, 84 L. Ed. 355; Helvering v. Pfeiffer, 302 U.S. 247, 250, 251, 58 S.Ct. 159, 160, 161, 82 L.Ed. 231.

There is a difference of view among us whether the portion of the order of the Circuit Court of Appeals which set aside the unconditional fine of $50 imposed on Young is here for review. But if we assume that it is, a majority of the Court is of the opinion that the Circuit Court of Appeals was correct in setting it aside, since the fine was imposed in a civil contempt proceeding. See Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., supra.

Affirmed.

[MR. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE concurred, with opinion. MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, with whom MR. JUSTICE JACKSON concurred, dissented on the ground that the trial court's finding that need for subpoena had ceased and his decision not to compel it were within his allowable discretion.]

⁹ Some rules governing criminal contempts are, of course, different from those governing civil contempts. Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., supra, 221 U.S. at pages 444, 446-449, 31 S.Ct. at pages 499, 500-501, 55 L.Ed. 797, 34 L.R.A., N.S., 874. If those differences are satisfied and if, as in In re Swan, 150 U.S. 637, 14 S.Ct. 225, 37 L.Ed. 1207; Matter of Christensen Engineering Co., 194 U.S. 458, 24 S.Ct. 729, 48 L.Ed. 1072; In re Merchants' Stock & Grain Co., 223 U.S. 639, 32 S.Ct. 339, 56 S.Ct. 584; Farmers & Mechanics Nat. Bank v. Wilkinson, 266 U.S. 503, 45 S.Ct. 144, 69 L.Ed. 408, the criminal penalty and the remedial relief are segregated, no problem of the adequacy of the order for purposes of appellate review is presented. No question is raised here as to the propriety of combining civil and criminal contempt in the same proceeding.

SECTION 6. INVALIDATIONS AND DISABILITIES

ERNST FREUND, LEGISLATIVE REGULATION

New York: 1932 The Commonwealth Fund. 56-58.

§ 18. Prohibition by Way of Disability. There are very few cases in which a disability of a civil character is superimposed upon an antecedent common law right. Mortmain legislation which prohibits testamentary gifts under certain circumstances furnishes an instance in point; but it plays no important part in America. If the Rule against Perpetuities were a legislative product, it would be a typical illustration; the Rule, however, operates as a rule of unwritten law.

The common form of prohibition by way of disability is that found in qualified enabling legislation. There is a common law incapacity in the first instance, which the law lifts in part, subject to qualifications. The conspicuous instances in point are corporate disabilities. A pure statutory grant or benefit, subject to limitations, is of a similar character. If, on the other hand, the statute first forbids the exercise of what might be regarded as a natural capacity, except under a license or permit, and then imposes restrictions or limitations, these hardly differ from other cases of restrictive regulation.

It will be noted that in the control of transportation the United States leaves the law of corporate capacity to the states the Interstate Commerce Act operating through penal prohibitions; on the other hand, national bank legislation is enabling legislation with attendant disabilities, and the commerce power of the United States is not used to regulate banking operations of state banks.

The limitation of an enabling act may result from implication or narrow construction. The National Bank Act of 1864 was silent upon the subject of branch banks, except that it required the certificate of organization to state the particular city, etc. (using the singular) at which it was proposed to conduct operations (see § 6, No. 2 of Act of 1864); and the important branch-banking power was denied mainly upon general principles of construction (29 Op.A.G. 81, 1911; First National Bank v. Missouri, 263 U.S. 640, 44 S.Ct. 213, 68 L.Ed. 486, 1924).

The expression of a prohibition as a qualification of an enabling provision, is of practical importance, since it is not, like penal regulation, felt to be an impairment of liberty and still less of constitutional rights. It is, moreover, a matter of legislative psychology, if a disability is lifted, not to lift it altogether, or to lift it only gradually; witness the course of married women's legislation and of incorporation laws. The result is the persistence of restrictions or requirements that have ceased to represent any clear policy; qualification requirements that are commonly evaded or made perfunctory; limitations upon the duration of corporate life that are inconvenient and serve no purpose; limitations upon charter objects or upon the combination of objects, the wisdom or unwisdom of which has never been thoroughly considered. And whereas penal regulations are most doubtful and precarious if they attempt to control economic forces, civil disabilities are predominantly of economic operation. They are tolerated because they conform to settled custom, denying liberties that have never been enjoyed, or because they lend themselves to accommodation or evasion.

The amount of regulative legislation contained in the statutes of a given jurisdiction is likely to be taken as an index to the relation between the respective provinces of restraint and liberty. It is, however, a reliable index only in so far as non-regulation means common law liberty, not in so far as non-regulation means common law disability. If insurance or railroad transportation cannot be carried on effectively without corporate facilities, little is gained by non-regulation, unless the common law disability is first lifted. During the earlier part of the nineteenth century the place of present-day regulative statutes was to a large extent taken by special corporate charters. Their supersession by general regulative legislation is a gain rather than a loss to liberty.

It would require an exhaustive survey of statutory civil disabilities to verify the applicability of the above suggestions to any given jurisdiction.

THIBAUT v. LALUMIERE

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1945.
318 Mass. 72, 60 N.E.2d 849, 158 A.L.R. 613.

RONAN, JUSTICE. This is an appeal from an order sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration filed in an action of tort which was commenced on July 16, 1943. Although the declaration contains a mass of irrelevant and immaterial matters, no objection to its form was made in the Superior Court. We set forth all the allegations pertinent to any possible cause of action upon which the pleader might have intended to base a claim against the defendant. The declaration alleged that from the time she entered the employ of the defendant's firm in January, 1930, until 1943, when she finally ceased to keep company with the defendant, he planned to seduce her; that he induced her to keep company with him and to become engaged to marry him by his false representations that he loved her and that he was a single man; that she discovered in May, 1930, that he was married and left her employment; that she re-entered the employment several times upon his promise not to molest her but that she quit on a number of occasions when he molested her; that in 1934 she left the Commonwealth; that upon her return in 1942 the defendant represented that he had secured a divorce, that he was a single man and would marry her, and that he would make a permanent home for her; that relying on these representations she went to live at the home of the defendant's mother where he lived; that she became dissatisfied with his delaying the marriage and left the said home; and that she learned in June, 1943, that he had married again in 1942 and she ceased to associate with him any longer. She alleges that as a result of the defendant's conduct she submitted to his embraces and caresses, was deprived of an opportunity to meet and marry some honorable young man, lost employment, suffered humiliation and grief, and was made ill.

The declaration sets forth no cause of action for seduction. Nothing more than an intent or a plan to seduce her is alleged. We do not intimate that, if seduction had been averred, she could recover damages. It has been held that, in order that a father may recover for the seduction of his minor daughter or a master for the seduction of a female servant, it must be shown that he lost the services of the woman on account of the seduction. The action cannot be maintained on any other basis. . . . But it is an ancient and settled rule of the common law that the party seduced is barred by her participation in a wrong from recovering damages. . . . While damages for seduction may not be recovered in an independent action, they may be included in the measure of damages in an action for breach of promise of marriage. . . . The plaintiff, however, cannot recover damages for seduction as an incident to an action for breach of promise of marriage if, as will presently appear, she cannot maintain such an action.

The plaintiff contends that she can recover on this declaration for an assault and battery. This contention rests upon the allegation that "as a result of defendant's behavior the plaintiff was caused to acquiesce in and submit to defendant's embraces and caresses." It is to be noted that this allegation refers to an element of damage and does not purport to set forth a substantive cause of action. In the next place, if the plaintiff knowingly consented to and participated in these manifestations of apparent affection by the defendant, her consent would bar her from complaining that conduct of this character constituted a wrong to her. . . . If, as she now contends, her consent was procured by fraud of the defendant in that he did not intend to perform his promise to marry her, . . . she could not maintain an action on account of such acts committed during a courtship where the only ground for contending that such acts constituted a wrong was his intent not to carry out his promise to marry her and so was directly attributable to the breach of contract to marry if, as will appear, a statute declares that the breach of such a contract shall not be deemed to be a legal wrong or injury. . . .

However the plaintiff's contentions are viewed, they all stem from the alleged contract to marry which she alleged was made between the defendant and herself, Brick v. Cohn-Hall-Marx Co., 276 N.Y. 259, 11 N.E.2d 902, 114 A.L.R. 521. All the damages alleged by her were caused by his breach of that contract. General Laws (Ter.Ed.) c. 207, § 47A, inserted by St.1938, c. 350, § 1, provides that a "Breach of contract to marry shall not constitute an injury or wrong recognized by law, and no action, suit or proceeding shall be maintained therefor." This statute changed the public policy of this Commonwealth. It not only abolished the right of action for breach of promise but it went farther and abolished any right of action, whatever its form, that was based upon such a breach. The breach is no longer a legal wrong. . . . Actions in tort for fraud have been held to be within the prohibition of such statutes and any other cause of action that originates in the breach of a promise of marriage. The plaintiff's cause of action arises out of a breach of promise of marriage, and she cannot circumvent the statute by bringing an action in tort for damages so long as the direct or underlying cause of her injury is the breach of promise of marriage. A. Hirsch, 39 N.Y.S. 2d 965 (1943); Spitz v. Maxwell, 186 Misc. 159, 59 N.Y.S.2d 593 (1945).) It has even been held that an action is barred in which it is sought to recover $760 loaned by the plaintiff to the defendant, when the parties were engaged to be married, in reliance upon the defendant's fraudulent promise that he would contribute a like sum and would use the entire fund for the purchase of a taxi service to be owned jointly by the plaintiff and defendant. Alberelli v. Manning, 185 Misc. 280, 56 N.Y.S. 2d 493 (1945). Prior to the passage of Article 2-A, recovery was permitted in all of these situations. Antaramian v. Ourakian, 118 Misc. 558, 194 N.Y.S. 100 (1922);

Benedict v. Flannery, 115 Misc. 627, 189 N.Y.S. 104 (1921); Wilson v. Riggs, 243 App.Div. 33, 276 N.Y.S. 232 (1934).

"The aim of the Act was to do away with excessive claims for damages conceived by their very nature and, all too frequently, fraudulent in character. Denial of recovery of property transferred in contemplation of marriage is not necessary to the accomplishment of this object, and it has the undesirable result of placing it within the power of a recipient to renounce a promise and yet retain property bestowed in anticipation of performance. This thought of unjust enrichment was emphasized by the dissenting justices in Andie v. Kaplan, (263 App.Div. 884, 32 N.Y.S.2d 429, 2nd Dep't, 1942, affirmed 288 N.Y. 685, 43 N.E.2d 82) who wrote:

"The purpose of the new legislation was to prevent a recovery for alleged pecuniary loss, blighted affections, wounded pride, humiliation, and the like, against the one who violated the promise, but not to enable the latter to receive benefits out of his wilful act"

"In Morris v. Baird, 54 N.Y.S.2d 779, the plaintiff had transferred some valuable real estate to his fiancée in contemplation of their marriage. In his original complaint, he alleged that the donee had breached the contract of marriage and he sought recovery of the property transferred. It was held that this complaint stated a cause of action which was prohibited by Article 2-A. The plaintiff then served an amended complaint alleging that the agreement to marry had been rescinded by mutual consent. The amended complaint was held to be sufficient in the lower court (57 N.Y.S.2d 398), but the decision was reversed on appeal (269 App.Div. 948, 57 N.Y.S.2d 890). The injustice of this result was well stated by Justice Lockwood in the opinion in the lower court:

"If judicial construction of the statute is further extended to bar this action, then the statute, which was designed to prevent unjust enrichment of unscrupulous persons and to avoid perpetration of frauds, would become an instrument to accomplish just that purpose, and would deprive the Court of its equitable power to afford redress to one who has been deprived of his property by fraud and deceit.

"Such a shocking result could not have been the intention of the Legislature in enacting Article 2-A, Civil Practice Act, nor will the best interests of the People of the State be served thereby."

"The Commission believes that Article 2-A of the Civil Practice Act should be amended to restore the power of the Court, in a proper case, to grant restitution where property or money has been transferred, in contemplation of the performance of an agreement to marry, and the agreement is not performed.

"The Commission therefore recommends the enactment of the following new section 61-j of the Civil Practice Act:

"§ 61-j. This article shall not be deemed to prevent a court in a proper case from granting restitution for property or money transferred in contemplation of the performance of an agreement to marry which is not performed."

[This bill was vetoed by the Governor.]

SECTION 7. ABATEMENT AND SUMMARY ENFORCEMENT IN EQUITY (INCIDENTALLY OF TAXATION)

STATE ex rel. WILCOX v. GILBERT

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1914.
126 Minn. 95, 147 N.W. 953, 5 A.L.R. 1449.

PHILIP E. BROWN, J. Three separate actions under Laws 1913, c. 562 (Gen.St.1913, §§ 8717-8726), for abatement of bawdy-houses. The complaints were sufficient in form and substance to authorize full relief under the statute, and all defendants, except Towne, upon whom no service of summons was made, answered to the following effect: Defendant Gilbert admitted that she resided in and worked as housekeeper of the house claimed to be a nuisance, but denied the other allegations of the complaint. Defendant Drewery admitted ownership of the premises, alleged the leasing thereof to one Harrigan, and denied acquaintance or dealings with defendant Gilbert, and knowledge or notice of her occupancy of the premises or the use thereof alleged. Defendant Ryder admitted ownership, occupancy, and control of the building, and denied all other allegations. Defendant Whitford, charged with maintenance of the house, denied the charge, and defendant Towne, alleged to be the owner thereof, did not appear. The court found that defendants Whitford and Ryder were engaged as claimed, that defendant Harrigan was lessee from defendant Drewery and owned the personal property used therein, defendant Gilbert being his housekeeper, aiding and abetting in the conduct of the business, and, further, that defendant Drewery, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have ascertained and known of the use made of such premises. No findings were made against defendant Towne. Plaintiffs were found entitled to injunctions perpetually restraining all defendants, except Towne, from further conducting or maintaining the public nuisances alleged, but no other relief, and appealed from the judgments entered accordingly.

Defendants' point as to insufficiency of the assignments of error, is overruled, because non-prejudicial, and we proceed to the merits. All questions raised hinge upon the constitutionality, effect, and construction of the act referred to, which, being too voluminous to quote in full, may be summarized as follows:

Sec. 1. "Whosoever shall erect, establish, continue, maintain, use, own or lease" any building, etc., used for lewdness, etc., is guilty of a nuisance, and such building, etc., and also the movable personalty so used itself, constitutes a nuisance, subject to abatement as such.

Sec. 2. "An action in equity" to perpetually enjoin the nuisance, and to restrain all parties from maintaining or allowing it, may be maintained in the name of the state upon relation of the county attorney or any citizen of the county, defendants to be served as in other actions, and the court, or judge in vacation, "shall," without requiring bond, allow a temporary injunction, if satisfied by affidavits, or other evidence previously ordered to be produced, of the existence of the nuisance, and upon application for such writ an ex parte restraining order may issue, restraining all persons from interfering with the movable property used in conducting the nuisance, the same to be served by handing to and leaving with the person in charge of the property or residing in the premises a copy thereof, or by posting a copy on the premises, etc., or by both. The serving officer shall forthwith make return into court and also inventory the movable property. Three days written notice shall be given defendants of the hearing of the application for the temporary injunction, which, however, issues as a matter of course if the case be continued upon their application. De-defendants notified shall serve answers before date set for hearing, and extension of time to answer, though allowable by the court, shall not prevent issue of the temporary writ. Injunction granted binds all defendants throughout the judicial district and its violation constitutes contempt.

Sec. 3. Action is triable as other actions in the district court. Evidence of general reputation of the place is admissible to prove existence of the nuisance, and "shall be prima facie evidence" thereof, and of knowledge thereof and acquiescence and participation therein, by all persons in possession of the property used in conducting the same or having any interest therein.

Sec. 4. Contempt in proceedings under the act, or in violating any injunction or restraining order issued thereunder, is punishable, after summary trial, "by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars or by imprisonment in the county jail not less than three nor more than six months or by both fine and imprisonment."

Sec. 5. Upon proof, in either the equity action or in a criminal proceeding in the district court, of the existence of the nuisance, an order of abatement shall be entered as part of the judgment in the case, directing removal of all the movable personalty referred to, and sale of such thereof as belongs to defendants notified or appearing, and also "the effectual closing of the building or place against its use for any purpose" for one year, unless sooner released. Owners of unsold personalty must appear and claim same within ten days after the order of abatement is made and prove innocence "to the satisfaction of the court" of knowledge of said use thereof, and also inability to have acquired such knowledge by reasonable care and diligence; every defendant being presumed to have known the general reputation of the place. If their innocence is thus established, the property shall be delivered to them, but otherwise sold. Breaking, entering, or using the place so closed constitutes contempt.

Sec. 6. Upon establishment of the existence of the nuisance in a criminal proceeding in a court not¹ having equitable jurisdiction, the county attorney shall promptly proceed "to enforce the provisions and penalties" of the act, and conviction in the criminal proceedings, unless reversed, is conclusive against defendant therein as to the existence of the nuisance. Money collected under the act is payable to the county treasurer, and the proceeds of the sale of the personalty are applicable to payment of costs, except as thereafter stated in the act.

Sec. 7. The owner of the premises may obtain its release by payment of all costs of the proceedings and giving bond with certain prescribed conditions looking to abatement, but such will not release it from any judgment, lien, penalty, or liability to which it may be subject by law.

Sec. 8. Upon issue of a permanent injunction under the act, there shall be imposed upon the building and the ground upon which the same is located, and against the person or persons maintaining the nuisance, and the owner or agent of the premises, a "penalty of three hundred dollars," such penalty to be imposed as a part of the proceedings, and returned to the county auditor and entered "as a tax upon the property and against the person upon which or whom the lien was imposed as and when other taxes are entered, and the same shall be and remain a lien on the land upon which the lien was imposed until fully paid." Payment of said penalty does not relieve persons or property from other penalties provided by law. It is collectible as provided by the tax laws so far as applicable, and when collected is applicable to payment of any deficiency in the costs of the action and abatement on behalf of the state, after application of the proceeds of the personal property thereto, the remainder of proceeds from both sources to be distributed the same as fines for keeping houses of ill fame, except that 10 per cent. shall be paid as an attorney's fee to the attorney representing the state.

Sec. 9. Where the owner or agent of the premises is not a party and does not appear, the $300 penalty is nevertheless to be imposed against the persons served or appearing and against the property. "But before such penalty shall be enforced against such property the owner or agent thereof shall have appeared therein or shall be served with summons therein." R.L.1905, §§ 4111, 4112, providing for substituted service, are applicable to proceedings under the act. The record owner "for the purposes of taxation" is presumed to be the true owner, and unknown persons interested may be made parties by so designating them and service by publication as provided in said section 4111. "Any person having or claiming such ownership, right, title, or interest, and any owner or agent in behalf of himself and such owner may make, serve and file his answer therein within twenty days after such service and have trial of his rights in the premises by the court; and if such cause has already proceeded to trial or to findings and judgment, the court shall by order fix the time and place of such further trial and shall modify, add to or confirm such findings and judgment as the case may require," but other parties to the action shall not be affected thereby.

1. Bawdyhouses were public nuisances at common law. 1 Wood on Nuisances (3d Ed.) § 29. They are also made such by statute. G.S. 1913, § 8759. Maintenance thereof, willful refusal or omission to perform any legal duty relating to their removal, or letting or permitting use of any building, knowingly, for such purpose, constitutes a misdemeanor. Section 8760. By section 8712 keepers of such resorts are declared guilty of felony, and those who let buildings knowingly for such use, or who permit the same, are made guilty of misdemeanor. Section 8085 includes such places as nuisances and authorizes persons injuriously affected thereby to maintain actions for injunction and abatement. These statutes had been in force for years prior to the act of 1913. Likewise at an early date equity assumed jurisdiction to enjoin and abate public nuisances. As said by Mitchell, J., in Township of Hutchinson v. Filk, 44 Minn. 536, 47 N.W. 255:

"It is now well settled that a court of equity may, in a proper case, take jurisdiction of public nuisances in civil actions for their abatement, and to enjoin their maintenance. This jurisdiction is grounded upon the greater efficacy and promptitude of the remedies administered in such action, enabling the court to restrain nuisances that are threatened or in progress, as well as to abate those already in existence, and effect their final suppression by injunction, which will often also prevent a multiplicity of suits."

See, also, 35 Am.St.Rep. 674, note.

Furthermore, eliminating the questions involved in the constitutional guaranty of jury trial, the broad power of the Legislature to extend the bounds of equity jurisdiction, as well as to regulate procedure, is well established. 16 Cyc. 29. Hence it cannot be doubted that, independently of statute, jurisdiction exists in equity to abate nuisances or that the Legislature had power, subject to constitutional limitations, to enlarge the same so as to include the general subject-matter of the act here involved; nor can the general justification of the act as a matter of legislative discretion under the police power fairly be questioned, for it is a matter of common knowledge that the criminal acts cited did not result in efficient repression or suppression of the evil aimed at. It is idle, therefore, to claim that the Legislature intended to enact another penal statute.

Likewise it is manifest that any successful assault upon the act must be directed against some one or more of its details as to procedure or relief as contravening constitutional guaranties; and in this connection we must not be unmindful of the presumption that the Legislature intended to keep within constitutional bounds and enact a valid law, nor of the rule that unless a statute is unconstitutional beyond a reasonable doubt it must be sustained. Dunnell, Dig. §§ 8929, 8931.

2. Coming now to consideration of the several grounds of attack made upon the act, we will first discuss defendant's claim of right to jury trial, their contention in this connection being that the provisions relating to forfeiture and sale of personalty, closing the house for one year, and the $300 penalty, are penal, prescribing punishments for offenses, or else, if not penal, are of such character that in either event they were entitled to trial by jury, which the Legislature could not dispense with either by clothing prosecution and punishment for an offense in the livery of equity or by giving equitable form to legal relief. To sustain this position they cite Kennedy v. Raught, 6 Minn. 235, State v. West, 42 Minn. 147, 43 N.W. 845, Commissioners v. Morrison, 22 Minn. 178, and cases from other jurisdictions to like effect, and also decisions of this court regarding the right to jury trial in civil actions. We will not, however, review these cases; for, conceding they establish the general propositions to which they are cited, and that the provisions attacked could not be sustained as penal enactments, they are nevertheless clearly distinguishable and are not inconsistent with the conclusions which we have reached.

The constitutional provision regarding right to jury trial merely preserves such right as it existed when the Constitution was adopted. Peters v. Duluth, 119 Minn. 96, 101, 137 N.W. 390, 41 L.R.A., N.S., 1044. It is inapplicable to actions based upon equitable causes of action or to obtain equitable relief alone. Dunnell, Minn.Prac. § 582; Koeper v. Louisville, 109 Minn. 519, 124 N.W. 218. Since, therefore, a review of the act as a whole leads irresistibly to the conclusion that its purpose is repression of the evil, to be worked out by equitable attack upon the property of those engaged in or abetting it, and not punishment of the offenders by infliction of personal penalties, except as for contempt of court, the contention that, because the thing itself—the lewd place—declared a nuisance by the act would, in its maintenance, have constituted a criminal offense at the time of the adoption of the constitution, a jury trial is indispensable, has no foundation, and is thus answered by the authorities:

“The fallacy of the argument lies in part in disregarding the distinction between a proceeding to abate a nuisance, which looks only to the property that in the use made of it constitutes the nuisance, and a proceeding to punish an offender for the crime of maintaining a nuisance. These two proceedings are entirely unlike. The latter is conducted under the provisions of the criminal law, and deals only with the person who has violated the law. The former is governed by the rules which relate to property, and its only connection with persons is through property in which they may be interested. That which is declared by a valid statute to be a nuisance is deemed in law to be a nuisance in fact, and should be dealt with as such. The people, speaking through their representatives, have proclaimed it to be offensive and injurious to the public, and the law will not tolerate it. The fact that keeping a nuisance is a crime does not deprive a court of equity of the power to abate the nuisance.” Carleton v. Rugg, 149 Mass. 550, 553, 22 N.E. 55, 56 (5 L.R.A. 193, 14 Am.St.Rep. 446).

So, also, in State v. Murphy, 71 Vt. 127, at page 136, 41 A. 1037, 1038, the court said:

“The respondent contends that the statute is in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution of the state, particularly article 10 of the Declaration of Rights, which provides ‘that in all prosecutions for criminal offenses, a person hath a right to . . . a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of his country; . . . nor can any person be justly deprived of his liberty, except by the laws of the land, or the judgment of his peers.’ This claim is made, disregarding the distinction between a proceeding to abate a nuisance, which relates simply to the property which in its use constitutes the nuisance, and a prosecution of the respondent for the crime of maintaining it.”

And in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U.S. 623, 671, 8 S.Ct. 273, 302 (31 L.Ed. 205), Mr. Justice Harlan said:

“The state having authority to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for other than medical, scientific, and mechanical purposes, we do not doubt her power to declare that any place, kept and maintained for the illegal manufacture and sale of such liquors, shall be deemed a common nuisance, and be abated, and, at the same time, to provide for the indictment and trial of the offender. One is a proceeding against the property used for forbidden purposes, while the other is for the punishment of the offender."

See, also, State v. Saunders, 66 N.H. 39, 25 A. 588, 18 L.R.A. 646, where the earlier cases are exhaustively reviewed, and State v. Marshall, 100 Miss. 626, 56 So. 792, Ann.Cas.1914A, 434.

Defendants attack particularly the $300 penalty imposed by section 8, on the ground stated, insisting that penalties are regarded as punishments for infractions of law, and statutes imposing them as penal. But in considering this section, and all others, we are bound to hold that if the language used is reasonably susceptible of two constructions, one rendering the enactment constitutional, and the other not, the former must be adopted, though the latter be the more natural. Dunnell, Dig. § 8931. While the act designates the $300 exaction as a "penalty," the same section clearly indicates it to be imposed, treated, and collected as a tax. There is no magic in words, and the use of "penalty" is not decisive. Terminology is not necessarily decisive, and the Legislature might well have been in doubt as to the appropriate word with which to designate the exaction. After all, the legislative intent is what we seek, and the nature of the thing is more important than its name. In Hodge v. Muscatine County, 196 U.S. 276, 25 Sup. Ct. 237, 49 L.Ed. 477, the court had under consideration the Iowa cigarette law, whereby a tax of $300 per annum was assessed "against every person . . . and upon the real property, and the owner thereof," whereon cigarettes, etc., were sold, or kept with intent to sell, the same to be a perpetual lien upon both personal and real property used in connection with the business. The Supreme Court of Iowa sustained the law (Hodge v. Muscatine County, 121 Iowa, 482, at page 488, 96 N.W. 968, at page 970, 67 L.R.A. 624, 104 Am.St.Rep. 304) observing in the course of its opinion:

"It [the $300] is manifestly a tax upon the traffic which the Legislature saw fit to impose, not for the purpose of giving countenance to the business, but as a deterrent against engaging therein. . . . Indeed, we think it may be fairly said to be a tax upon the business. That a tax is imposed for the double purpose of regulation and revenue is no reason for declaring it invalid."

The Supreme Court of the United States approved this holding, saying, at page 279 of 196 U. S., at page 239 of 25 S.Ct. (49 L.Ed. 477):

"It is not easy to draw an exact line of demarcation between a tax and a penalty, but, in view of the fact that the statute denominates the assessment a 'tax,' and provides proceedings appropriate for the collection of a tax, but not for the enforcement of a penalty, and does not contemplate a criminal prosecution, we cannot go far afield in treating it as a tax rather than a penalty. . . . The act itself provides in terms that such a tax shall be in addition to all other taxes and penalties, and elaborate provision is made for its enforcement.

The mere fact that the charge, whatever it may be, is made a lien upon the real estate and a personal claim against the landlord, indicates that it is in the nature of a tax rather than a penalty."

We consider this case in point and follow its lead, being impelled to such course both by reason and by the authoritative pronouncement of the federal Supreme Court upon an exaction to which the assessment imposed by section 8 is closely analogous in so many of its essential features, including failure to provide proceedings appropriate for the enforcement of a penalty, particularly in that no punishment is imposed for nonpayment of the assessment.*

The act as a whole differs in no material respect from the numerous statutes regulating liquor traffic by equitable actions for injunction and abatement, universally held valid notwithstanding denial of jury trial thereunder. We hold it not penal, which disposes of defendants' main contention regarding right to trial by jury, and likewise of their points based upon the constitutional provisions relating to excessive fines and unusual punishments, the right to be confronted by witnesses, testifying against one's self, bills of attainder, and ex post facto laws. As to their claim of right to jury trial, even if the action be held civil in all its details, it is sufficient to say that in its main features the proceeding is unquestionably equitable, and that when a court of equity properly assumes jurisdiction of a cause for one purpose it acquires it for all and grants full relief. Dunnell, Dig. § 3138; 1 Pom.Eq. § 237; State v. Marshall, supra. . . .

5. Finally, is the act in its remedial details a proper exercise of police power? The subject-matter being within such power, the test is reasonableness, which involves a dual limitation, positive and negative, namely, adaptability to the end sought and absence of excessiveness. The measure must, on the one hand, tend to accomplish the purpose of its adoption, and, on the other, must not go beyond the reasonable demands of the occasion. In our opinion the remedies provided by the act stand the test.

"A large discretion is necessarily vested in the Legislature, to determine not only what the interests of the public require, but what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests." State v. Wagner, 77 Minn. 483, 495, 80 N.W. 633, 635 (46 L.R.A. 442, 77 Am.St. Rep. 681).

Upon all points involved in the cases before us, the act is sustained as constitutional. The objections based upon the effect accorded evidence of the general reputation of the place in establishing the existence of the nuisance, etc., and the presumptions declared in section 5, more properly belong to the discussion in State v. Lane, 147 N.W. 951, a companion case decided herewith.

[* Cf. People ex rel. Lemon v. Elmore, 256 N.Y. 489, 177 N.E. 14, 76 A.L.R. 1292 (1931), holding unconstitutional, as a deprivation of jury trial, that portion of a similar New York statute which provided for imposition of a "penalty tax" upon the premises and upon the persons maintaining a nuisance. The principal provisions, authorizing maintenance of an equitable action for abatement of the nuisances, were sustained. Ed.]

Judgments reversed, in so far as they fail to award plaintiffs, as against the answering defendants, the additional relief prayed; and the trial court is directed to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

SECTION 8. ADVERSE PRESUMPTIONS

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF EXCISE OF THE CITY OF AUBURN v. MERCHANT

Court of Appeals of New York, 1886.
103 N.Y. 143, 8 N.E. 484, 57 Am.Rep. 705.

EARL, J. The main question to be determined in this case is whether this action should have been commenced by the present plaintiff, or by the board of charities and police for the city of Auburn, and upon this question our views have been sufficiently expressed in the case just decided against Burtis, and we refer to the opinion pronounced in that case. Board Com'rs of Excise, etc., v. Burtis, 103 N.Y. 136, 8 N.E. 482.

Upon the trial of this action the judge charged the jury that "the law provides, in such case as this, that upon proof being made of the fact that liquor was seen to be drank on the premises, that is prima facie evidence that it was sold with intent that it was to be drank upon the premises." To this portion of the charge defendant's counsel excepted, and the exception is now relied upon as pointing out error fatal to the judgment.

In section 11 of the excise act (chapter 628, Laws 1857) provision is made for licenses to storekeepers and shopkeepers, authorizing them to sell spirituous liquors in quantities less than five gallons not to be drank upon the premises. Then, in section 12, it is provided as follows: "Such license shall not be granted unless the commissioners are satisfied that the applicant is of good moral character, nor until such applicant shall have executed a bond to the people of this state . . . conditioned that . . . he will not sell, or suffer to be sold, any strong or spirituous liquors or wines to be drank in his shop or house, or in any outhouse, yard, or garden appertaining thereto, and that he will not suffer any such liquor, sold by virtue of such license, to be drank in his shop or house, or in any outhouse, yard, or garden belonging thereto; and, whenever any person is seen to drink in such shop or house, outhouse, yard, or garden belonging thereto, any spirituous liquors or wines forbidden to be drank therein, it shall be prima facie evidence that such spirituous liquors or wines were sold by the occupant of such premises, or his agent, with the intent that the same should be drank therein. On any trial for the offense last aforesaid such occupant or agent may be allowed to testify respecting such sale." It was undoubtedly this law to which the judge referred in his charge. . . .

Thus the charge was authorized by the words of the statute. But the learned counsel for the appellant claims that this provision of the statute is unconstitutional, on the ground that it violates the constitutional guaranties of due process of law and trial by jury. We think the claim unfounded. The general power of the legislature to prescribe rules of evidence and methods of proof is undoubted. While the power has its constitutional limitations, it is not easy to define precisely what they are. A law which would practically shut out the evidence of a party, and thus deny him the opportunity for a trial, would substantially deprive him of due process of law. It would not be possible to uphold a law which made an act prima facie evidence of crime, over which the party charged had no control, and with which he had no connection, or which made that prima facie evidence of crime which had no relation to a criminal act, and no tendency whatever by itself to prove a criminal act. But so long as the legislature, in prescribing rules of evidence, in either civil or criminal cases, leaves a party a fair opportunity to make his defense, and to submit all the facts to the jury to be weighed by them upon evidence legitimately bearing upon them, it is difficult to perceive how its acts can be assailed upon constitutional grounds. Affidavits in town-bounding acts and tax deeds have been declared to be prima facie evidence of regularity and validity, and numerous statutes of similar character are to be found in this and other states. In Com. v. Williams, 6 Gray 1, it was held, in a criminal prosecution for a violation of an excise law, that a statute which provided that the delivery of any spirituous and intoxicating liquors in or from any building or place other than a dwelling-house, "shall be deemed prima facie evidence of a sale," was constitutional and valid. In State v. Hurley, 54 Me. 562, it was held that an act which provided that "whenever an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor is alleged, and a delivery proved, it shall not be necessary to prove payment, but such delivery shall be sufficient evidence of sale," was constitutional. In Howard v. Moot, 64 N.Y. 261, Allen, J., said: "The rules of evidence are not an exception to the doctrine that all rules and regulations affecting remedies are at all times subject to modification and control by the legislature. * * * It may be conceded for all the purposes of this appeal, that a law that should make evidence conclusive which was not so necessarily in and of itself, and thus precluded the adverse party from showing the truth, would be void, as indirectly working a confiscation of property, or a destruction of vested rights. But such is not the effect of declaring any circumstance, or any evidence, however slight, prima facie proof of a fact to be established, leaving the adverse party at liberty to rebut and overcome it by contradictory and better evidence."

Here the act which is made prima facie evidence of an illegal sale takes place upon the premises of the person charged, has some relation to and furnishes some evidence of the alleged illegal sale, and occurs in a place where liquors are authorized to be kept and sold. To make drinking the liquor in such a place and under such circumstances prima facie evidence of an illegal sale to the person drinking, violates no constitutional guaranty. It leaves a party ample opportunity to make his defense. It is specially provided, what is now the general law, that the party can be a witness in his own behalf, and thus it can never be difficult for him to show what the facts really are. The burden of proof is not even really changed. The statute enables the prosecutor to make a prima facie case by proof of the drinking. But the defendant can show the circumstances attending the drinking, his relations thereto, and any other facts tending to absolve him from liability, and then, on the whole case, the burden still rests upon the prosecution to establish the alleged sale. The defendant has the full benefit of jury trial and due process of law, and a full and fair opportunity free from any undue hinderance or embarrassment to make his justification and defense. Hence the charge resting upon the statute was not erroneous.

But the statute need not be invoked to uphold the charge. Under the circumstances of this case the drinking was good common-law evidence of a sale in violation of the statute. The defendant kept liquor for sale, and was shown to be engaged in selling it to be drank upon his premises quite indiscriminately to persons calling for it. It is against all experience that he gave it away, or that persons came there to drink liquors bought elsewhere. It was in his power to prevent the drinking, which took place from glasses presumably furnished by him. Evidence of the drinking under such circumstances was certainly prima facie proof that the liquor was bought to be drank there, and sufficient to justify the charge.

We are therefore of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

STATE v. BESWICK

Supreme Court of Rhode Island, 1881, 13 R.I. 211, 43 Am.Rep. 26.

DURFEE, C. J. The complaint is in the form provided by Pub. Laws R.I. cap. 797, of March 18, 1880, for prosecutions under Pub.Laws R. I. cap. 508, §§ 18 and 19,¹ of June 25, 1875. The complaint is for a violation of § 19. . . .

"Sect. 19. If any person shall keep or suffer to be kept on his premises or possessions, or under his charge, for the purposes of sale, in violation of the preceding sections of this act or any of them, any ale, wine, rum, or other strong or malt liquors, or any mixed liquors a part of which is ale, wine, rum, or other strong or malt liquors, he shall, on conviction, be fined twenty dollars, or be imprisoned in the county jail thirty days."

The other exception raises the question whether § 4 of cap. 797 is constitutional. The language of § 4 is as follows, to wit:

"It shall not be necessary to prove an actual sale of the liquors enumerated in sections 18 and 19 of said chapter 508 in any building, shop, saloon, place, or tenement, in order to establish the fact that any of said liquors are there kept for sale; but the notorious character of any such premises, or the notoriously bad or intemperate character of persons frequenting the same, or the keeping of the implements or appurtenances usually appertaining to grog-shops, tippling-shops, or places where such liquors are sold, shall be prima facie evidence that said liquors are kept on such premises for the purposes of sale within this State." . . .

It will be observed that the statute makes proof of the facts mentioned in it not only evidence against the accused, but prima facie evidence of his guilt, so that upon proof of them it is not only the right but the duty of the jury to convict, unless the presumption is rebutted by other evidence, though of course such other evidence may be elicited from the witnesses for the State as well as given by witnesses for the defendant. Commonwealth v. Pillsbury, 12 Gray 127. The question then is, whether a statute is constitutional which makes it the duty of a jury, empanelled to try a complaint for unlawfully keeping liquors for sale, to convict the accused upon simple proof that his place of business is notorious as a place where liquors are unlawfully kept for sale, or upon simple proof that the place is frequented by persons of notoriously bad or intemperate character, or upon proof that he has there the implements and appurtenances of a grog-shop or tippling-shop, without more, unless there be other evidence to rebut or control it.

We have very carefully considered the question, and have come to the conclusion that the statute is not constitutional. It virtually strips the accused of the protection of the common law maxim, that every person is to be presumed innocent until he is proved guilty, which is recognized in the Constitution as a fundamental principle of jurisprudence. And we think it is repugnant to the constitutional provision that the accused shall not "be deprived of life, liberty, or property, unless by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." What is meant by "the judgment of his peers" is the judgment of a jury, and certainly the accused does not have the judgment of a jury, if the jury is compelled by an artificial rule to convict him, whether they think him guilty or not, upon proof of a fact which is consistent with his innocence, and which is so consistent with his innocence that proof of it at common law would not even be admissible against him. Suppose that the General Assembly were to enact that if any person were generally reputed to be guilty of a murder it should be prima facie evidence that he was guilty, and that some citizen were convicted and sentenced to death or imprisonment on such evidence, because in the absence of rebutting evidence the jury had no option to acquit him. Could it be said that his life or liberty had been taken from him by the judgment of his peers? We think not. The judgment of the jury would not have been taken on the question of his guilt, but only on the question whether or not he was generally reputed guilty. So under the statute here a man may be convicted of unlawfully keeping intoxicating liquors for sale, upon proof that his place of business is generally reputed to be a liquor shop, without the jury's actually passing any judgment on the question of his guilt.

The provision is that the accused shall not be deprived of his life, liberty, or property, "unless by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." It may be argued that even if the accused does not have the judgment of his peers he is nevertheless convicted by "the law of the land." This phrase has a historical origin. It was borrowed from Magna Charta, and, as has been repeatedly decided, means the same as "due process of law." The question then is, whether if a man is convicted on the testimony indicated, and under the rule prescribed by the statute, he is convicted according to "due process of law." . . .

. . . Indeed to hold that a legislature can create artificial presumptions of guilt from facts which are not only consistent with innocence, but which are not even a constituent part of the crime when committed, is to hold that it has the power to take away from a judicial trial, or at least substantially reduce in it, the very element which makes it judicial. To hold so is to hold that the legislature has power to bind and circumscribe the judgments of courts and juries in matters of fact, and in an important measure to predetermine their decisions and verdicts for them. It is true the accused has the right of defence left to him, and may, if he can adduce satisfactory evidence, rebut the statutory presumptions; but the production of such evidence is not always easy, even with the right to testify in his own behalf; and the right to testify in his own behalf having been granted, can be abrogated, by the legislature. It is not one of those great and immemorial rights which lie embedded in the phrase "the law of the land." . . .

. . . The cause is remanded to the Court of Common Pleas for a new trial.

NOTE BY THE CHIEF JUSTICE.—In the Declaration of Rights adopted by the Continental Congress in 1774, it is declared that the inhabitants of the Colonies are entitled "by immutable laws of Nature, the principles of the English Constitution, and the several charters and compacts," to certain rights enumerated, the fifth of which is the following, to wit: "That the respective Colonies are entitled to the common law of England, and more especially to the great and inestimable privilege of being tried by their peers of the vicinity according to the course of that law." This probably shows how the provision in question was understood by the great lawyers of the Revolution. See Pitkin's United States, Vol. I. pp. 285, 286.

NOTES

1. Morgan, "Tot v. United States: Constitutional Restrictions on Statutory Presumptions", 56 Harvard L.Rev. 1324 (1943) states: ". . . The burden of introducing evidence is quite different from the burden of persuading the trier of fact. As to the same proposition one party may have to bear the former, while the other has to sustain the latter. The former determines the result if no evidence, or no further evidence, is received. The latter is decisive where the mind of the trier is in equilibrium. Each party and the court must know where the former rests at every state of the trial; neither court nor party is concerned with the latter until the evidence is closed. The trier of fact, as distinguished from the judge, need never hear about the former but must always be instructed as to the latter. It would seem to follow that no court should attempt to determine the validity of a statute affecting these aspects of a trial without first ascertaining the exact effect of its application in an action. If the statute as construed permits or requires evidence of A to be used as evidence of B, then the existence of a rational connection between them is demanded by the Constitution. But how does it follow that the Constitution makes the same demand where the establishment of A fixes the burden of producing evidence or the burden of persuading as to B?" Does Section 12 of the Security Act, 1933, supra, p. 513, create an adverse presumption or impose burden of proof?

SECTION 9. CIVIL LIABILITIES

ERNST FREUND, LEGISLATIVE REGULATION

New York: 1932. The Commonwealth Fund. 58-63.

§ 19. Statutory Liability. It is convenient to use the term liability to indicate the legal duty of indemnification for loss as distinguished from an obligation assumed or imposed by law irrespective of loss or default. The terminology, however, is not observed in practice, for what in accordance with it would be an obligation to pay a tax is commonly spoken of as a tax liability. The law of liability is typically declaratory law, evolved upon the basis of principle, in Anglo-American jurisdictions by judicial decisions, and illustrating, in its development in different legal systems, the possibility of divergent views of justice, as, e.g., in the treatment of contributory negligence and of employers' liability, in the matter of unjust enrichment, the accountability of a possessor in good faith, the tort liability of an insane person or an infant, etc.

Where the law is codified, the code will naturally lay down rules controlling some or all of these matters, and may incidentally change previously existing law; in England and America fundamental legislative changes have been rare, the most important being probably the introduction of a cause of action for wrongfully causing death; but there has been sporadic legislation concerning principles of liability in particular circumstances or relations: thus in England the liability to restore winnings at games (16 Car. II, c. 7 and 9 Anne, c.

14), and the exemption from liability for accidental escape of fire (6 Anne, c. 3); in America special rules of liability in connection with the operation of railroads (cattle, fire), the sale of liquor (civil damage acts), the recovery of property from inadvertent trespassers who have made improvements (occupying claimants' acts), and the qualification of the law of employers' liability, which in a few states, preceded workmen's compensation legislation. So far as these statutes merely substitute one principle for another, they furnish interesting illustrations of the history of private-law legislation.

Liability legislation assumes the character of regulative legislation, if either liability serves the purpose of regulation, or if the law not merely establishes liability, but subjects it to regulative provisions.

a. Liability as a form of regulation. This is illustrated by the laws which make railroad companies liable for cattle killed on their right of way in absence of a sufficient fence. The basis of such legislation is the power to require railroad companies to fence their rights of way against cattle; but the obligation is not directly imposed, the company having the option to compensate for loss of cattle.

Under the same head should be placed the peculiar rule of the law of corporations, introduced into the Illinois Corporation Act of 1872, and from there copied by other states, which makes directors liable for assenting to an indebtedness in excess of the amount of the capital, to the amount of such excess (§ 23 of the Illinois Act).

Where, as in the laws of fencing against cattle, the assumption of liability is optional in lieu of the adoption of a safeguard, a consideration of relative advantages may induce the assumption of the risk of liability; but where, as in the corporation law, the liability is imposed as a consequence of avoidable action, it operates in effect as prevention of such action.

Absolute liability means a duty to indemnify for loss, but not a duty based upon default, and therefore may be regarded as being contrary to rational principle. It has in consequence been questioned on constitutional grounds, successfully so in connection with the first workmen's compensation legislation (Ives v. South Buffalo R. Co., 201 N.Y. 271, 94 N.E. 431, 1911), and the rule had to be sanctioned by express constitutional amendment. However, upon analysis, the rule Respondeat superior is a rule of liability irrespective of fault, and a still stronger illustration is found in the rule of admiralty (contrary to the common law rule, see Transportation Co. v. LaCompagnie Générale, 182 U.S. 406, 21 S.Ct. 831, 45 L.Ed. 1155, 1900), that the ship is liable for the fault of the pilot whom it is by law compelled to employ (The China, 7 Wall. 53, 1868). If absolute liability is looked upon as a form of charging an undertaking with the inevitable risk of loss attending it, it represents a rational principle of justice; but a more perfect "rationalization of justice" may require adjustments or qualifications which the processes of unwritten law have failed to develop, and which in any event are more conformable to regulative legislation.

b. Liability regulation. It is, if not inevitable, at least natural, that if legislation concerns itself with liability, it should not content itself with merely stating or altering principles, but seek for conventional adjustments that have a tendency to achieve better equity than the mere operation of a simple rule of liability is apt to do.

The following seem to be the prominent forms of liability regulation:

(1) Limitation of liability. It is characteristic that while there was, until the advent of workmen's compensation, no attempt to curb the extravagances of damage claims in case of personal torts, the introduction of a cause of action for wrongful death was at once and everywhere attended by the fixing of maximum amounts recoverable; even prior to Lord Campbell's Act, the early legislation of Massachusetts pursued this policy when it made negligent management of highways (resulting in death) actionable. By the constitution of 1894, New York prohibited any such limitation, but had to qualify this prohibition in order to make workmen's compensation possible. All workmen's accident compensation operates with limited benefits, which in substance represent something like apportionment of loss between employer and employee.

Congress recognized the principle of limited liability in connection with shipping by the so-called Harter Act of 1893.

Limited liability of a corporation may be looked upon as the logical result of the separate entity theory, and generally is not expressed by statute, but left to be inferred from the nature of the corporation.

(2) Protective expedients. Workmen's compensation laws place a duty of accident notification upon the employee, as a safeguard against possible fraud, and a similar duty is created by statute in favor of municipal corporations. Provisions may be called for to take care of cases where the injured person is not sui juris (O'Connell v. Sanford, 256 Ill. 62, 99 N.E. 885, 1912) or where failure to notify is not prejudicial, or appropriate equities may be worked out by judicial construction.

English legislation making railroad companies liable for damages caused by fire due to sparks escaping from locomotives empowers the company to enter upon adjoining land to clear it from inflammable material. This provision manifests a care in correlating right and liability which is not found in American statutes, but is indicative of possible elaboration of rules of liability.

(3) Provisions to make liability effective. Workmen's compensation laws require employers to satisfy the appropriate administrative authorities that they are financially prepared to meet compensation claims, or to insure themselves or to give bond to secure possible claims (Illinois Act, § 226). Similar safeguards are being discussed in connection with the operation of automobiles and have been put in effect in Massachusetts. See J. P. Chamberlain, "Compulsory Automobile Insurance," 12 American Bar Association Journal 49, January, 1926.

Legislation of this kind is clearly regulative; therefore, while a municipal corporation has no power to declare rules of liability it may under a power of regulation, exact a bond to secure the satisfaction of damage claims, as a condition of granting a license (State v. Deckebach, 117 Ohio St. 227, 157 N.E. 758, 1927).

(4) Priorities and liens. Priority is important in case of insolvency; and the recognition of priorities forms part of bankruptcy legislation and of laws for the administration of decedents' estates. Priorities recognized by courts of equity and of admiralty are based upon inherent differences in claims that can be worked out as a matter of logic; whereas legislation is free to give effect to considerations of social welfare and to pursue other collateral ends.

A lien, in addition to giving priority, permits the satisfaction of claims out of property after it has passed out of the ownership of the debtor. In appropriate cases, it may also be used to secure claims of a quasi-contractual character, on behalf of parties who have no personal claim against the owner. Lien legislation is an important part of every American statute book. Besides enlarging the range of possessory liens in analogy to those of the common law, it creates liens not dependent upon possession, but upon systems of public registry. The statutory lien based upon quasi-contractual claims is the characteristic feature of mechanics' lien legislation, which is a peculiarly American institution. It involves a complex system of notices and declarations, and great care is required in order not to do injustice to the owner. After a century of experimenting legislating, it cannot be said that all substantial equities have been worked out with complete success; and it is significant that some of the most careful laws, notably that of Illinois of 1903, permit the owner to stipulate by contract against the application of the system to his property (§ 21).

RECOMMENDATION OF THE LAW REVISION COMMISSION TO THE LEGISLATURE RELATING TO THE TRUST FUND PRO- VISIONS IN THE NEW YORK LIEN LAW

N. Y. Leg. Doc. (1942) No. 65 (H), 13-15.

1942 Rep. Rec. and St. Law Rev. Comm. 283-285.

Legislation has been enacted in New York and several other states to prevent abuses which frequently arise in the pyramiding of building operations and to afford adequate protection to those who contribute services or materials upon an improvement of real property.

Such legislation is based on the principle that funds received for an improvement should be applied to pay the cost of that improvement. It supplements the older remedy by lien upon the property improved, which is not available after all payments by the owner on his contract for the improvement have been made.

The first legislation was enacted in this state in 1929 at the time of the general revision of the Lien Law. It required that building loan mortgages contain a covenant by the owner to hold the moneys received thereunder as a trust to be applied first to the cost of improvement. Moneys so received were declared to constitute trust funds, a diversion of which was made punishable as a misdemeanor. Later the trust concept was extended to include moneys received by a contractor or subcontractor on account of an improvement, or upon an assignment of moneys due or to become due on a public improvement, as well as moneys received by an owner on a mortgage or conveyance, and proceeds of insurance on the improved property whether payable to an owner, contractor or subcontractor. Some of these statutes provide for the creation of a trust by covenant; others expressly declare the existence of a trust. Diversion of any such trust funds is now punishable as larceny.

Civil litigation involving the trust fund provisions has been relatively infrequent, and few cases of criminal prosecutions are found in the reports. The reported cases reflect uncertainty regarding the present provisions. Problems as to whether the trust may be enforced by civil action, and by whom, and by what procedure remain unsettled. In the absence of any definite decision by the Court of Appeals, confusion exists in the legal profession and the building trades on the issue of whether only lien claimants are entitled to enforce a trust. . . .

The Commission is of the opinion that these uncertainties should be resolved by legislation. Persons having claims for services or materials in connection with an improvement of real property should be entitled to share in the trust funds and to enforce the trust by civil action, whether or not they have filed notice of lien against the property. Lienors in the case of a private improvement already have available one remedy by lien against the property and, in the case of a public improvement, against the balance of moneys still due. There is no valid reason why a fund impressed with a trust for payment of the cost of improvement should not be available to all those who have contributed to the improvement. A requirement of filing notice of lien would tend to burden property with liens for every small claim as the work progresses, and would deprive a class of persons intended to be benefited by the statute of a remedy more effective and speedy than that of a personal judgment upon their claim.

Further, the failure of an owner, contractor or subcontractor to include in an assignment, mortgage or conveyance the trust covenant required by law should not prejudice the rights of persons who were intended to be protected. . . .

Under present law, the right to receive moneys which, if received, would constitute trust funds, is not a trust res. This is a gap in the law. The Commission proposes that the trust res, for the purposes of a civil action only, should be expanded to enable a beneficiary to reach such choses in action as well as moneys actually in the hands of the trustee. Existing criminal liability is in no way affected.

The Commission also proposes the closing of another gap by extending the present provision of the Lien Law applicable only to assignments of moneys due or to become due on a public improvement contract to include assignments of moneys due or to become due on a private improvement contract. There is no basis for the distinction. The protection of persons making the advances which constitute the trust fund is made similar in the two classes of improvements.

Finally, the ineffectiveness of the trust fund provisions in the present law is probably due in large measure to the lack of an established procedure for their civil enforcement. Although the courts have indicated that the proper remedy is by class action, no reported case has been found where that remedy was used successfully. A procedural article is proposed to be added to the Lien Law, which provides for the enforcement of the trust by representative action. It also includes provisions for bonding of the trustee, a preference for wage claims, a short period of limitations, and court supervision of any settlement of the action. . . .

NOTES

1. The recommended proposal was enacted as N.Y.Laws 1942, c. 808.
2. California Code of Civil Procedure (Deering 1941) § 1183:

§ 1183. [Mechanics, etc., to have lien for value of labor, etc.: Contractor, etc., deemed agent: Nature and limitations upon lien: Filing contract or modification, effect: Bond of contractor; Limitation of owner's liability, exaction of security.] Mechanics, materialmen, contractors, subcontractors, artisans, architects, machinists, builders, miners, teamsters and draymen, and all persons and laborers of every class performing labor upon or bestowing skill or other necessary services, or furnishing materials to be used or consumed in or furnishing appliances, teams and power contributing to the construction, alteration, addition to or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building, wharf, bridge, ditch, flume, aqueduct, well, tunnel, fence, machinery, railroad, wagon road or other structure, or other work of improvement, or performing labor upon or bestowing skill or other necessary services, or furnishing materials to be used or consumed in or furnishing appliances, teams and power contributing to the grading, filling in, or other improvement of any lot or tract of land or the making of any improvement in connection therewith, including within the meaning of the said word "improvement" any seeding, sodding or planting of such lot or tract of land for landscaping purposes or the demolition of buildings thereon or the removal of buildings therefrom, made or done on such real property, shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials, for the value of such labor done and materials furnished and for the value of the use of such appliances, teams or power, whether at the instance of the owner, or of any other person acting by his authority or under him, as contractor or otherwise; and every contractor, subcontractor, architect, bullder or other person having charge of the construction, alteration, addition to or repair either in whole or in part of any building or other improvement as aforesaid shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this chapter.

Direct liens; not limited by contract price: Filing of contract, etc. The liens in this chapter provided for shall be direct liens, and shall not in the case of any claimants, other than the contractor be limited, as to amount, by any contract price agreed upon between the contractor and the owner except as hereinafter provided; . . .

In case said original contract shall, before the work is commenced, be so filed, together with a bond of the contractor with good and sufficient sureties in an amount not less than fifty (50) per cent of the contract price named in said contract, which bond shall in addition to any conditions for the performance of the contract, be also conditioned for the payment in full of the claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in, or furnishing appliances, teams or power contributing to, such work, and shall also by its terms be made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons who perform labor upon or furnish materials to be used in or furnish appliances, teams or power contributing to, the work described in said contract as to give such persons a right of action to recover upon said bond in any suit brought to foreclose the liens provided for in this chapter or in a separate suit brought on said bond, then the court must, where it would be equitable so to do, restrict the recovery under such liens to an aggregate amount equal to the amount found to be due from the owner to the contractor, and render judgment against the contractor and his sureties on said bond for any deficiency or difference there may remain between said amount so found to be due to the contractor and the whole amount found to be due to claimants for such labor or materials or both.

Limitation of owner's liability, exaction of security. It is the intent and purpose of this section to limit the owner's liability, in all cases, to the measure of the contract price where he shall have filed or caused to be filed in good faith with his original contract a valid bond with good and sufficient sureties in the amount and upon the conditions as herein provided. It shall be lawful for the owner to protect himself against any failure of the contractor to perform his contract and make full payment for all work done and materials furnished thereunder by exacting such bond or other security as he may deem necessary.

VIOLATION OF STATUTES AS NEGLIGENCE PER SE

[See Chapter 8, Section 8, infra, p. 1279.]

SECTION 10. REQUIREMENT OF OATH

CHESTER LLOYD JONES, STATUTE LAW MAKING IN THE UNITED STATES

Boston: 1923 The F. W. Faxon Co. 260-265.*

The Efficiency of the Oath

Any act too often repeated becomes familiar; if originally sacred or awful, it becomes routine and commonplace. This has been the uniform experience in the use of the oath. Oaths became more frequent in later Rome, but less efficient as their number increased. During the middle ages their common use spread throughout Europe. Priests and ecclesiastics especially encouraged them, for by administering oaths they made large fees. Nowhere were oaths more common and less influential than in England. Oaths of office, of allegiance, military oaths and customhouse oaths—the latter for the importation of small quantities of merchandise, such as a few pounds of tea—grew more and more frequent. In the universities the students were obliged, on entering, to take oaths to obey all the statutes and to uphold the privileges and customs of the college, concerning which they knew nothing when they took the obligation. The result was a lack of solemnity in making declaration. In addition many of the oaths became mere formalities which all recognized but none observed. The oaths in the colleges, for example, bound the affiants to use no language but Latin in conversation in the college—English was spoken every day by instructors and students,—and a certain number of hours each day were to be spent in disquisition—a rule to which no one paid the least attention.

One of the influences which has contributed to lessen the efficiency of oaths is the rule allowing interested witnesses to testify in their own behalf. The new rule is undeniably one which promotes justice, but it is generally admitted that it has increased the amount of perjury and has helped make the oath of little consequence.

In the United States no less than in England the solemn formula of the oath has been cheapened and its force destroyed by over-use. It is a striking example of the maxim that familiarity breeds contempt. The power of religion to make the promise binding has almost or wholly disappeared, since ecclesiastics no longer have part in administering the oath and the circumstances of our modern life have made less vivid the pains and penalties of the divine wrath. Attention to the real meaning of the words is no longer given either by him who administers the oath or by him who places himself under the obligation.

Over each state are scattered a large number of notaries authorized "to take oaths" at a nominal charge. Oaths are administered in many states by all officials, no matter what the nature of their duties, and they are demanded of citizens in cases which, by their number alone, must reduce the promise taken to a formality. In a court room the judge is sworn to discharge his official duties; the sheriff, clerk of court, district attorney, witnesses, court stenographers, lawyers on entry into their profession, notaries, justices of the peace, grand jurors and petty jurors are all under oath. The legislators and commonly all the holders of the smaller offices connected with the legislature have taken oaths. The members of the third division of the government, the officers charged with the execution of the law, are similarly bound. State, county, city officers are sworn, so also are bee inspectors, umpires, grain inspectors, gas inspectors, oil inspectors, veterinary examiners, brand inspectors, road overseers, cadets, assessors, dairy commissioners, directors of penitentiaries, high school trustees, weighmasters of railroads and a host of officers who exercise semi-public functions such as bank directors and trustees. In Kansas, for example, there are one hundred twenty-eight classes of officers who are put under oath.

The manner of the administration of oaths, especially when they are required of other than officials, has helped to destroy their significance. When two or three of a man's near neighbors are competent to swear the affiant and are required by law to do so in a large number of cases, the oath becomes a mere statutory form which is gone through with the same hurry that accompanies the filling out of a bill of lading. The affiant either repeats after the officer phrases the meaning of which he makes no effort to understand, or the officer mumbles through a formula in a way that makes the words unintelligible, the affiant merely responding at the end, "I do." This is all that is left of the former solemn act known as "the taking of an oath."

Oaths Classified by Purpose

Oaths in present practice are taken for three general purposes. By them the one binding himself may:

1. Give a general promise to be faithful to his duty as prescribed by law.
2. Define the duty as he understands it, in specific terms, or repeat a definition of the duty included by law in the oath.
3. Declare that he has qualified himself for the duties of the office or the exercise of the rights which he wishes to enjoy.

The first two classes are the so-called "promissory oaths," the last is the "test oath."

For the first sort there is little to be said. It has lost its former virtues and has become a meaningless form. It is valueless as a legislative expedient because the penalties it invokes no longer are looked upon with dread and the manner of its administration destroys what solemnity it formerly had. Public officers are not held to their duties, lawyers are not held to their trusts, and bank directors are not made responsible by their oaths of office, and oaths of allegiance have never proved a bulwark against rebellion. For the violation of the general promissory oath the law as a rule provides no penalty except the distant sanctions of impeachment in the case of those in official positions. Where specific penalties are provided, they could follow quite as well if the person promised without being sworn. The host of oaths of merely promissory character that parade through our constitutions and statute books are phantom soldiers not feared by affiants and inefficient to protect the public.

The promissory oath by which a person states a definition as to his duty in specific terms—or as to some particular subject—has greater merit. It serves to forewarn the affiant. He cannot fail in his duty through actual ignorance of what his promise includes. No disgrace attaches to an official who, through oversight, neglects a detail of his duty under his promise, and if certain things are held essential, the enumeration of the particulars should be inserted. If violation of a promissory oath is to be punished by the penalties of perjury, though a guilty mind be absent, it will be found that enforcement of the law is easier if an express forewarning is provided. In the case of minor officials, especially, it is doubtful whether the penalties of a perjury prosecution will be as efficient in securing observance of the law as a system of direct fines for breach of duty. The latter can be established in a way which will allow their imposition in cases which from their triviality would not be taken into court. They can be made available by summary process, by action by superior administrative officers, and they can be more easily graduated to fit the seriousness of the offense. If the constitution require all officials to take an oath, it is still possible to make the punishment independent of the oath by referring only to the breach of duty.

The third class of oaths—test oaths—are still a valuable statutory expedient. By them a person declares himself free from certain disqualifications for the exercise of the duty to be undertaken or the right to be enjoyed. They may or may not subject the affiant to penalty for violation and in practice their force is about the same in either case. The deterrent influence is not so much the fear of the penalty in the average case as the reluctance to declare in express terms that which is untrue. The test oath is taken to establish a certain state of facts, not merely to declare the intent of the affiant. Those who have known the law before accepting the office may hesitate to swear to a deliberate untruth, and those who have honestly sought the office in ignorance of their own disqualifications will have these called to their attention before entering the office, thus avoiding embarrassment for themselves and expensive litigation for those whom they have sought to serve.

In contrast to the other forms the test oath remains a useful means of enforcing disqualifications created by statute. Even in such cases, however, the duties may be read without realizing their meaning; at best the oath stands as a warning to the affiant. It is not an efficient protection to the public.

These forms of oath are not mutually exclusive. For example, the Wisconsin Public Utilities Act of 1905 requires of the members of the railroad commission an oath which has the characteristics of both a promissory and a test oath. It reads:

"Before entering upon the duties of his office each of the said commissioners shall take and subscribe the constitutional oaths of office, and shall, in addition thereto, swear (or affirm) that he is not pecuniarily interested in any railroad in this state or elsewhere, and that he holds no other office of profit nor any position under any political committee or party, which oath or affirmation shall be filed in the office of the secretary of state."

SECTION 11. REQUIREMENT OF BOND

CHESTER LLOYD JONES, STATUTE LAW MAKING IN THE UNITED STATES

Boston: 1923. The F. W. Faxon Co. 267-280.*

BONDS

One of the familiar means to insure the honest carrying out of the duties of an officer under the law is to require him to deposit a bond. By this means a second person assumes to guarantee that the party in whose behalf the bond is issued shall faithfully observe what the law requires of him. Bonds of this sort are commonly required of officers of the federal, state and municipal governments.

A second class of bonds are those required of administrators, guardians, executors and other persons who stand in a peculiar relation to the public, requiring special guarantees that they will not abuse the powers intrusted to them. Of a similar semi-public nature are the guarantees required of certain officers of business organizations such as banks and railroad companies, and corporations in general. Finally, there are bonds required of persons who stand in no peculiar relation to the public except for the duty created by the statute requiring the bond.

Statutes in Which Bonds May be Used

Statutes requiring bonds from public officers, persons exercising special trusts, and from officers of certain sorts of private or semi-public corporations, are familiar. Those of the latter class are as a rule of recent origin. There is no reason why this method of protection cannot be extended, where it is an advantage, to persons in purely private employments, especially when they are to undertake some uniform course of conduct or duty. Recent state legislation shows an increasing use of this expedient. Examples of the way in which the enforcement of law may be facilitated by bonds where the expedient is not ordinarily used are the following: In Massachusetts an act provides that when dogs are known to have worried sheep, fowls or other domestic animals the owner of the offending dog can be required to give bond for $200 that the offense will not occur again within a year. It is provided that if he does not do so the dog shall be killed. A law of 1905 requires that pawnbrokers in addition to their licenses shall give bonds with two sureties in the penal sum of $300, conditioned for faithful performance of the duties and obligations pertaining to their business.

In Indiana a statute provides that parties to a dispute who agree to settle their differences by arbitration may give bonds with the condition to abide by and faithfully perform the award or umpirage. In Tennessee a master of an apprentice is required to give a bond, renewable at the pleasure of the county court, in such sum as the court may direct, conditioned upon the carrying out of the contract the master has made with the court.

The object of all bonds of the kinds mentioned is to protect the public against loss, or to secure the more efficient carrying out of legal duties. The conditions under which the guarantee is given, the penalties, the number and qualifications of the sureties, are prescribed in the law, and the form they take determines the value of the guarantee. Many of the circumstances which surround the giving of bonds have been radically changed in the last generation, and as a consequence new safeguards have now to be observed to insure that they will carry out their purpose.

Character of Bonds

Formerly the sureties on a bond were the relatives or personal or business friends of the person who gave the bond. Their act was one prompted by loyalty, one which pledged their property as a guarantee for the conduct of another person. Through it the public took for itself the benefit of an agreement prompted by the personal confidence of the sureties in the man whose bond they signed, and put itself in a position through which it would profit, though the sureties not only did not, but could not, profit and might suffer serious loss. It was only fair under such conditions, even though the object of the bond was to protect the public, to hold that the liability of the sureties should be only that definitely assumed—it was an obligation strictissimi juris.

The development of modern bonding companies has largely destroyed the reason for this rule. When a corporation makes it its business to assume the risk of an officer's defalcation or carelessness, in return for a money payment, there is no longer any reason why the law should not be construed liberally in favor of the public, for the bonding company can not plead that it undertook the obligation from friendship and without hope of pecuniary return. Statutes are now appearing which recognize the changed conditions and reverse the former standard of interpretation. In many states too, the statutes regulate in detail the conditions upon which bonding companies, especially when chartered in other states, are allowed to do business.

With the development of companies which act as sureties for hire the states have shown a willingness to bear the cost of the bonds themselves. In this way, since the officer no longer bears the charge and is freed from the duty to seek someone who will out of friendship become his bondsman, the chance of irregularities in form of the undertakings or of failure to give bonds, or of the insufficiency of the bonds when given, is reduced to a minimum.

Provisions of Bonds in Favor of Those Protected by the Bonds

The most important feature which should appear in a bond, from the viewpoint of those protected, is that it should always be in full force to cover the acts done. The courts are divided as to whether in the absence of a specific statutory or constitutional statement an office or position in which the holder must give a bond can be taken over before the bond is filed and accepted. The giving of the bond may be considered a condition precedent or as an incidental requirement of the position; to be fulfilled within a reasonable time.

Proper protection demands that the law should make impossible any period in which the bond does not bind him who undertakes the duty. Where the bond is required by statute to be given "for the period for which the person is elected or chosen," the courts may hold that though given after entry into office it operates from entry into office. It is better to establish that standard by an express declaration. In New York the law is strengthened in the case of officials by making it a misdemeanor for a person to act in an official capacity without filing his bond. Still, even this would not cover cases where misconduct occurred when no bond had been given and no bond was subsequently given. In most offices the practice is still to allow a short period for the filing of the bond. Some statutes make it a condition precedent to the entry into office, which is indeed the only absolutely safe standard.

A similar difficulty is apt to arise through careless wording as to the period at which the obligation of the sureties ends. Courts disagree as to the time when a bond ceases to bind if it is given "for the period for which the officer is elected." Can the sureties be held responsible for acts occurring after the expiration of the term, but before the successor is qualified, or for acts which officers are allowed to complete if begun within their term even though their successors be in office—as is still the custom in some states for some officers, especially sheriffs? It is therefore wise to include language which will remove any doubt as to the sureties' responsibility for these acts. It would be impractical to require the retiring officer to furnish a new bond for the duties remaining for him to carry out.

It may happen that the misconduct may not be discovered during the holding of the position. If the bond comes to an end at a stated time or with the term of office, the release, unless carefully worded, may be a complete discharge from liability. The new bondsmen, if any, cannot properly be held responsible for the misconduct done before the date of their obligation and the old bondsmen should be. The statute should therefore contain an explicit declaration that the bond shall cover all misconduct during its term even though discovered thereafter. These responsibilities should last until destroyed by the statute of limitations.

In order to guard the interests of those protected as far as possible against loss through the depreciation from natural or other causes of the property of the sureties, the statute may well provide that they must be worth, free of all incumbrance, an amount greater than, or a multiple of, that for which the surety signs. A similar object is back of laws requiring sureties to become severally responsible for the full amount of the bond. To prevent defeat of liability by the inclusion in the bond of a sum less than that required by law, the law may declare that if a different sum from that required by law be named the undertaking shall be for the amount so required, or if the law does not name a sum it may be made the rule that an amount named in the bond shall not limit the responsibility of the sureties.

Statutes on bonds should make an express declaration if the form prescribed is mandatory and exclusive. If they prescribe the terms and conditions of bonds and declare all bonds in other forms void, they are so; otherwise only the conditions which are contrary to the statute are void and the bond is valid as a common-law bond.

Some authority should be given the duty to review the bond to determine whether the sureties should be accepted under the rules. The statute should make it clear that the acceptance is not a mere ministerial act, but calls for the exercise of the reviewer's judgment in the interest of those to be protected. Where the form of bond has been prescribed, penalties may be provided against an officer who accepts bonds of other forms, resulting in loss.

Especially where the undertakings extend over a number of years it is important that the law should provide a periodical inspection to determine soundness and sufficiency, or that an administrative officer should have power of inspection at discretion, or both. Sureties may become insolvent or may remove from the state when the law requires them to be residents of the state. All danger of loss on this account cannot be removed, but provisions for review will reduce it to a minimum.

Authority may be granted to a superior officer or to a court to increase the amount of the bonds required or to demand new bonds whenever the interest of those to be protected renders it advisable. Another method of insuring that they shall be sufficient is to authorize any of a number of officers, or any person, to demand a hearing on the need of additional guaranties.

The order in which the various sureties are to be held responsible should clearly appear. The statute should require that it be stated in the bond itself whether it is an original undertaking, or is to replace one formerly given, or is one which is added to the original one, assuming the same legal position as the original, or is to be resorted to only when the remedy on the previous bond is exhausted. In the wording of strengthening bonds special care should be taken to avoid language which may raise the presumption that the obligation on previous bonds is released.

In order to make it easier to ascertain the responsibility of the surety and that the security offered may be within the jurisdiction of the local courts, a few states require that the sureties on the bonds of state and county officers must reside within the state or county, or that they must own property there in an amount sufficient under the law.

The statute should leave no doubt whether the sureties are to be held responsible for acts done under laws passed subsequent to the date of giving the bond. There is no doubt that the sureties are bound by all laws previous to the date of the bond even though enacted later than the statute by which the form of the agreement is determined. Many cases go farther, holding that when the duties placed upon the principal by the new law are similar to those formerly exercised, the sureties are bound. An express statement in the law on this point will avoid possibility of misunderstanding and the legislature may require that the bonds be conditioned for the faithful performance of all duties that may be imposed by subsequent statutes.

To make the rights of the parties certain a bond should contain an explicit statement as to whether the sureties are insurers, or merely assume to guarantee that the official will be honest and exercise the care to be expected of a prudent man. In general, sureties are not responsible when the carrying out of duty is prevented by overruling necessity.

But if an officer execute a penal bond by which he binds himself to perform the duties of his office without exception, the better holding is that he becomes an insurer. By this act he adds an express contract to the general duty created by law to be faithful to his trust. In requiring the officer to enter such an agreement the law does not compel him to contract to do an impossibility, though it does make him responsible for losses resulting from no fault of his own, and in some cases caused by forces beyond all human control. The officer does not contract to do the impossible but contracts so to conduct his office that to carry out its duties will not be impossible—which so far as he is concerned is often the same thing. Equivocal language on this point may result in litigation which could be easily avoided if the wording were clear.

Provisions of Bonds in Favor of Sureties

It is an accepted rule that, though a surety signs on condition that some other person or persons also sign the bond, still he will be bound unless the fact that he signed conditionally appears on the face of the bond. The statute may therefore well require that a statement be included showing whether the signing were conditional or not. This will remove the possibility of a surety held on conditions into which he did not intend to enter.

Though there is now little chance of misunderstanding, the law may well state the exact character of the penalty. Originally the liability of the sureties on a breach of the condition was absolute and for the entire amount of the stipulated penalty although the damage or loss occasioned might be insignificant. At present this rule has become relaxed so that though the judgment is for the penalty, it is discharged on the payment of the debt and damages as assessed by the jury, plus the cost of the suit. The bond only measures the maximum liability of the surety. In practice, therefore, the penalty of the bond will not now operate as a forfeiture, unless the statute clearly so demands.

Where sureties are individuals who become bondsmen without money payment for assuming the risk, there is every reason for allowing them to retire from their promise where that can be done without damage to the public. The same is true to a lesser extent when the surety is a commercial company. In fact practically the only unusual means of protecting himself which the surety has in exchange for assuming his unusual liability is the power to refuse longer to guarantee the proper conduct of the principal. When the privilege of withdrawal is not guaranteed the surety will often find himself in a position where, though he cannot approve the acts of the principal, he is practically powerless to prevent them. It is only fair to allow him to refuse to continue his guarantee of the acts of the principal, when that can be done without loss to those protected. It would not be just to force him to remain in a position concerning the danger of which he had already warned the state.

To remedy this condition, statutes are found which allow sureties to give notice of unwillingness to continue to act, whereupon the principal is called on to furnish a new bond. If this is not proffered within a stated time the office is declared vacant. In this way the responsibility of the sureties is brought to an end and the public is continuously protected whether the man offer a new bond or not. Doubt has been expressed as to the power to declare offices vacant in this way when the term is prescribed by the constitution. In practice many of the statutes on the subject apply in general terms to all offices and the constitutional question appears not to have been raised. Where the office is created by statute, or where the constitution leaves the legislature free to prescribe the end or beginning of the term or to outline other conditions on which the position may be held, there is no doubt that this remedy may be applied.

An unusual protection is granted to sureties by the statute of Idaho which provides that the party of whom the bond is required may agree with the surety to deposit any assets that may come into his possession in a certain bank approved by the court or one of the judges. The party of whom the bond is required may agree not to draw on this account except with the written consent of the surety, or on an order from the court or one of its judges, made on such notice to the surety as the court or judge may direct.

What Constitutes Delivery

The statute on bonds should contain a clear statement of what shall constitute delivery. Does the bond become binding as soon as it has left the possession of those giving it, or is it delivered only when received by the proper authority? Different rules have been established by statute, and though the courts almost uniformly hold for the first standard stated even in the absence of statute it is best to prescribe that rule in the general statute regulating the form of bonds.

SECTION 12. EFFECTUATION THROUGH ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES

EXPLANATORY NOTE

The purpose here is to outline in brief compass some of the considerations to be borne in mind when evaluating the utility of administrative agencies as a means of making a proposed law effective. The study of legislative method should be correlated with that of the system of legal control exercised through the law administering agencies other than the courts which is made in a course in administrative law. Only in that way can a complete basis for competent evaluation be acquired.

In Research in The American State Legislative Process, 1947.

Administration through Lawmaking

. . . While the typical function (of state legislatures) may be that of enacting statutes, it is well known that, both as a part of their statute-making power and quite independently of it, these bodies engage in what Freund described as "legislative administration."¹¹

. . . Administrative oversight by the legislature assumes many forms. In the first place, general statutes and appropriation measures frequently go much farther than merely to enact broad governmental policies, lay down rules of law, create administrative agencies, or vote lump-sum appropriations for general purposes. American legislatures habitually, although not consistently, legislate in detail with respect to executive and administrative agencies both in distributing and in allocating duties and funds, and thus they invade the executive and administrative spheres of discretion and make decisions a numerous assembly is ill qualified to make. Moreover, in the enactment of private, special, and local legislation, which in spite of constitutional restrictions continues to be voluminous, the legislature in the guise of statute-making frequently descends into the realm of petty regulation.¹² In fact, American state and local administration continues to be subjected to countless statutes which enact regulations of the most detailed nature and which provide no directing superior even for minor officials other than the words of the statute itself.¹³ Each state presents a different situation with respect to this type of legislation, but in no case has research gone far enough to complete the picture in any one state. More information is needed as to the effects of this so-called legislative activity upon the work of the legislature and the administrative agencies and units of government subjected to it, to say nothing of the political activities to which it gives rise. In the words of John Stuart Mill, ". . . numerous representative bodies ought not to administer . . . or to dictate in detail to those who have charge of administration." The propensity of American legislatures to do these things under pretense of exercising their legislative function proper is without doubt their greatest failing. Broad policy-framing and determining the general nature of the administrative structure are legitimate functions of the legislature, but it is not equipped to issue what are in effect administrative orders. "The more fully the modern parliament can be freed from the necessity of scrutinizing narrowly the specific details of legislation, the more adequate is likely to be the performance of the functions for which it is, in fact suited."¹⁴ . . .

JAMES HART, THE EXERCISE OF RULE-MAKING POWER

A Monograph for the President's Committee on Administrative Management: Studies on Administrative Management in the Government of the United States No. V (1937), 12-14, 6-7.

The Rule-Making Power a Practical Necessity

In the simpler days of the agricultural era it was assumed that Congress would produce practically all the uniform rules required for the operation of Government. The statutes were expected to be concrete, specific, and detailed. This would reduce administration to a clerical function.

But never in the history of the Federal Government has practice completely conformed to this traditional conception. As early as 1794 Congress authorized President Washington, during its recess, to lay an embargo "whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require." The act continued: "And the President is hereby fully authorized to give all such orders to the officers of the United States, as may be necessary to carry the same into full effect."¹ This was the broadest of the early delegations; but the fact remains that delegations of one sort or another have been scattered through subsequent history. They are no recent novelty in the Federal Government.²

Delegation of rule-making powers reached maximums in four periods of emergency. The first was 1789-1815, the period when the United States was trying to defend its neutral trade against British orders in council and Napoleonic decrees. The second was 1861-75, the period of the Civil War and Reconstruction. The third was 1917-18, the period of participation in the World War. The fourth was 1933-35, the period of the New Deal attack upon the depression.

The necessity for exceptionally broad emergency delegations, however, should not obscure the general trend over many years in the direction of an increase in the number of rules and regulations issued by various Federal agencies in pursuance of delegated authority not connected with any emergency. The use of executive rules and regulations has, in fact, long since become a normal method of government. It is sanctioned by a long history, dating from a time practically contemporaneous with the adoption of the Constitution. Within broad limits it has been sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States in a series of decisions dating from the Brig Aurora case³ in 1813. The leading case is Field v. Clark,⁴ decided in 1892. Recent Supreme Court decisions have defined the scope of delegated authority but have not challenged its validity as a method. There can at this date be no serious question of its practical necessity or of its constitutionality. "Nearly everyone concedes," said the 1934 Report of the Special Committee on Administrative Law of the American Bar Association, "that the necessities of modern Government business require a certain amount of such delegation."⁵

There are obvious reasons not only for the necessity for the rule-making power, but also for the necessity for its growth in recent decades. These reasons parallel closely those for the growth of the regulatory and service functions of the Federal Government. Regulation required legislation. The demands for new laws increased the burden upon Congress. The conditions to be controlled were not simple and familiar, as they had been in the agricultural era, but extremely complex and technical. With the coming of the industrial age conditions change more rapidly than ever before, and, as unprecedented problems emerged, the public demanded new controls, but there was no experience to teach the best methods of control.

The net result has been a change in the regulatory role of Congress. It has been compelled to devolve much of the detail of regulation upon commissions created for the purpose or else upon the regular departments. It is, of course, the task of Congress to define basic policies and to fix the limits of administrative action. But Congress often finds it inexpedient to do more. It then delegates a limited discretion to the agencies charged with the administration of its laws. Such delegations often authorize the issuance of uniform rules and regulations that are later to be applied equally to all persons who come within the same reasonably defined class. Rule-making is thus shown by long experience to be a necessary and normal technique of twentieth century American government. This conclusion is increasingly verified by experience and practice in the several States.⁶

The Ideal Relation between Statutes and Regulations

The tradition in favor of detailed statutes is the perversion of a principle that is fundamental to the system of government in the United States. Nobody questions the principle that the basic policies of government must be embodied in statutes of Congress. But it does not follow from this—indeed, it is both unhistorical and unsound to hold—that Congress must state in minute detail either its basic policies or the administrative methods by which they are to be carried out.

⁶ Cf. State v. Whitman, 196 Wis. 472, 220 N.W. 929 (1928).

The practice of delegating rule-making authority to administrative agencies represents the adaptation of eighteenth century governmental machinery to twentieth century governmental problems. This adaptation has taken place within the broad framework of the Constitution. But it has been piecemeal and empirical. The rule-making power is often "grudgingly conceded",⁷ as a sort of necessary evil. Like the British Parliament, Congress is still apt to delegate authority to fill up the details only in those cases in which it "is either highly inexpedient or practically impossible" ⁸ for it to provide the details itself.

Thus, in the United States delegation is not based on a philosophy of legislation as it is in France. In France the statutes are written on the assumption that it is the function of the popular assembly to block out only the general principles of policy, and that it is the function, as well as within the constitutional power, of the Executive to concretize these principles by uniform but more specific regulations before they are applied to individual cases. The power of the President to execute the laws carries with it the power, without special statutory authorization, to supplement all statutes by completing rules and regulations. In the United States, this is not, and need not be, the interpretation of the corresponding constitutional power of the President. The Executive may render more concrete the general provisions of the statutes only when, and to the extent that, he is authorized to do so by express, and in exceptional circumstances tacit,⁹ delegation from Congress. But Congress may, within limits defined by the courts, attach express delegations to its statutes as it enacts them.

Suppose Congress adopted a philosophy of legislation whereby it deliberately refrained from freezing details into the statutes, confined itself to the declaration of a policy, and delegated to the agency charged with administration of that policy the power, within defined limits, to issue the rules and regulations necessary to the execution of that policy. What would be the consequences? . . .

ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE IN GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Report of Committee on Administrative Procedure, Appointed by the Attorney General, 1941, 11-21.

Reasons for Resort to the Administrative Process

What are the reasons why Congress thus resorted, continuously and with increasing frequency, to the administrative process as an instrument for the execution of the policies which it has enacted into law? No single or simple explanation can be given. The reasons are both varied and numerous, reflecting the variety and number of the agencies themselves. Discussion frequently requires classification in terms of the differing functions which the agencies perform.

⁷ See Report of the Committee on Ministers' Powers, Annex VI.

⁸ A. V. Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (8th ed., London: Macmillan and Co., 1915), p. 50, n. 1.

1. Advantages of administration as compared with executive action.—One of the principal alternatives to the administrative process is the more extensive use of ordinary executive officers. This alternative appears in a distinctive field of governmental action, comprising those numerous functions which commonly are regarded, for historical or other reasons, as belonging peculiarly to the executive department. An instance is the issuance of passports, the task of the Passport Division in the Department of State. Another is the actual expenditure, as distinguished from the appropriation, of public funds. Congress itself cannot or should not issue passports or make payments of money. Nor have these been thought of as appropriate tasks for the courts. This being so, two alternatives, broadly speaking, are available. Congress can establish an administrative tribunal for the task. Or it can make use of executive officers, charged with acting substantially as officers of business enterprises act.

The difference between these alternatives is not easy of exact statement, yet it appears readily enough from a comparison of extremes. It can be illustrated by the contrast between the Works Progress Administration and the Veterans' Administration. Both agencies disburse benefits. The former, however, proceeds in fluid executive fashion under a statute so framed that it confers upon individuals no "rights" to relief in stated circumstances. It issues no regulations giving notice of how it will act or limiting its own discretion. The latter, administering law embodied in statute and regulations, adjudicates "rights" by a relatively formal hearing procedure. The former the Committee has not regarded as an "administrative" agency falling within its purview; the latter it has. In this and analogous situations weighty reasons may often lead Congress to frame statutes upon the executive, more broadly discretionary, pattern. But the alternative of administrative adjudication, where practicable, insures greater uniformity and impersonality of action. In this area of Government the administrative process, far from being an encroachment upon the rule of law, is an extension of it.

A substantial number of existing administrative agencies represent an effort to discharge in a fashion analogous to the judicial a function which might have been discharged executively or even legislatively. Many of these, as we have noted in the preceding paragraph, and concerned with disbursing what, in legal theory, have been regarded as benefits. The Patent Office, so far as concerns the issuance of patents, is an early illustration. So also came to be the General Land Office. The United States Employees' Compensation Commission—so far as concerns payment of benefits to Federal employees—is an administrative agency doing what Congress formerly did by private acts. The Veterans' Administration illustrates increasing application of the adjudicatory method in the evolution of pension policy. Most recently, in the field of general social security, Congress in creating the Social Security Board and the Railroad Retirement Board directed action by adjudication as a matter of course; indeed, establishment of these agencies would scarcely have been possible, politically, on any other terms.

Extension of the rule of law through resort to the administrative process is by no means confined to the discharge of benefits. In the assessment of taxes, for example, the development of an administrative procedure through the Bureau of Internal Revenue and the Board of Tax Appeals has operated in considerable measure to replace an executive procedure. The Public Contracts Division in the Department of Labor, in prescribing the wages which must be paid by employers contracting with the Government and enforcing the wage stipulations in these contracts, follows an administrative method of hearing and rule-making sharply at variance with the executive methods by which other than labor terms of public contracts are determined. One of the most striking examples is the most recent—the Selective Service Administration with its relatively elaborate administrative process.

2. Constitutional limitations upon the powers of courts.—Many of the functions just discussed might, as far as the Constitution is concerned, have been assigned directly to the courts. Congress, for example, might conceivably have empowered the Federal district courts to hear claims for social security benefits under the Social Security Act and, when a claim was approved, to enter a money judgment against the United States. For reasons of expediency or appropriateness Congress did not use this method. In other situations, however, no such choice under the Constitution is open to Congress. Federal courts created under Article III can be authorized only to decide “cases and controversies,” to use the constitutional phrase; and from an early day the Supreme Court has regarded this restriction as an important one, to be scrupulously observed. “Cases and controversies,” broadly speaking, are matters in which a court can determine with finality the rights of adverse parties by applying the law to the facts as found. Thus the whole field of rule-making (with the exception of rules of judicial procedure) is outside the constitutional competence of the courts, for rules do not determine the rights of specific litigants but, like statutes, are addressed to people generally. Again, the Supreme Court has held that the Federal courts cannot be empowered to fix rates or prices, although they can review rate orders made by administrative agencies. Nor can they be authorized to issue broadcasting licenses, or to perform many other functions involving similarly wide discretion with respect to future conduct or arrangements. This insistence of the courts upon confining themselves to judicial, as distinguished from executive or legislative, functions has made inevitable the conferring of a wide range of powers, if the powers were to be conferred at all, upon some one of the executive departments or upon an independent agency.

3. The trend toward preventive legislation.—If administrative agencies did not exist in the Federal Government, Congress would be limited to a technique of legislation primarily designed to correct evils after they have arisen rather than to prevent them from arising. The criminal law, of course, operates in this after-the-event fashion. Congress declares a given act to be a crime. The mere declaration may act as a deterrent. But if it fails to do so the courts can only punish the wrong-doer; they cannot wipe out or make good the wrong. Traditional non-criminal, private law operates for the most part in the same after-the-event fashion. A statute or the common law gives one individual a right to go into court and sue another. This procedure is likely to be expensive. It is uncertain. At best, in the ordinary action for money damages, it leads only to compensation for the injury, which is seldom as satisfactory as not having been injured at all. To be sure, courts of equity administer a substantial measure of preventive justice by giving injunctions against threatened injuries. But it is necessary to prove the threat, and other limitations confine the scope of this mode of relief. The desire to work out a more effective and more flexible method of preventing unwanted things from happening accounts for the formation of many (although by no means all) Federal administrative agencies.

The rate-making powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission afford an apt illustration. The common law, from time immemorial recognized a right of action against a common carrier on account of an unreasonable rate. The shipper or the passenger could pay the charge and then sue to recover the unreasonable excess. Preference for a mechanism whereby reasonable rates could be established in advance was a principal factor leading to the Commission's establishment. A more recent example is the Securities and Exchange Commission. Within rather severe limits, the common law recognized a right in a purchaser of securities to recover damages from the seller resulting from false statements made in effecting the sale. The importance of truth in securities led to a demand that honest statements, as well as fuller and more informative statements, be assured so far as possible in advance. If this end were to be accomplished, it could only be done by creating an administrative agency. A similar purpose, effected in a great variety of ways, underlies the formation of many other agencies. Thus, licensing is one of the most significant of all preventive devices. It would be possible to permit anyone to act as the pilot of a ship or a plane, and then to punish those whose incompetence led to accidents or to prohibit them from acting as pilots again. People have preferred, however, to attempt by a licensing method to assure competence in advance; and administrative agencies have had to be created to carry out the licensing system. Licensing of radio broadcasters has, among other purposes, a comparable object of securing advance assurance of conformity to certain standards of broadcasting, as well as the object of security [sic] a ready means of dealing with departures from the standards. Licensing of any activity may be one of the most burdensome forms of regulations, since all who engage in the activity must be licensed in order that the persons who would probably act improperly may be controlled. But it is also one of the most effective, and it is particularly likely to be resorted to where the effort to effectuate policies is made with conviction.

4. Limitations upon effective legislative action.—Many of the functions of existing Federal administrative agencies obviously could not, in any view, be performed by Congress. Others, however, could. Thus, State legislatures once fixed rates by statutes, although Congress seems never to have done so. Congress once disposed of all money claims against the United States by a private bill procedure; much, although not all, of this work has now been passed on to other agencies. Apart from instances of this character, the full range of rule-making activity of Federal administrative agencies represents work of a type which Congress could do if it had the time and deemed it wise to do it. Independently of the comparative advantages of administrative action, various inherent limitations upon its own functioning militate in these cases against action by Congress itself. The total time available is the most obvious. Time spent on details must be at the sacrifice of time spent on matters of broad public policy. Lack of specialized information is another; lack of a staff or a procedure adapted to acquiring it is a third. The complexity of the problems which have to be determined, even after basic policy has been settled, is the governing consideration. Even if Congress had the time and facilities to work out details, there would be constant danger of harmful rigidity if the result were crystallized in the form of a statute. Thus comes a steady pressure—which may, of course, be yielded to overreadily—to assign such tasks to the controlled discretion of some other agency.

5. Limitations upon exclusively judicial enforcement.—If Congress chooses to rely upon the courts instead of assuming the tasks itself, discretion as already pointed out, must not be so broad as to require the exercise of non-judicial functions. Although this difficulty be avoided, however, other limitations operate. The 94 Federal district and territorial courts are structurally incapable of the same uniformity in the application of law as a single centralized agency. The problem of uniformity, and other problems as well, arise also with respect to the initiative of enforcement which, of course, the judges themselves cannot assume. Action must be brought either in the name of the Government or by private individuals. If brought by the Government, the 94 district and territorial attorneys will vary in their enforcement policy as will the courts in their decisions. If brought by private individuals, there is cast upon these individuals a burden which it is one of the prime purposes of administrative agencies to avoid. Certain agencies, it is essential to recognize, represent an effort, whether wise or unwise, to place upon the Government—rather than upon millions of people of often limited resources—a large share of the responsibility for making effective policies which the people through their Government have declared.

6. The advantages of continuity of attention and clearly allocated responsibility.—In contrast to the limitations of other agencies, just discussed, are certain advantages which administrative agencies, properly organized, may have. The need of bringing to bear upon difficult social and economic questions the attention of those who have time and facilities to become and remain continuously informed about them was recognized very early. In 1787, for example, the General Assembly of the State of Vermont recited that—

"Whereas it has been found by experience, that great advantage has been taken, by ferrymen demanding unreasonable prices for their services. And whereas this assembly cannot so well distinguish between the several rivers, and the several parts of the said river, pond or lake, on account of distance, swiftness of water, number of travellers, etc. Therefore to prevent such impositions for the future:

"Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Vermont, That the magistrates, selectmen, and constables of the several towns where ferries are needed, shall meet before the first day of August annually, at a time and place by them agreed upon, and appoint proper persons and places for ferries; and further regulate the price thereof, according to the profits of such ferries, and price of labour; to be varied from time to time as occasion shall require. . . ."²⁶

One hundred years later problems arising from the rapid extension of railroads were pressing and national. Neither the courts nor Congress could exercise adequate control over rates and practices. The task, accordingly, was assigned to an administrative agency, the Interstate Commerce Commission.²⁷ When in the course of time supervision over carrier operations was extended beyond rate control, the impossibility of direct legislative regulation and the need for an administrative system of control were merely emphasized.

The experience out of which came the Interstate Commerce Commission has been duplicated in other fields. Regulations of marine transportation and aviation presented problems not unlike those involved in regulation of the railroads and led to the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, the United States Maritime Commission, and the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Control over water power and natural gas resources, after a period of unsatisfactory experiments, was given to the Federal Power Commission. Protection of commerce in agricultural products led to supervision of the instrumentalities of that commerce by the Department of Agriculture administering the Packers and Stockyards Act, the Commodity Exchange Act, and other regulatory statutes. Banks and banking presented complex problems calling for special knowledge and continuing and detailed supervision, not possible for either Congress or the courts, and now performed by the Federal Reserve System, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and the Comptroller of the Currency. For radio communication only a limited airspace is available. The science has been from the first a rapidly developing one, demanding technical knowledge and expertness. Here complete legislative regulation was scarcely practicable. So Congress provided the principles of regulation and gave responsibility for administration to the Federal Radio Commission and its successor, the Federal Communications Commission. The financial collapse of 1929 and the years following focused attention upon the investment field. Delicate problems requiring at once an intimate knowledge of financial machinery and elasticity of treatment led Congress to delegate regulatory powers to the Securities and Exchange Commission. So, too, the administrative machinery of this Commission was availed of to perform the complex task of supervising and regulating the structure, finances, and management practices of public utilities.

²⁷ "The relationships involved were numerous and complicated, for the general adjustment of which general legislative bodies, dealing with all types of matters and functioning under pressure of political considerations, possessed no special competence and even such legislative adjustments, necessarily of limited scope, as might be deemed sound and just when made, were bound to operate with a harmful rigidity, unresponsive to the constantly changing conditions which surround transportation activity." I. L. Sharfman, The Interstate Commerce Commission: An Appraisal (1937), 46 Yale L.J. 915, 949. Note also the statement of Chief Justice Taft that "the utter inability of Congress to give the time and attention indispensable to the exercise of these [legislative] powers in detail" forced it to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to exercise them. 257 U.S. xxv, xxvi.

Each of the agencies just mentioned specializes in the regulation of a single industry or phase of industry—railroad transportation, or shipping, or investment, or banking. But Congress has also employed the administrative process to perform specialized and continuing regulation not of particular industries but of activities cutting across many industries. For example, Congress, believing it necessary to supervise and check competitive practices which tended toward monopoly and restraint of trade, in 1914 created the Federal Trade Commission to prevent unfair methods of competition. In 1935 the National Labor Relations Board was established to prevent unfair labor practices. Both objectives were declared by Congress to embody a national policy. In the case of these two agencies, the factor of technical expertness plays a less important part than in the others; but the advantages of continuous attention and a clearly allocated responsibility are substantially the same. If the initiative for enforcement were to be left to the injured persons immediately concerned, they might often be too weak or timid or discouraged to bring the necessary proceedings, in which case, so Congress thought, the public interest would suffer, since the public interest called for the elimination of the particular practices.

The administration of the Walsh-Healey Act affords a similar example. This statute is enforced primarily by the Department of Labor, through its Division of Public Contracts. The statute provides in part that certain contractors with the Government must pay their employees not less than prescribed wages. If lower wages are in fact paid, a proceeding may be brought before the Division of Public Contracts by agents of the Department to recover for the employees the resulting deficiencies. The problems presented for determination in cases of this type do not require an expert tribunal for their proper solution. On the contrary, the issues involved resemble those which often appear in the courts. But the individual cases involve very small sums, and though the aggregate alleged to be due to all the workers may be substantial, each man's claim will normally be so small and his confidence in the security of his job so tenuous, that litigation will be out of the question for him. Therefore if the Act is to be enforced at all, official means of investigation and specialized procedure for the collection of numerous small claims must be provided.

The enforcement of the disciplinary provisions of the marine laws presents a problem not of acting for weak claimants in the public interest, but of acting against offenders in the wisest and most effective way possible. Meting out punishment for such offenses as intoxication, disorderly conduct, and the like is, of course, a function capable of execution by any magistrate, and technical complexities are absent. Yet discipline on vessels presents a special problem closely related to a whole scheme of regulation, inspection, and safety of the seas and waters. The relatively insignificant issue of whether a seaman was intoxicated is part of a much larger pattern over which there must be special regulation and to which special attention must be paid, and thus one finds the administrative process utilized to determine issues which elsewhere have been reserved for the judiciary.

It is thus apparent that varied types of subject matters, from rate control of railroad carriers to collection of employees' wages and disciplining of seamen, have been entrusted by Congress to administrative agencies at least in part for similar reasons: in order to assure continuous attention to and clearly allocated responsibility for the effectuation of legislative policies.

7. The need for organization to dispose of volume of business and to provide the necessary records.—The volume of cases arising under certain laws is very great. The Veterans' Administration, the Railroad Retirement Board, the Social Security Board, and the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, for example, each adjudicates annually thousands of comparatively small claims. The Veterans' Administration alone makes determinations in about 100,000 cases each year; the Social Security Board, it is estimated, will in the year 1940 have disposed of eight or nine times that number. One need not labor the point that the present judicial structure would scarcely be equipped to handle this multitude of cases.²⁸

These same agencies illustrate another and related reason for employing the administrative process. This is the need of specialized staffs and machinery to keep and make available the records upon which judgment must be based. Before an agency such as the Social Security Board can disburse annually millions of dollars to hundreds of thousands of eligible claimants, a vast clerical machinery must be created. Complex records must be kept, classified, and made available. In the Railroad Retirement Board or the Veterans' Administration it may be necessary to call upon medical experts and occupational specialists. In the registration of securities the Securities and Exchange Commission must be organized to collect and collate huge masses of data available for immediate reference by clerks, accountants, analysts, oil and gas experts, engineers and the like. In part, also, the creation of these agencies with their staffs and accumulation of data is due to recognition by Congress that time is essential in the conduct of many business affairs. In the flotation of securities or the publication of a schedule of rates, it is important that procedures and staffs be available to investigate speedily the propriety of the proposed transaction, at least to the extent of suspending it for further study in formal procedure if serious question of public injury is raised.

Some Characteristics of Administrative Agencies

Certain characteristics of administrative agencies are of such fundamental importance in relation to the problems of their organization and procedure as to require specially emphatic statement.

1. Size.—Most administrative agencies are, of necessity, large organizations. For example, the Interstate Commerce Commission has a personnel of more than 2,500; the Securities and Exchange Commission, more than 1,200; the Social Security Board has some 9,000 employees in its Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors Insurance alone; the National Labor Relations Board and the Federal Power Commission each has a staff of more than 800; the Federal Communications Commission, more than 600; the Railroad Retirement Board, more than 2,500; and the Veterans' Administration, more than 36,000, of whom nearly 2,000 are engaged in adjudicating claims of various sorts.

The size of these staffs reflects both the nation-wide jurisdiction of the agencies and the character of the work they are called upon to perform. Each is charged by Congress with the work of continuing supervision of some field of activity throughout all the forty-eight States.

The Interstate Commerce Commission receives, analyzes, and files thousands of rate schedules, inspects thousands of locomotives and safety appliances, receives thousands of applications to be allowed to do, or to be excused from doing various things, receives complaints, conducts investigations. The work of the Social Security Board is even greater. It keeps literally millions of records, and will soon dispose of eight or nine hundred thousand claims a year. The Grain Standards Administration supervises over a million gradings of grain a year. These are perhaps striking illustrations, but they are not unrepresentative of the administrative field.²⁹ Whether an agency is establishing the records or making the decisions upon which claims will be paid, or regulating an industry, or enforcing standards of conduct which cut across industrial divisions, it is made up of a large number of people performing a variety of tasks which have to be coordinated, supervised, and directed toward fulfilling the functions prescribed by Congress. The personnel may include clerks to receive, analyze, and file reports and other material; accountants to devise and supervise the keeping of accounts by those whom the agency regulates; engineers skilled in radio, or in land, sea, or air transportation; chemists; biologists; economists to interpret and appraise the effect of a given wage rate or other factor upon any business or industry; lawyers and investigators to secure observance of the law. . . .

2. Specialization.—Administrative agencies specialize in particular tasks and they include specialists on their staffs. The staffs may become such either by experience in the specialized work of the agency or by prior technical or professional training. In many cases a principal reason for establishing an agency has been the need to bring to bear upon particular problems technical or professional skills. A public health agency, for example, must be staffed with people who understand diseases, the Federal Communications Commission with technicians who comprehend the engineering and economic aspects of telegraph, telephone, and radio. In other instances recurring experience with the work of the agency, or with a particular phase of its work may develop specialists—such as are found, for instance, in the Veterans' Administration—who have an insight and judgment which a beginner would lack. In either event a central problem of organization is how best to utilize these skills of training and experience. This does not mean that the heads of the agencies should necessarily be specialists. The problem is rather how to bring into play the technical resources of the agency staff so as to reduce the ultimate points of contention, if such there be, to such compass and form that they can be presented upon an understandable record for decision by the heads of the agency and for review by the courts.

Specialization has further consequences in procedure. Because the members of an agency or of its staff—like persons of similar experience in private affairs—approach problems of administration with a considerable background of knowledge and experience and with the equipment for investigation, they can accomplish much of the work of the agency without the necessity of informing themselves by the testimonial process. It is in part for this reason that so many questions, as we point out in chapter III, can be disposed of by informal methods with the consent of the private interests involved. Only when differences do not yield to adjustment or when other considerations, mentioned in chapter IV, make formal proceedings desirable need there be resort to the procedures of formal testimony, more familiar in judicial and legislative processes. Even if there is formal procedure, the characteristics of specialization may, as is discussed in chapter V, have an impact upon procedures for formal adjudication.

The same effects are felt in the procedures antecedent to rule-making. Here again the function of the formal hearing, in many instances, differs from its function in legislative and judicial methods. In the latter it is the instrument for gathering information. In many administrative rule-making situations, as we discuss in chapter VII, the information may be and is obtained by direct investigation and the hearing is most useful as a method of subjecting it to the criticism of private interests affected and of obtaining the views of these interests upon the desirability of various methods of achieving all or some of the objects sought.

3. Responsibility for results.—An administrative agency is usually charged by Congress with accomplishing or attempting to accomplish some end specified in the statute. It may be to see that benefits of some sort are received by persons with whom the agency deals, or that transportation systems or communications systems, or various other business activities are conducted either so as to comply with certain negative requirements or so as to achieve positive results. Taken together, the various Federal administrative agencies have the responsibility for making good to the people of the country a major part of the gains of a hundred and fifty years of democratic government. This means that the agencies cannot take a wholly passive attitude toward the issues which come before them. Out of this fact flow perhaps the most difficult of the problems relating to the administrative process. Administrative agencies constitute a large measure of the motive power of Government; a problem of motive power is a problem also of brakes; but the necessity of both must be faced frankly when either is in question.

4. Variety of administrative duties.—No single fact is more striking in a review of existing Federal administrative agencies than the variety of the duties which are entrusted to them to perform. This is true of many single agencies taken alone; it is true, above all, of the agencies taken as a group. This central and inescapable fact makes generalization in description difficult. It makes even more difficult generalization in prescription. For variety in functions means variety in the circumstances and conditions under which the activities of the various agencies impinge upon private individuals. A procedure which would be for the protection of the individual in one situation may be clearly to his injury in another. A set of standards evolved to meet one problem may fail wholly to meet another. One need look no further than a single agency—the Interstate Commerce Commission—to be impressed by the basic necessity of differing procedures for different types of activities, and by the varying procedural patterns which the Commission has evolved to meet this necessity.

ROSCOE POUND, FOR THE "MINORITY REPORT" *

27 A.B.A.Jour. 664 (1941).

. . . . What are these characteristics of administrative adjudication? The more significant ones for our purpose may be summed up in seven tendencies.

Failure to Hear Both Sides

First and most serious among these tendencies is one going counter to what has always been the first principle of judicial justice, namely, to hear both sides fully and with scrupulous fairness. In administrative adjudication there is everywhere an obstinate tendency to decide without a hearing, or with our hearing one of the parties, or after conference with one of the parties in the absence of the other whose interests are adversely affected. There are many such cases in the English reports. In a significant Australian case an administrative Court of Marine Inquiry cancelled a pilot's certificate on the basis of a reconstruction of maneuvers of vessels in a collision in the absence of the pilot and without his knowledge. Examples in the reports of our federal courts are numerous. One may find such cases in almost every volume of the law reports of our several states. Examples are not wanting in the Monographs submitted to the committee. For example, we are told that an investigation by the Railroad Retirement Board "is not necessarily a complete one in that all sides may not be notified." Indeed, it is the unanimous report of the committee that too frequently notice is inadequate. The administrative agencies, it is reported, frequently fail to apprise respondents fully of what they have to meet so as to permit adequate preparation of their defenses. As the report adds, notice ought to "fairly indicate what the respondent is to meet." How obstinate this tendency is may be seen from a case where, although the statute required a hearing, the commission made orders without notice or hearing and sought to obtain a ruling from the court that they were not necessary. Aversion to hearings on the part of administrative agencies is abundantly shown in the Monographs, the report of the committee, and the testimony taken by the Senate sub-committee. After reading the Monographs one cannot but feel that administrative agencies tend to consider that hearings and arguments before them are, as Terence Mulvaney put it, "a shuparfluous and impartinent nicissity." The statutes often prescribe them and the courts require them, but they are not to have any controlling influence upon determination of facts.

Private Consultations and Undivulged Reports

A second tendency is to make determinations upon the basis of consultations had in private or of reports not divulged, giving the party

* [Footnotes omitted. Ed.]

affected no opportunity to refute or explain. The law reports are full of illustrations of this. The Monographs are replete with examples. In the Federal Alcohol Administration "no attempt is made to withhold from the administrator any extra-record information bearing on cases awaiting decision." In the administration of the Grain Standards Act the official in charge of General Field Headquarters "considers the record and report and, if he wishes, consults supervisors or others familiar with the subject matter and obtains their views." Such consultations are often had by correspondence. The Railroad Retirement Board, in about one-third of the cases, after the hearing seeks new evidence "Usually by correspondence or field investigation." In foreign fraud order cases the respondent knows nothing about the proceedings till he inquires why no mail comes to him. Then he finds an order has been issued against him. But he is only allowed to see the findings of fact, which are in general terms. He is not allowed to see the files or learn the specific evidence against him. Sometimes administrative orders are based "almost exclusively on reports of investigation and the statements of the agency's own examiners." It should be noted particularly that in some of these cases there is no power to administer oaths and so no safeguard against perjury. The Federal Trade Commission makes its decision on a record of the evidence taken, with no report of the trial examiner, and after decision and order refers the case back to the trial examiner to make findings of fact in accord with the decision. But the trial examiner has not heard the oral argument nor participated in the decision. So the decision is made without findings of fact and the facts are found afterward by one who did not hear argument. Naturally the findings are commonly in the words of the complaint. In the administration of the Grain Standards Act there is no oral argument before the examiner or before the official in charge of General Field Headquarters. On review, there is no provision for briefs. They get into the hands of whoever has the papers at the moment and are attached to the files. Of one mode of proceeding in forfeiture cases we are told in the Monograph that after the elaborate preliminaries the hearings are nothing but "the statutory addition of an otherwise unnecessary nail in the coffin." This attitude is typical of those whose primary interest is in administration. In the Post Office Department in fraud order cases the respondent's oral argument "is made either to the hearing officer, who does not finally make the findings, or the solicitor, who has not heard the evidence and has not yet become familiar with the record. Thus, in effect, if the respondent in a fraud order case chooses to argue before the hearing officer, he is not addressing his argument to the crucial person who decides; if he chooses to argue before the solicitor, he cannot argue against or upon any defined finding or opposing position, since none has been presented to the solicitor." After reading the Monographs one cannot escape a conviction that many administrative agencies regard a hearing as a mere form to create an appearance of complying with the requirement of due process of law.

Determinations Without Basis in Substantial Evidence

Third, there is a tendency to make determinations of fact seriously affecting individual rights without a basis in substantial evidence or in any evidence of rational probative force, much less sustained by the reasonable weight of the evidence as a whole. Indeed, one of the most serious features of administrative justice is a tendency to find the facts not on the basis of hearing and evidence but on the basis of preconceptions of the facts to fit the assumed exigencies of a policy. One might in this connection refer to some of the determinations of the National Labor Relations Board in the past. Many examples which are no longer controversial may be found in findings of prohibition administrators under the National Prohibition Act. An illustration may be found also in the Monograph setting forth the procedure of the Federal Communications Commission. We are told that "the distinction between the determination of issues of fact and questions of policy has not been made by the commission either in theory or in practice." In other words the policy finds the facts to which the policy is to be applied.

Policies Outside of the Statute

A fourth tendency is to set up and give effect to policies beyond or even at variance with the statutes or the general law governing the action of the administrative agency. It is very easy to say that the public interest demands or justifies activity beyond or in contravention of the statute and to cover this up by a general pronouncement upon the case. Usually this is done out of zeal to promote supposed social ends to which the legislative body might or might not agree. Some late examples from the current reports may be cited. As a witness said before the subcommittee of the Senate, there is a general tendency of an administrative agency, when it administers a statute, "to feel that the bill enacted by Congress is merely the starting point from which to push forward into new fields. They try to extend the jurisdiction and enforce their own ideas in all possible ways." One board was found to have repeatedly exceeded its authority by "arbitrarily substituting its autocratic judgment for the Congressional mandate."

Policy Determining Facts

Connected with this last tendency and with the one to decide without any basis in substantial evidence, is a fifth tendency, namely, to determine facts not on the basis of hearing and evidence but on the basis of preconceptions or assumptions of facts to fit the assumed exigencies of a policy. It is said by a writer on administrative law that the adjudication must support the policies of the administrative agency. But note how this proposition works. The Federal Communications Commission changed its procedure because "the examiner's report frequently failed to represent the views of the Commission as reflected by its legal and technical staff"—that is, the report of the examiner who heard the evidence did not adjust itself to the preformed decision. There is a tendency to identify in advance one side of a controversy with the public interest and to find the facts accordingly. This tendency is the more likely when the administrative agency combines undifferentiated investigating, prosecuting, and adjudicating functions. Under such a combination of functions it is not easy to realize that the policy is to be applied in determining the legal effect of the facts under the statute, not to determining the facts.

It is interesting to note in this connection that while in one breath we are told that analytical distinctions as to administrative functions are useless, in another we are told that a distinction must be made between administrative agencies whose business it is to detect and prosecute violations of the law and those which fix rates or decide policies for a particular industry. The former act quasi judicially. The latter act administratively. This is true enough. In former the standards of fair hearing and the ethics of decision of controversies apply. In the latter the question is one of due process in the sense that the resulting orders must not be arbitrary and unreasonable. But in those cases what is reasonable must depend on ascertainment of facts, and there are certain fundamental requirements of fair play and support of the ascertainment of facts by evidence of at least rational probative force which cannot be suffered to be overlooked.

Undifferentiated Finding of Facts and Law

Another closely connected tendency, growing out of the setting up of administrative agencies to investigate, prosecute, and adjudicate, is one to make no separation of facts and law, or of facts, law, and policy to be applied to facts. In all legal systems the history of appellate procedure shows the importance of separating ascertainment of the facts, as a process, from ascertainment of the applicable law and application of the ascertained law to the facts. Progress in reviewing procedure has largely taken the form of perfecting this separation. In the common-law system this progress has been slow and difficult because of the general verdict of the jury in which for a long time the three were wrapped up in one pronouncement. That general verdict grew out of the exigencies of primitive procedure in which there was a mechanical mode of trial of a single issue. Recently there has been widespread assertion of a doctrine that finding of facts and finding and application of law cannot be separated. For the most part, this assertion is a phase of the recrudescence of absolutism, conspicuous in all parts of the world in the last decades. It is urged chiefly abroad by those who hold that law will gradually disappear and believe in a regime of administrative orders. In this country it is urged chiefly by advocates of administrative absolutism of whom the Attorney General certainly is not one. But the idea stands out in more than one of the Monographs and serves to hold back the majority of the committee from recommending any effective legislation. Undifferentiated finding of facts and finding and application of the law thereto is the method of the personal justice and mechanical modes of trial which characterize the beginnings of a legal order.

The Same Problem in Judicial Procedure

We are told in the Monographs that the Federal Communications Commission "convinced that there was no merit in segregation of functions in its work and a good deal to be gained by scrapping the distinction between prosecuting and judging a case" adopted its system of pronouncement upon a case as a whole with no discriminations of fact, policy, and law. In the Report of the Committee we are told that as a general policy there ought to be at least a separation of functions within each agency. But the majority are inclined to emphasize the difficulties and not perceive that here is the better reason for insisting upon adequate judicial review. We have had the same problem in judicial procedure. The colonial courts in the seventeenth century rendered judgments upon general verdicts of juries to whom the case was turned over as a whole. But as lawyers of training and ability came to practise in them and sit as judges there was continually increasing separation of law and fact. Demurrers to the evidence, cases stated, reservation of points of law at the trial and special verdicts came to be used. In England, the practice grew up of putting special questions of fact to the jury and upon the answers given directing what the general verdict should be. On the basis of recent philosophical ideas some professors are now telling us that what we have learned to do in long experience in English and American courts is theoretically impossible. Perhaps the best commentary on this teaching is William James's saying that the worst enemies of a subject are the professors thereof.

Adjudication by Prosecutors

All of the foregoing tendencies are given increased scope for operation in action by the effect of combining or not differentiating the receiving of complaints, investigation of them, bringing and conducting a prosecution upon them, advocacy before the agency itself in the course of the prosecution, and adjudication. Thus the adjudication becomes one by or with the advice and assistance of those who investigated, prosecuted, and were advocates for the prosecution. Members of legislative bodies have often borne witness that their constituents expect them to forward complaints to administrative agencies which are authorized to receive the complaints and are then to investigate, prosecute, and judge. Such things are in manifest derogation of the maxim that no one is to be judge in his own case. The effect of it has been noted by courts. The extent to which this fundamental maxim is habitually violated appears fully in the Monographs, and is, indeed, recognized in the report. In the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act, the trial attorney represents both the division and the complainants, and the trial examiners consult with him before making their reports. In the Federal Communications Commission, usually the attorney who "has worked on the case from its very inception" presides at the hearing. He discusses the case with other members of the staff throughout the hearing and after the hearing in the preparation of the decision. In some administrative proceedings this combination of roles has led to procedures little short of scandalous. It was shown that a trial examiner of one board, during a hearing, held an all day conference with the trial attorney, the regional attorney of the board, and the regional director. That is as if a trial judge were to hold such a conference with the prosecuting attorney, the director of prosecutions, and the attorney general—of course in the absence of the respondent. There is much significance in the answer of an official of one of the important agencies as to whether the prosecuting officials of the agency could be kept from collaborating with the deciding officials. He said: "We try. But there is no way that we have been able to find to keep the prosecutors and the deciding officers from meeting at lunch and elsewhere and discussing their cases." Many administrative agencies do not even try. Some actively provide for such collaboration in their established procedure. In a court house, where judge and prosecutor are not part of a common organization with a common head interested in promoting the prosecution, they would not be tolerated in talking over at lunch cases then on trial. In their case there is no common interest in carrying out the views of an organization of which each is part. Yet the ethics of the profession preclude any contact. Administrative law has developed no code of ethics to deal with an infinitely more dangerous situation in that prosecutor, advocate, and judge are part of one thoroughly organized bureau with intimate daily contracts and a strong common interest in the prosecutions carried on by that bureau.

Organization Esprit de Corps

I have spoken of this situation as a very serious one and I submit it is much more serious than the majority of the committee and certain writers on administrative law are willing to acknowledge. In the testimony of the Attorney General (when Solicitor General) before the Senate sub-committee he seems to intimate that Congress intended one of the agencies to be unfair. The report of the committee is inclined to make light of the effect of organization and esprit de corps and supervision by a common head on which the responsibility for the result ultimately rests. But common sense and actual experience and the testimony of cases which have come into court and of investigations speak to the contrary. In an administrative agency there must inevitably be close contacts between the heads and the subordinates and of the subordinates of every degree with each other. But this necessity does not mean that we are to give up attempt to secure impartial, objective determinations of fact nor that the importance of securing such determinations is negligible.

Inequality between Government and Citizen

Lord Herschell said truly that "important as it was that people should get justice, it was even more important that they should be made to feel and see that they are getting it." The British Committee points out the danger of permitting the Minister (i.e. head of an administrative agency) "to perform the incongruous task of dealing with the judicial part of the quasi judicial decision as an impartial judge when ex hypothesi he and his department want the decision to be one way, rather than the other." Moreover, the one-sidedness of administrative justice, a closely connected phenomenon, is brought out in many places in the Monographs and report. The situation as to issuance of subpoenas is notably unfair. Some agencies are without power to issue them. In some the requirements imposed on private parties are found to be "accidental, haphazard, and burdensome." Private parties are required to disclose their evidence in requesting subpoenas and this information is submitted to counsel for the government, while a respondent has no access to the evidence of the prosecution. The Post Office Department, we are told, objects to statutory treatment of the power of subpoena because it will lead to claims of denial of right to subpoenas and will result in more being issued. What this comes to is that the power to issue subpoenas should be kept as secret as possible so that, while the agency may exercise the power in the interest of the prosecution, private parties may not readily do so. There is no idea of fairness as between citizen and government. It is the idea of the administrative tribunals of the Stuarts. The interests of private parties are negligible in comparison with the zeal of the administrative agency to get results. One of the chief ideas of the minority is to create and maintain equality of opportunity between the government and the individual in matters of procedure.

Delegation to Subordinates

A seventh characteristic of administrative justice is a tendency to delegate decision to subordinates where the law requires decision to be made by the head, and to make decision by the responsible authority a perfunctory matter. This is something that was forbidden in judicial justice long ago. The Roman law had to forbid the delegates of the emperor, appointed to hear appeals, from delegating their task. In the canon law the Pope had to forbid redelegation by those whom he chose to hear appeals to Rome. There is no such thing known to our law as delegation to a subordinate of a judge's duty of decision. The extent to which determinations are those of subordinates and not of the responsible administrative heads in whose name orders are made has been brought out in many recent discussions. The head of one of the most important of federal administrative agencies said about a year ago: "The Board members themselves cannot expect to read the records. In making its decisions the board, therefore, avails itself of assistants. . . . The review attorneys analyze the evidence, inform the board of the contentions of all the parties and the testimony relating thereto, and, after decision by the board, make initial drafts of the board's findings and order." As a witness before the Senate sub-committee said, "There are many youngsters who are given pretty broad arbitrary powers in dealing with pretty important matters." It is significant that administrative agencies object to judicial inquiry into how determinations are arrived at. They seem to feel that if the external appearance of due process and decision by the authority appointed by law to decide can be created, nothing further should be looked for. The head of a very important board said to a bar association a year or so ago that if there was a complaint defining the issues, an intermediate report redefining the issues after hearing, and opportunity for oral argument before the agency itself, "the requirements of fair hearing do not permit an inquiry into the internal operations of the administrative agency, at least in the absence of specific allegations of fraud." In other words, such things as secret reports, conferences with one side in the absence of the other, dictation of the examiner's report by the prosecuting official, decision on abstracts of the record not accessible to the parties, and review by conference with the subordinates reviewed, are not to be inquired into.

Ignoring Requirements of Fairness

It is fundamental that one who decides controversies and exercises what are substantially judicial functions should know the record thoroughly. If he is to decide on the basis of an abstract, it should be, as in the courts, one agreed on by the parties or settled after hearing both as to what it should contain—an abstract settled before argument and available to the parties at the argument so that those who argue and those who decide have the same material before them. He should not decide on an abstract made after argument by a subordinate, very likely in conference with the prosecuting advocate. The general attitude of too many administrative agencies, however, is illustrated by the objection of the National Labor Relations Board to a provision recommended by the minority intended to emphasize the responsibility of the individual officer. Many cannot afford the expense of formal hearings and judicial review. Their only reliance is the fairness of a multitude of subordinate officials. There is obvious need, therefore, to emphasize that they have a responsibility beyond that of carrying out in every way the general aims of the organization. They should be made to feel that they are under responsibility as lawyers are under the canons of ethics and judges under the canons of judicial ethics. That an authoritative statement of this responsibility should be objected to as "dangerous," can only mean that the agency so objecting seeks to ignore requirements of fairness toward those whom it is pursuing.

Characteristics Are Deep-Seated

That these tendencies of administrative determination are not a matter of occasional sporadic cases but represent inherent and deep-seated characteristics of lay administration of justice is shown by the number of cases found in the reports of all jurisdictions and the persistence with which the same procedures appear for years after the courts have called attention to them. Four such cases are to be found in the one volume, 259 App. Div. (N.Y.) covering from March to August, 1940. Such things explain the activity of lawyers, who have continual experience of what these tendencies in action mean to their clients, in seeking effective safeguards as to records, hearings, and findings, an understood and fair procedure, and a modern mode of appeal from administrative orders.

Checks upon Courts

It is of special importance to take account of the checks upon courts which do not obtain or in our practice are ineffective as to administrative agencies. Four of these checks are significant. In the first place in a court the judges from their very training are impelled to conform their action to certain known standards and to conform to settled ideals of judicial conduct. Professional habit and training lead them to hear both sides of every point scrupulously, rules of law which have entered into their everyday habits of action lead them to insist that everything upon which they are to base an order or judgment must be before them in such a way that no party to be affected can be cut off from full opportunity to explain or refute it or challenge its application to his case. Judges in court are impelled in every case to seek authoritative grounds of decision before acting and to base their action upon reasoning from such grounds. Again, the decision of a court is subject to criticism by a trained profession to whose opinion the judges, as members of the profession are keenly sensitive. Thirdly, every decision and the case on which it was based appear in full in public records. In those records any one may find exactly what the claims of the respective parties were, what disputed questions of fact and law were before the tribunal, and how the questions of fact were determined—If by a jury very likely by questions put by the court and specifically answered, if by a judge, in the form of special findings of fact. Likewise any one can find from those records what conclusions the court came to as to the applicable law, either in the form of instructions to the jury or of findings by the court. Moreover, the judgment of the court must respond to the pleadings, findings of fact and conclusions of law, and any lack of consistency in these respects will be apparent on the face of the record. Fourthly, every judgment of a single judge is subject to review by a bench of judges, independent of the one whose action is to be scrutinized and constrained by no hierarchical organization or esprit de corps to uphold whatever he does. Nor is this all. In the case of appellate courts all important decisions and the grounds on which they proceed and the reasons on which they proceed are published in the law reports. The opinions must be based upon the records in the cases decided, and those records are public records accessible to everyone. Thus the materials for criticism of and accurate judgment with respect to judicial decisions are always available and readily accessible. There are no such checks upon administrative action.

Want of Checks on Administrative Justice

Let us make a comparison. Those who sit in administrative determinations seldom have had experience of the deciding function. The expertness demanded of them is of quite another sort. They are likely to have the layman's idea that decision is an easy task involving no acquired expertness through training and experience and to be conscientiously unconscious of what the lawyer soon learns, namely, that there are two sides to every case. Without training in grounding their action upon certain known standards, they are prone to act in deciding, as very likely they properly may in directing, as if every case was unique. Again, the number of those who are competent to criticise administrative determinations, as distinguished from the general course of administrative action, if we leave lawyers out of account, is at least very limited. They are not necessarily members of a common profession with the administrative officials and the latter are not unlikely to consider their criticism and that of lawyers negligible. Thirdly, administrative determinations are not safeguarded by the detailed and explicit records which keep down any tendency of a court to act otherwise than impartially and objectively in arriving at its determinations and enable lawyer and layman alike to know accurately what has been done and how and why. Fourthly, as will be shown presently, review of administrative determinations by an administrative official is a very different thing from review of the action of a judge by an independent bench of judges.

Difference of Spirit of Administrative Justice

I do not claim for a moment that the technique of judicial proceedings is to be applied to administrative determinations. But it is just because it is not, and because the checks upon judicial action are necessarily wanting, that we are required to do what we may to provide reasonable checks and assurance against the tendencies which administrative justice displays. Indeed, the Monographs disclose this need. For example, one of them points out the want of specific grounds of complaint in proceedings in the Department of Labor under the Walsh-Healey Act. There is only a general complaint. This is found objectionable in the Monograph, and it is noted that the Department urged unsatisfactory grounds for not making complaints giving real notice. It should be noted also how a court of equity submits or requires submission of a draft decree in any important case to counsel for the defeated party for suggestions and objections. The spirit of such procedure is wholly different from that of administrative adjudication.

Need of Simple Appeal

If such things could be easily and effectively reached by judicial review, as provided at present, it would not so much matter. The term "judicial review" has been criticized as connoting a putting of the judiciary above the executive. But the name is a name not a description. Appeal is only a modern, speedy, non-technical, less expensive mode of adjudicating controversies arising upon administrative orders, substituted for the older writs at law or suits in equity. If the latter were permissible and unobjectionable the former are also. Statutes, however, often make no provision for review. In that event, as appeal is a purely statutory proceeding, the only recourse is a suit in equity for an injunction, an expensive proceeding, calling for taking evidence de novo and involving risk of substituting the discretion of a court of equity for that of the administrative agency. Moreover, in statutory appeals it is held that the ordinary incidents of review by appellate courts do not apply to proceedings of administrative agencies. In some cases it seems that mere injury to a private interest does not permit of the statutory appeal and leaves only the awkward remedy of a suit in equity. Certainly the criterion of appealability ought to be whether the party seeking review has a substantial interest which is affected. This is what courts and statutes have come to in judicial proceedings, and it should be so as to any sort of proceeding. That statutes provide otherwise is but another example of the extent to which the interests of private persons have been coming to be ignored. Other difficulties in judicial review as it now exists are pointed out in the report of the committee. We may take it as admitted that the present condition is unsatisfactory. It should be added, however, that one of the purposes of appointing the committee, suggested by the President, was to "avoid litigations." This should be achieved by a simple appeal replacing suits in equity; not by making appeal difficult or by cutting it off and leaving parties aggrieved to suits in equity or attacking orders as void when prosecuted for violation of them.

Effects of Official Zeal

In pointing out the characteristics of administrative justice as it has developed somewhat rapidly in the United States in the last fifty years, one is not in the least attacking the members, past or present of our administrative agencies, nor impugning their intentions or motives. What is behind those characteristics is largely zeal in carrying out laws which are felt by those chosen to administer them to be of paramount importance, justifying the means by the end. It is natural that an administrative agency should see its particular, relatively narrow task out of proportion. To take an example which is no longer controversial, this was notably manifest under the regime of national prohibition. Those in charge of administering the National Prohibition Act felt strongly, and no doubt conscientiously, that the objects of that Act were of such overruling importance as to justify extra-legal measures and overriding of individual rights and constitutional guarantees. Indeed, it has been argued by an able exponent of the administrative standpoint that we must look at administrative adjudication "against a background of what we now expect government to do." If we keep our eye too exclusively on that background we may overlook the importance of how we expect government to do it. The effect of well intentioned zeal upon administrative justice has often been remarked. Thus the British Commission said: "Bias from strong and sincere conviction as to public policy may operate as a more serious disqualification than pecuniary interest." As a witness before the Senate sub-committee put it, "administrators have a tendency to become so wrapped up in their objectives that they are often unnecessarily disregarding of private rights." The Attorney General, when Solicitor General, testifying before the Senate sub-committee put this as an excuse for not effectively segregating the judging from the prosecuting function, saying that administrative boards were set up to carry out policies and make that the paramount consideration. The attitude is praiseworthy and has its good side as making for efficiency. But because it makes for efficiency at the expense of individual and guaranteed rights is the best of reasons for imposing checks and providing adequate judicial review.

Administrative Rule-Making

Thus far I have spoken of administrative adjudication. Hardly less important is administrative rule-making. Here, again, the significant point is the extent to which exercise of the powers of administrative agencies is left at large as compared with exercise of the powers of legislatures and courts. Administrative rules and regulations having the force of laws have become an increasingly important part of the everyday law in nation and state. Often these rules affect interests of far more economic significance to individuals than statutes or rules of court. Yet even the least significant statute must be formally introduced as a bill, printed, referred to a committee and reported on, often after hearing, read three times before each house, discussed in committee of the whole, passed by each house, and approved by the executive. Rules of court are drafted by committees of judges, practicing lawyers, and law teachers, or by judicial councils, referred for criticism to bar association committees or committees of the bar in different circuits, discussed before bar associations and in the legal periodicals, and only adopted after every one having an interest has been fully heard. Administrative rule-making is in striking contrast. The first knowledge that those affected have of a rule is usually after it has gone into effect. The first opportunity they have to challenge it is usually after it is sought to be enforced against them and they may attack it in the courts. As was said by a witness before the Senate sub-committee: "The members of the Bureau of Customs are not business men. They will issue regulations without consulting business men, and the result is business is upset." Another witness points out that administrative rules and regulations may require over night a change in long standing business practice without any one affected having an opportunity to be heard in advance. Still another witness says: "I have seen regulations changed by the Department where there was no opportunity whatever to be notified in advance to discuss the matter and where great difficulty and expense were involved, and where later tremendous effort to get a hearing and review came to nothing because there was no procedure." How those affected feel about this condition is well put by the chairman of a committee of the National Association of Manufacturers: "When administrative rules or regulations are necessary to clarify or enforce the law, any person to be affected should have a real opportunity to be heard and participate in making rules which will govern his future conduct." One would think this an eminently reasonable proposition. But it is strenuously objected to by important administrative agencies. . . .

NOTES

1. With reference to Dean Pound's article, Pirsig, "Cases on Judicial Administration" (West Pub. Co., 1946), in Note on p. 155, says:

"This article evoked vigorous criticism in Davis, Dean Pound and Administrative Law (1942) 42 Col.L.Rev. 89, on the ground that the practices and habits of administrative agencies are not as pictured. The article was defended, in turn, in Bailey, Dean Pound and Administrative Law (1942) 42 Col.L.Rev. 781, to which reply was made in Davis, Dean Pound's Errors About Administrative Agencies (1942) 42 Col.L.Rev. 804. For another attack upon Dean Pound's views see Frank, If Men Were Angels (1942) chap. V."

2. When the Administrative Procedure Act bill was being considered in the Committee of the Whole of the House of Representatives, Mr. Jennings from Tennessee remarked in part:

"The Federal Government now touches almost every activity that arises in the lives of millions of people who make up the population of this country. The chief indoor sport of the Federal bureaucrat is to evolve out of his own inner consciousness, like a spider spins his web, countless confusing rules and regulations which may deprive a man of his property, his liberty, and bedevil the very life out of him.

"Recently Westbrook Pegler dissected an interesting speech by a young lady who is an official in one of the bureaus here in Washington. I was interested in his article because I heard her make a speech not so long ago at a meeting of the Federal Bar Association in which she said that this bill was pending before the two Houses of Congress, and that the Federal bureaucrats and lawyers who served these bureaus and bureaucrats should be on their toes and should do their best to prevent the passage of this bill or any similar bill because she said that it would put the Federal Bureaucrats and the lawyers whom they had on their pay rolls in a strait-jacket.

"Well, I was interested in that frank confession and I became interested in fitting a restraining legal strait-jacket on these people who have been harrassing the citizens of this country. As I have said, one of their principal indoor sports is to promulgate these rules and regulations.

"Now, this bill does three things generally, you might say. It puts a legal restraint upon the power of these bureaus to promulgate rules and regulations and gives the citizen who may be affected by them the right to a hearing, to make suggestions, and to enter protest against the proposed rule, and then it gives the citizen the right to a hearing before these bureaus. It requires that the rules and regulations shall be made public, and as a last resort when the citizen has exhausted his remedy before some Federal bureau here in Washington, he has a right to go into court and undertake to protect himself.

"I just want to read some of the things that this enterprising young woman had to say. Mr. Pegler said of her speech before a meeting of the Texas Bar Association:

"Though cynical, Miss Rawalt was thoroughly honest and practical. The citizen occupied no place in her remarks. Her message was an exhortation to her fellow lawyers to get aware of the existence of government by bureaucracy and to grab off their share of the loot from a Nation bedeviled by confusing and harassing rules, regulations and interpretations, many of them improved by New Deal bureaus operating as courts.

"... the extent to which the citizen has been elbowed out of court and into New Deal bureaus for his justice, constantly in need of lawyers to keep him out of jail, is thoroughly convincing. Miss Rawalt certainly would not exaggerate.

" "Speaking of opportunity," the lady said, "are the lawyers of this country, men and women, going to take full advantage of their opportunities in administrative law? It is the most rapidly expanding area of law practice today. There are some 217 special courts, bureaus and commissions which today decide upon and administer various Federal laws directly affecting citizens and business firms in this country. This does not take into account similar State quasi-judicial bodies.

" "Administrative law, through the Federal Communications Commission, regulates the programs you hear on your radio and determines the use of the telephone and telegraph in our country today. Administrative law, through the Federal Trade Commission, determines various trade practices within the industries of this Nation. Administrative law through the OPA and other departments, regulates what food you may buy and what you may pay for it. Concurrent with the phenomenal growth in this field of law, there has been a sudden decrease in the number of lawyers."

"Then this young woman told the Texas lawyers that they should 'stake their claim in this promising professional gold mine now and avoid the costly process of ejectment of others who have laid claims thereto.' She urged them to familiarize themselves with the bureau where this administrative law is administered. She also called their attention to the fact that a certain provision which was expressed in 500 words in the original income-tax law now runs to 2,300 words.

"Then she stressed the statement of Mr. Justice Frankfurter, who recently said in one of his opinions:

" 'The notion that, because the words of a statute are plain, its meaning also is plain, is merely pernicious oversimplification.'

"In other words, words do not mean what they say and things are not as they appear to the naked eye and to ordinary human intelligence.

"Mr. Chairman, for the reason I have stated and for many other reasons that might be stated, I hope this bill is enacted by this House as passed by the Senate. It will give a long-suffering public much-needed relief." (Senate Document No. 248, 79th Congress, 2nd Session pp. 392-393.)

3. As published in 5 Federal Bar Assn.Jour. 86 (1943), sub nom "How Our Federal Tax Laws Grow", Miss Rawalt's address contains no reference to the Administrative Procedure Act bill.

4. The Administrative Procedure Act as passed in 1946 (Ch. 324, Pub.Law 404) represents a compromise of the views advanced in the majority and minority reports of the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure. The Act has been the subject of several critical articles by proponents of free development of administrative procedures. In Blachly and Oatman, "The Federal Administrative Procedure Act", 34 Geo.L.J. 407 (1946), it is said: "... In reality, what the law does is to overturn the established system of federal administration and administrative law, and to cripple administrative action. To read it is to learn that such is not only its effect but its purpose. How does the new statute accomplish this purpose?

"I. By so changing the administrative system of the federal government, through comprehensive definitions and statements, that administrators will be uncertain of their powers and duties under law.

"II. By requiring unnecessary, burdensome and expensive procedures in respect to many types of administrative action.

"III. By requiring a separation of functions where no such separation is necessary or advisable.

"IV. By requiring that the proponents of a rule or order, that is normally the administration, shall have the burden of proof.

"V. By requiring a judicialized procedure for the granting of licenses of every nature.

"VI. By greatly weakening the sanctioning power of administrative authorities.

"VII. By making unnecessary requirements as to public information.

"VIII. By subjecting to judicial review hundreds of acts not presently and not logically reviewable.

"IX. By greatly extending the scope of judicial review."

JAMES HART, SOME ASPECTS OF DELEGATED RULE- MAKING

25 Va.L.Rev. 810 (1939).

. . . The requisites of a valid delegation may be stated as five in number. Congress must:

1. itself have power in the premises to regulate.
2. definitely limit the delegation.
3. require, in the case of contingent legislation, a finding.
4. delegate the power to public officers or authorities, not to private persons or groups.
5. itself provide any penal sanction for violation of resulting rules.

. . . Limitation of the delegation has two interrelated aspects: definition of the subject, and provision of a policy. A reasonably clear definition of the subject is requisite. That subject, however, may be extensively as wide as the commerce power, provided it is intensively defined as some specific aspect thereof.

Limitation also comes through provision of a policy, standard or criterion. There is no valid distinction between the three. The ideal statute steers a middle course between the Scylla of attempting to anticipate every possible situation and the Charybdis of embodying no policy at all except that contained in an empty formula. The important thing is that the objectives the administrator is to seek be reasonably plain. This also is requisite; but whether it has been done must be decided in terms of common sense, and not in terms of formalism. An expression of policy that is couched merely in the pious terms of a glittering generality like "the public interest" adds nothing to what in any event would be implied. On the other hand, general terms often furnish adequate guidance. . . .

WALTER WHEELER COOK, CERTAINTY IN THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE LAW

21 A.B.A. Jour. 19 (1935).

The Securities Act of 1933 as amended by the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 contains a provision the significance of which from the point of view of general legal development seems not to be fully appreciated either by members of the legal profession or by the citizens whose lives it will affect. The reference is to Section 209(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, which amended the provisions of Section 19 of the Securities Act of 1933. To the original section, which authorized the Securities and Exchange Commission to adopt and alter rules and regulations and definitions of terms, the amendment of 1934 added the following provisions: "No provision of this title imposing any liability shall apply to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any rule or regulation of the Commission, notwithstanding that such rule or regulation may, after such act or omission, be amended or rescinded or be determined by judicial or other authority to be invalid for any reason."

The significance of these provisions will appear when we recall the dilemma which normally confronts the citizen when faced with new and often complex legislation which imposes upon him new legal duties: he must at his peril interpret the frequently ambiguous language of the new law, perhaps to be told later by some reviewing body, usually a court, that he has misinterpreted the law and thereby incurred a burdensome liability. Confronted by such a dilemma the members of the business community may often hesitate to enter upon legitimate business enterprises, fearing that even in spite of the best of intentions they may run afoul of the new law. The provisions of the new amendment are intended to meet this situation by conferring upon a small body of experts, who will continually study the operations of the law in question, the power to furnish the citizen with the information he needs if he is to keep within the law. A careful reading of the precise wording of the amendment will reveal that it differs from many apparently similar provisions in that there is no attempt on the part of the legislative body to authorize an administrative body to impose upon citizens legal burdens or liabilities which without the administrative action in question would not exist. Such procedure may be valid and necessary in some cases—see the discussion below—but is not attempted by the amendment of 1934. What is provided for is the creation by administrative action of exemptions from legal liabilities, exemptions which might not otherwise exist under the other provisions of the Act: the honest citizen who in good faith acts in reliance upon the interpretations of the Act embodied from time to time in the rules and regulations of the Commission is by the terms of the amendment exempted from legal liability, even though later the Commission may alter its ruling or some reviewing body may disagree with the Commission's interpretation of the statute.

The difference between the two things—imposition of liability by means of administrative action and exemption from liability because of reliance on such action—while recognized in our legal system and adopted in some instances in legislation, has not hitherto been given the emphasis and recognition which it appears to deserve. It is the purpose of the present paper to direct attention to the importance of the difference and to discuss briefly the validity under our constitutional system of the provisions of the 1934 amendment in question.

Before considering the validity of the amendment of 1934 from a constitutional viewpoint, certain aspects of its practical operation should be noted. The citizen who follows administrative determinations of the Commission is protected: what happens if he refuses to do so? The answer is that he thereby assumes the risk that his interpretation of the Act will later not be upheld by the courts when the question is raised in the appropriate way. If the court before whom the question may come agrees with the Commission, then and then only will the citizen who has refused to accept the Commission's interpretation be liable. On the other hand, if the court agrees with him rather than with the Commission, he will be under no legal liability, this in spite of the Commission's administrative determination. . . .

Precedents for this type of administrative proceeding are not entirely lacking. Its possibility was foreshadowed long ago by the opinion of the United States Supreme Court in the case of La Bourgoyne, 210 U.S. 95, 134, 28 S.Ct. 664 (1908). In that case, the Board of Supervising Inspectors had, pursuant to legislative authority, by regulation laid down certain requirements for the equipment of vessels. Action by parties injured was instituted against a vessel on the ground, among others, that the equipment provided did not conform to the statute. Having found that the equipment did conform to the regulations issued by the Board, the Court said, page 134:

"Again, the contention that the regulations of the Board are inconsistent with the statute, we think when the statute is considered as a whole, is without merit. Even, however, if it were otherwise, as compliance on the part of the petitioner with the regulations adopted by the board was compelled by law, it cannot be that upon it was cast the duty of disobeying the regulation at its peril, thus, on the one hand, subjecting it in case of non-compliance to the infliction of penalties, and on the other hand, if it fully complied with the regulations, imposing a liability upon the assumed theory that there had been a violation of law."

Practices developed in the Treasury Department are obviously based upon the idea under consideration. These practices provide a warning period for the enforcement of administrative determinations resulting in changes in rates of Customs duty. (See example, 66 Treasury Decisions, No. 47261, September 27, 1934; 66 Treasury Decisions, No. 47290, October 18, 1934). This procedure, in effect, concedes that a previous ruling was erroneous, involving an error in the application of legal principles to a stated set of facts; but in place of the recognized principle, which the courts would apply, that such a ruling has been law from the beginning of time, not only fails to assume that the change is of retroactive effect, but in addition provides an interim period before the decision will become effective, to permit those affected to adjust their situations accordingly. The distinction between the imposition of burdens and absolution from liability is apparent here, in that this principle does not appear to be applied to cases where a change in regulation provides less rather than more burdensome results. (See for example, 66 Treasury Decisions, No. 47251, September 20, 1934).

Sanction for these practices of the Treasury Department appears inter alia in Section 516 of the Tariff Act of 1930. That section provides that a domestic manufacturer may object to a classification, for duty purposes, of merchandise in which he is interested as a producer; and that if the Secretary of the Treasury considers his protest justified, he may change the classification to become effective thirty days after promulgation. Other examples are certain provisions of the Revenue Acts of 1924 and 1926. For instance, Section 1108(b) of the Revenue Act of 1926 provides that in cases where a sale or lease is made in reliance upon a ruling, regulation, or Treasury Decision existing at the time, holding that the sale or lease was not taxable, no tax under the Act shall be imposed. Again, subdivision (b) of the same section recognizes the principle that changes in administrative determinations or regulations need not be applied with retroactive effect.

The practical convenience and desirability of the type of regulation in question seem clear. There remains the question whether there are objections on constitutional grounds. Possible objections may be based upon the doctrine of the separation of powers, the argument being that there is an unconstitutional delegation of either legislative or judicial power to an administrative body. Is there such an unconstitutional delegation? It seems abundantly clear that there is not. Here first of all we need to recall the case of La Bourgoyne, 210 U.S., 95, 134, 28 S.Ct. 664 (1908) discussed above, in which it was held that one who had in good faith complied with the regulations issued by an administrative board in supposed compliance with the statute in question had incurred no liability, the Court saying that this would be true even if the regulations were inconsistent with the statute. In that case the statute contained no explicit provision exempting the defendant from liability in case of compliance with the Board's regulations. Clearly if the exemption would exist in the absence of specific legislative enactment to that effect, the specific provisions of the amendment of 1934 under consideration must be valid. Aside from the authority of that case the matter may be put shortly as follows: In the statute under consideration the legislative branch of the government is defining the conditions which, when they exist, are to result in the imposition of legal liabilities upon persons engaged in certain enterprises. In its discretion the legislative body has decided that it would be unfair to impose liabilities upon persons whose conduct is in compliance with the regulations of the Commission, and so has provided that conduct of that kind shall not give rise to legal liability. It seems clear that to deny to Congress the power to do this would be to infringe upon its discretion to determine when and when not legal liability shall exist. It thus becomes entirely unnecessary to rely upon the principle exemplified in Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U.S. 470, 24 S.Ct. 349 (1904), and similar cases, where it is sought to bind the citizens by administrative determinations which result in the imposition of liabilities, and, it would seem to follow, the limitations of that doctrine are not necessarily applicable to provisions of the kind here in question. The conclusion seems clear that the constitutional validity of the type of administrative determination under discussion can not be questioned on the ground of an unconstitutional delegation of legislative or judicial power. All that Congress has done is to define what conduct shall and what shall not result in legal liability.

NOTES

1. The question involved in Buttfield v. Stranahan, supra, is treated in Chapter 6, Section 2, infra. Ed.

2. In Hart, "Some Aspects of Delegated Rule-Making", 25 Va.L.Rev. 810, 811-812 (1939), the author says:

"The writer has recently heard some criticism of this technique of granting immunity in exchange for conformity to regulations. Will pressure for the issuance of regulations cause them to be hurriedly prepared? Will pressure against amendment tend to freeze them in their original form? Or will frequent amendment tend to make the intended certainty illusory? At the most, such questions do not militate against experimentation. A more serious matter is the possibility of collusion, or that a lawyer friendly with agency personnel will secure the issuance of a regulation that concerns a hypothetical A and B in terms that fit his client as A. The same thing may happen, however, in the case of Treasury regulations, where immunity is not involved. This objection goes rather to the propriety and scope of interpretative regulations."

3. In Lee, "Legislative and Interpretive Regulations", 29 Geo.L.J. 1-4 (1940), the author states:

"Regulations are not all birds of a feather. The genus contains several species and numerous activities. The several species differ in origin, function, and performance. These differences in the case of the two dominant species, legislative regulations and interpretive regulations, give rise to legal problems of practical importance to administrative law. Unfortunately the problems are none too well recognized. Relatively few lawyers realize, when they see legislative regulations and interpretive regulations perched side by side, that they are not the same kind of bird.

"The legal product resulting from the exercise by an administrative officer or agency of power to prescribe substantive regulations in connection with federal regulatory legislation, including revenue legislation, is variously denominated in the acts of Congress and in administrative practice thereunder. The product is commonly known as a 'regulation'. But it may also be called a 'rule', or sometimes an 'order' or 'determination' although of general application. Under the federal food and drug legislation the product is frequently designated as a 'definition' or 'standard', particularly when it deals with the identity or quality of a food or the fill of its container.

“ . . . These substantive regulations fall into the two main categories, legislative regulations and interpretive regulations. One difference between the two lies in their force and effect. A brief, and correspondingly inadequate, statement is that legislative regulations prescribe what the law shall be and have the force and effect of law, while interpretive regulations merely construe the terms of a statute and do not have the force and effect of law unless ‘ratified’ subsequently by Congress.

“Whether or not a substantive regulation is interpretive or legislative is to be determined from the statute. If the statute provides that nonconformance to the regulation is to result in the imposition of legal sanctions specified by Congress, then the regulation is legislative. Among such sanctions are denial of right to import or export, or forfeiture of goods, criminal penalties, penalty taxes, and suspension or revocation of permits. A few of the income tax regulations are legislative and in such instances the amount of tax payable will depend on these regulations.

“In another class of situations the statute lays down a primary rule but allows or requires the administrative officer or agency to relax it by regulations. Such regulations have the force and effect of law and are legislative for failure to come within the permitted tolerance, variation, or exemption may result in the imposition of statutory sanctions.

“On the other hand if power to prescribe a substantive regulation is delegated by statute, but no sanctions are imposed by statute for failure to conform to the regulation, then it is interpretive. It is also interpretive if it is prescribed pursuant to the inherent powers of the Executive to construe the statute and not pursuant to a specific delegation of authority by Congress. Despite the numerous grants of authority for legislative regulations made by recent acts of Congress interpretive regulations still are probably the more common type of regulations promulgated by federal administrative officers or agencies. Some if not the majority of the regulations issued under most regulatory acts are interpretive. Such regulations express the views of the administrative officer or agency as to the meaning or application of general requirements of a regulatory act, the construction that will be followed in administering the act. Interpretive regulations (except where they have been ‘ratified’ by Congress) have validity in judicial proceedings only to the extent that they correctly construe the statute and then, strictly speaking, it is the statute and not the regulation to which the individual must conform.

“Incidentally there has arisen, particularly in connection with the defining or standardizing of agricultural commodities, a third category. This embodies permissive definitions or standards. To call them ‘permissive regulations’ would be a misnomer. They make no pretense of regulating, neither do they interpret the provisions of a regulatory act. They set forth standards that are made available for voluntary use and observance but there is no legal compulsion to use or to observe them.”

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION v. POTTSVILLE BROADCASTING CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1940.
309 U.S. 134, 60 S.Ct. 437, 84 L.Ed. 656.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The court below issued a writ of mandamus against the Federal Communications Commission, and, because important issues of administrative law are involved, we brought the case here. 308 U.S. 535, 60 S.Ct. 107, 84 L.Ed. 451. We are called upon to ascertain and enforce the spheres of authority which Congress has given to the Commission and the courts, respectively, through its scheme for the regulation of radio broadcasting in the Communications Act of 1934, c. 652, 48 Stat. 1064, as amended by the Act of May 20, 1937, c. 229, 50 Stat. 189, 47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., 47 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq.

Adequate appreciation of the facts presently to be summarized requires that they be set in their legislative framework. In its essentials the Communications Act of 1934 derives from the Federal Radio Act of 1927, c. 169, 44 Stat. 1162, as amended, 46 Stat. 844. By this Act Congress, in order to protect the national interest involved in the new and far-reaching science of broadcasting, formulated a unified and comprehensive regulatory system for the industry.¹ The common factors in the administration of the various statutes by which Congress had supervised the different modes of communication led to the creation, in the Act of 1934, of the Communications Commission. But the objectives of the legislation have remained substantially unaltered since 1927.

Congress moved under the spur of a widespread fear that in the absence of governmental control the public interest might be subordinated to monopolistic domination in the broadcasting field. To avoid this Congress provided for a system of permits and licenses. Licenses were not to be granted for longer than three years. Communications Act of 1934, Title iii, § 307(d). No license was to be "construed to create any right, beyond the terms, conditions, and periods of the license." Ibid. § 301. In granting or withholding permits for the construction of stations, and in granting, denying, modifying or revoking licenses for the operation of stations, "public convenience, interest, or necessity" was the touchstone for the exercise of the Commission's authority. While this criterion is as concrete as the complicated factors for judgment in such a field of delegated authority permit, it serves as a supple instrument for the exercise of discretion by the expert body which Congress has charged to carry out its legislative policy. Necessarily, therefore, the subordinate questions of procedure in ascertaining the public interest, when the Commission's licensing authority is invoked—the scope of the inquiry, whether applications should be heard contemporaneously or successively, whether parties should be allowed to intervene in one another's proceedings, and similar questions—were explicitly and by implication left to the Commission's own devising, so long, of course, as it observes the basic requirements designed for the protection of private as well as public interest. Ibid., Title I, § 4(j), 47 U.S.C.A. § 154(j). Underlying the whole law is recognition of the rapidly fluctuating factors characteristic of the evolution of broadcasting and of the corresponding requirement that the administrative process possess sufficient flexibility to adjust itself to these factors. Thus, it is highly significant that although investment in broadcasting stations may be large, a license may not be issued for more than three years; and in deciding whether to renew the license, just as in deciding whether to issue it in the first place, the Commission must judge by the standard of "public convenience, interest, or necessity." The Communications Act is not designed primarily as a new code for the adjustment of conflicting private rights through adjudication. Rather it expresses a desire on the part of Congress to maintain, through appropriate administrative control, a grip on the dynamic aspects of radio transmission.²

Against this background the facts of the present case fall into proper perspective. In May, 1936, The Pottsville Broadcasting Company, respondent here, sought from the Commission a permit under § 319 Ibid., Title iii, for the construction of a broadcasting station at Pottsville, Pennsylvania. The Commission denied this application on two grounds: (1) that the respondent was financially disqualified; and (2) that the applicant did not sufficiently represent local interests in the community which the proposed station was to serve. From this denial of its application respondent appealed to the court below. That tribunal withheld judgment on the second ground of the Commission's decision, for it did not deem this to have controlled the Commission's judgment. But, finding the Commission's conclusion regarding the respondent's lack of financial qualification to have been based on an erroneous understanding of Pennsylvania law, the Court of Appeals reversed the decision and ordered the "cause . . . remanded to the . . . Communications Commission for reconsideration in accordance with the views expressed." Pottsville Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 69 App.D.C. 7, 98 F.2d 288.

Following this remand, respondent petitioned the Commission to grant its original application. Instead of doing so, the Commission set for argument respondent's application along with two rival applications for the same facilities. The latter applications had been filed subsequently to that of respondent and hearings had been held on them by the Commission in a consolidated proceeding, but they were still undisposed of when the respondent's case returned to the Commission. With three applications for the same facilities thus before it, ² Since the beginning of regulation under the Act of 1927 comparative considerations have governed the application of standards of "public convenience, interest, or necessity" laid down by the law. ". . . the commission desires to point out that the test—'public interest, convenience, or necessity'—becomes a matter of a comparative and not an absolute standard when applied to broadcasting stations. Since the number of channels is limited and the number of persons desiring to broadcast is far greater than can be accommodated, the commission must determine from among the applicants before it which of them will, if licensed, best serve the public. In a measure, perhaps, all of them give more or less service. Those who give the least, however, must be sacrificed for those who give the most. The emphasis must be first and foremost on the interest, the convenience, and the necessity of the listening public, and not on the interest, convenience, or necessity of the individual broadcaster, or the advertiser." Second Annual Report, Federal Radio Commission, 1928, pp. 169, 170.

and the facts regarding each having theretofore been explored by appropriate procedure, the Commission directed that all three be set down for argument before it to determine which, "on a comparative basis" "in the judgment of the Commission will best serve public interest." At this stage of the proceedings, respondents sought and obtained from the Court of Appeals the writ of mandamus now under review. That writ commanded the Commission to set aside its order designating respondent's application "for hearing on a comparative basis" with the other two, and "to hear and reconsider the application" of The Pottsville Broadcasting Company "on the basis of the record as originally made and in accordance with the opinions" of the Court of Appeals in the original review (69 App.D.C. 7, 98 F.2d 288), and in the mandamus proceedings. Pottsville Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 70 App.D.C. 157, 105 F.2d 36.

The Court of Appeals invoked against the Commission the familiar doctrine that a lower court is bound to respect the mandate of an appellate tribunal and cannot reconsider questions which the mandate has laid at rest. See In re Sanford Fork & Tool Co., Petitioner, 160 U.S. 247, 255, 256, 16 S.Ct. 291, 293, 40 L.Ed. 414. That proposition is indisputable, but it does not tell us what issues were laid at rest. Compare Sprague v. Ticonic Bank, 307 U.S. 161, 59 S.Ct. 777, 83 L. Ed. 1184. Nor is a court's interpretation of the scope of its own mandate necessarily conclusive. To be sure the court that issues a mandate is normally the best judge of its content, on the general theory that the author of a document is ordinarily the authoritative interpreter of its purposes. But it is not even true that a lower court's interpretation of its mandate is controlling here. Compare United States v. Morgan, 307 U.S. 183, 59 S.Ct. 795, 83 L.Ed. 1211. Therefore, we would not be foreclosed by the interpretation which the Court of Appeals gave to its mandate, even if it had been directed to a lower court.

A much deeper issue, however, is here involved. This was not a mandate from court to court but from a court to an administrative agency. What is in issue is not the relationship of federal courts inter se—a relationship defined largely by the courts themselves—but the due observance by courts of the distribution of authority made by Congress as between its power to regulate commerce and the reviewing power which it has conferred upon the courts under Article III of the Constitution, U.S.C.A. A review by a federal court of the action of a lower court is only one phase of a single unified process. But to the extent that a federal court is authorized to review an administrative act, there is superimposed upon the enforcement of legislative policy through administrative control a different process from that out of which the administrative action under review ensued. The technical rules derived from the interrelationship of judicial tribunals forming a hierarchical system are taken out of their environment when mechanically applied to determine the extent to which Congressional power, exercised through a delegated agency, can be controlled within the limited scope of "judicial power" conferred by Congress under the Constitution.

Courts, like other organisms, represent an interplay of form and function. The history of Anglo-American courts and the more or less narrowly defined range of their staple business have determined the basic characteristics of trial procedure, the rules of evidence, and the general principles of appellate review. Modern administrative tribunals are the outgrowth of conditions far different from those.³ To a large degree they have been a response to the felt need of governmental supervision over economic enterprise—a supervision which could effectively be exercised neither directly through self-executing legislation nor by the judicial process. That this movement was natural and its extension inevitable, was a quarter century ago the opinion of eminent spokesmen of the law.⁴ Perhaps the most striking characteristic of this movement has been the investiture of administrative agencies with power far exceeding and different from the conventional judicial modes for adjusting conflicting claims—modes whereby interested litigants define the scope of the inquiry and determine the data on which the judicial judgment is ultimately based. Administrative agencies have power themselves to initiate inquiry, or, when their authority is invoked, to control the range of investigation in ascertaining what is to satisfy the requirements of the public interest in relation to the needs of vast regions and sometimes the whole nation in the enjoyment of facilities for transportation, communication and other essential public services.⁵ These differences in origin and function preclude wholesale transplantation of the rules of procedure, trial and review which have evolved from the history and experience of courts. Thus, this Court has recognized that bodies like the Interstate Commerce Commission, into whose mould Congress has cast more recent administrative agencies, "should not be too narrowly constrained by technical rules as to the admissibility of proof," Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baird, 194 U.S. 25, 44, 24 S.Ct. 563, 568, 569, 48 L.Ed. 860, should be free to fashion their own rules of procedure and to pursue methods of inquiry capable of permitting them to discharge their multitudinous duties.⁶ Compare New England Divisions

³ See Maitland, The Constitutional History of England, pp. 415-18; Landis, The Administrative Process, passim.

⁴ See, for instance, the address of Elihu Root as President of the American Bar Association: "There is one special field of law development which has manifestly become inevitable. We are entering upon the creation of a body of administrative law quite different in its machinery, its remedies, and its necessary safeguards from the old methods of regulation by specific statutes enforced by the courts. . . . There will be no withdrawal from these experiments. . . . We shall go on; we shall expand them, whether we approve theoretically or not, because such agencies furnish protection to rights and obstacles to wrong doing which under our new social and industrial conditions cannot be practically accomplished by the old and simple procedure of legislatures and courts as in the last generation." 41 A.B.A.Rep. 355, 368-69.

⁵ See United States v. Lowden, 308 U.S. 225, 60 S.Ct. 248, 84 L.Ed. 208, decided December 4, 1939; Herring, Public Administration and the Public Interest, passim.

⁶ The Communications Commission's Rules of Practice, Rule 106.4, provided that "the Commission will, so far as practicable, endeavor to fix the same date . . . for hearing on all applications which . . . present conflicting claims . . . excepting, however, applications filed after any such application has been designated for hearing." Respondent contends, and the court below seemed to believe that Case, 261 U.S. 184, 43 S.Ct. 270, 67 L.Ed. 605. To be sure, the laws under which these agencies operate prescribe the fundamentals of fair play. They require that interested parties be afforded an opportunity for hearing and that judgment must express a reasoned conclusion. But to assimilate the relation of these administrative bodies and the courts to the relationship between lower and upper courts is to disregard the origin and purposes of the movement for administrative regulation and at the same time to disregard the traditional scope, however far-reaching, of the judicial process. Unless these vital differentiations between the functions of judicial and administrative tribunals are observed, courts will stray outside their province and read the laws of Congress through the distorting lenses of inapplicable legal doctrine.

Under the Radio Act of 1927 as originally passed, the Court of Appeals was authorized in reviewing action of the Radio Commission to "alter or revise the decision appealed from and enter such judgment as to it may seem just." § 16 of the Radio Act of 1927, 44 Stat. 1169. Thereby the Court of Appeals was constituted "a superior and revising agency in the same field" as that in which the Radio Commission acted. Federal Radio Comm. v. General Electric Co., 281 U.S. 464, 467, 50 S.Ct. 389, 390, 74 L.Ed. 969. Since the power thus given was administrative rather than judicial, the appellate jurisdiction of this Court could not be invoked. Federal Radio Comm. v. General Electric Co., supra. To lay the basis for review here, Congress amended § 16 so as to terminate the administrative oversight of the Court of Appeals. c. 788, 46 Stat. 844. In "sharp contrast with the previous grant of authority" the court was restricted to a purely judicial review. "Whether the commission applies the legislative standards validly set up, whether it acts within the authority conferred or goes beyond it, whether its proceedings satisfy the pertinent demands of due process, whether, in short, there is compliance with the legal requirements which fix the province of the commission and govern its action, are appropriate questions for judicial decision." Federal Radio Comm'n v. Nelson Bros. Co., 289 U.S. 266, 276, 53 S.Ct. 627, 632, 77 L.Ed. 1166, 89 A.L.R. 406.

On review the court may thus correct errors of law and on remand the Commission is bound to act upon the correction. Federal Power Comm'n v. Pacific Co., 307 U.S. 156, 59 S.Ct. 766, 83 L.Ed. 1180. But an administrative determination in which is imbedded a legal question open to judicial review does not impliedly foreclose the administrative agency, after its error has been corrected, from enforcing the legislative policy committed to its charge. Cf. Ford Motor Co. v. Labor Board, 305 U.S. 364, 59 S.Ct. 301, 83 L.Ed. 221.

this rule bound the Commission to give respondent a non-comparative consideration because its application had been set down for hearing before the later and rival applications were filed. The Commission interprets this rule simply as governing the order in which applications shall be heard, and not touching upon the order in which they shall be acted upon or the manner in which they shall be considered. That interpretation is binding upon the courts. American Tel. & Tel. Co. v. United States, 299 U.S. 232, 57 S.Ct. 170, 81 L.Ed. 142.

The Commission's responsibility at all times is to measure applications by the standard of "public convenience, interest, or necessity." The Commission originally found respondent's application inconsistent with the public interest because of an erroneous view regarding the law of Pennsylvania. The Court of Appeals laid bare that error, and, in compelling obedience to its correction, exhausted the only power which Congress gave it. At this point the Commission was again charged with the duty of judging the application in the light of "public convenience, interest, or necessity." The fact that in its first disposition the Commission had committed a legal error did not create rights of priority in the respondent, as against the later applicants, which it would not have otherwise possessed. Only Congress could confer such a priority. It has not done so. The Court of Appeals cannot write the principle of priority into the statute as an indirect result of its power to scrutinize legal errors in the first of an allowable series of administrative actions. Such an implication from the curtailed review allowed by the Communications Act is at war with the basic policy underlying the statute. It would mean that for practical purposes the contingencies of judicial review and of litigation, rather than the public interest, would be decisive factors in determining which of several pending applications was to be granted.

It is, however, urged upon us that if all matters of administrative discretion remain open for determination on remand after reversal, a succession of single determinations upon single legal issues is possible with resulting delay and hardship to the applicant. It is always easy to conjure up extreme and even oppressive possibilities in the exertion of authority. But courts are not charged with general guardianship against all potential mischief in the complicated tasks of government. The present case makes timely the reminder that "legislatures are ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts." Missouri, Kansas & Texas Ry. Co. v. May, 194 U.S. 267, 270, 24 S.Ct. 638, 639, 48 L.Ed. 971. Congress which creates and sustains these agencies must be trusted to correct whatever defects experience may reveal. Interference by the courts is not conducive to the development of habits of responsibility in administrative agencies. Anglo-American courts as we now know them are themselves in no small measure the product of a historic process.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to dissolve the writ of mandamus and to dismiss respondent's petition.

Reversed.

SECTION 13. LICENSING AND INSPECTION

GEORGE A. WARP, LICENSING AS A DEVICE FOR FEDERAL REGULATION

It has been said that a license, in its broad sense, is "a permit or privilege granted by competent authority to do that which by law would otherwise be unlawful." Licensing, in turn, might be defined as "the administrative lifting of a legislative prohibition." The legislature prohibits in order to make its regulations effective. It denies the right to do a particular thing but permits individual exceptions to be made by an administrative act. The exception constitutes the license and represents an official permit to engage in certain activities otherwise forbidden. In other words, licensing means that citizens stand before their government, one saying, "I wish to operate a securities exchange," another saying, "I desire to set up a radio station," and still another saying, "I want to be an aeroplane pilot." To each of these people and to others the government replies: "What you propose to do is of such public importance that it must be regulated in the interests of the common good. If you cannot or will not meet the standards which we prescribe, you may not go ahead with your plans."

The licensing device has been employed effectively in the field of federal administration only during recent years. Perhaps this is due somewhat to the fact that the licensing power has been associated customarily with some phase of the police power. The police power, of course, has been considered as one of the reserved powers of the states. Until the concept of a federal police power developed, few people thought of using licensing as a federal device. At any rate, the effective use of licensing as an instrument for law enforcement in this country is very largely a development of the twentieth century. Prior to 1900 examples of federal licensing were almost nonexistent. One instance, however, occurred in 1789, when the first Congress made provision for the licensing of ships and seamen. Indeed, practically all of the nineteenth century licenses involved the subject of navigation. Finally, in 1902, more than a century after the first licensing act was passed, licenses were required for the preparation of viruses and toxins when these were to be moved in interstate commerce. Ten years later licenses were required for the importation of nursery stock. The first of the great federal licensing acts, however, was the Warehouses Act of 1916. It was followed in rapid succession by other important acts: the Federal Water Power Act of 1920, the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921, the Grain Futures Act of 1922, the Radio Licensing Act of 1927, the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933, the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, and the Securities Act of 1933. Thus the newness of licensing as a means of federal control is readily apparent. . . .

* [Footnotes are omitted. Ed.]

The terminology of the various license laws varies considerably. The typical law, however, sets forth (1) the conditions under which a license becomes necessary; (2) the requirements which must be met by applicants; (3) the fees charged; (4) the duties imposed upon the licensees; (5) the agency authorized to issue such licenses; (6) the powers enjoyed by this agency; (7) the procedure in revoking licenses; (8) the grounds which constitute cause for revocation; and (9) the penalties for violations. Of course, most federal license laws state these matters in very general terms, leaving broad rule-making powers in the hands of the licensing agent or agency.

CHESTER LLOYD JONES, STATUTE LAW MAKING IN THE UNITED STATES

Boston: 1923. The F. W. Faxon Co. 281-283.*

. . . There are several classes of cases to which this means of law enforcement is peculiarly adaptable.

Business Licenses

Most important are the licenses on businesses which from their nature involve possibilities of unnecessary danger to the public. The chief instance of regulation in this case involves the perennial problem of the regulation of the sale of liquor. Some of the chief means of control which have been used where the policy of licensing has been followed are:

(a) Granting licenses for one year only, so that the licensing authorities will have the question of compliance or non-compliance with the law frequently brought before them for review.

(b) Limiting the maximum number of licenses by the population of the city, ward or other civil division, as one to 1,000 population.

(c) Prohibiting granting of licenses within certain distances of public parks, churches or schoolhouses.

(d) Requiring any person holding a license to sell liquor to be drunk on the premises to hold also a license as innholder or victualer. A provision of this sort used in Massachusetts and in Pennsylvania gave general satisfaction. It was argued that it helped eliminate disorderly bars. In New York, under the famous Raines law, the licenses issued produced an exactly opposite effect. The hotels operating under such licenses often became disorderly houses.

(e) Making courts the licensing authority. This was done on the theory that the long term of the judges would make them independent of the political influence of the liquor interests. It was doubtless true that this would be a better plan than the alternative of putting license-granting into the hands of the mayor or aldermen of cities; but it did not destroy the political influence of liquor and it put an unwelcome burden on the courts. Especially in large cities licenses are very valuable and when large numbers are to be issued it is not to be expected that the courts in their actions as to them will be as free from suspicion of accepting bribes as in their ordinary judicial duties. It is more important to protect the judge in his reputation for honesty than to insure fair licensing.

(f) Creating special commissions for licensing. These provisions have been of varying value. In some cities, especially when their members retire at different times and are appointed for long terms, they have been a decided success. Elsewhere they have, because of these very characteristics, forced the liquor interests to take an active part in politics all the time to insure that the commissioners shall not be "unfriendly." In the average case every licensing board becomes a powerful factor in local politics.

The Ohio constitution of 1851 forbade licenses and forced the state to the plan by which, under the law now in force, a flat charge of one thousand dollars per annum is demanded from anyone wishing to take up the business of the sale of liquor. Since it removes the discretionary element it has been claimed that this plan removes the liquor influence from politics to a greater extent than under the usual license scheme.

(g) Giving to the licensing authority the power to revoke the license at any time when judged necessary to protect the public interests.

(h) Providing that licenses shall be forfeited for infraction of law.

(i) Providing that no new license should be issued to a person for a term of years after forfeiture of a previous license.

(j) Making special regulations for the bonds of licensees. Abuses arise when wholesale dealers get control of retailers by signing bonds for them. Legislation has been passed to prevent this by forbidding any person to sign more than one bond (Iowa) or requiring that bondsmen shall not be engaged in the manufacture of spirituous or malt liquors (Pennsylvania). Office-holders might well be forbidden to be on bonds.

(k) Requiring consent of the owner of the building where liquor is to be sold before license will issue or the consent of all owners within a certain number of feet of the saloon.

(l) Placing restrictions on the way in which the business can be carried on, as by forbidding that musical instruments may be played on the premises, or providing that saloons shall not be run in connection with dance halls, bowling alleys, concert halls, theatres, boxing or wrestling exhibitions.

(m) Forbidding objectionable pictures, or the use of dice, cards, screens or partitions.

(n) Forbidding the employment of women as bartenders, waitresses or singers.

(o) Prohibiting druggists to sell liquors except on a physician's prescription.

(p) Creating a special state constabulary for the enforcement of the rules to be observed by the licensees.

The regulation of various callings alleged to be in a peculiar relation to the public began in England at least as early as 1547. Almost from the first the device has been used in ways which show that the protection of the public was only the secondary object. Besides the regulation of the liquor traffic, where the public interest was clear, licenses were frequently demanded for many sorts of livelihoods, alleged to involve danger. Steeplejacks, chimney sweeps, and the like were early required to have licenses. Present-day legislation, under the same excuse, tends to increase the number of cases regulated. The requirement of licenses to practice as a physician or dentist or pharmacist, or to run engines, is evidently justifiable on the ground of the protection of the public, no matter how great may be the incidental advantage reaped by those licensed through the exclusion of unqualified competitors. Licensing of hackmen and ferrymen and the regulation of their charges is also justified because of public policy. But much of the licensing authorized by our present legislation is evidently motivated not by protection of the public nor even by the desire for public revenue, but by the supposed benefits coming to those licensed by the creation of their veiled monopoly. The licensing of barbers, horseshoers, and similar tradesmen involving examinations for entry is now becoming frequent. Regulations of this character not infrequently have been used as a means by which the number of apprenticeships and the number of those in the "profession" can be regulated to the advantage of those already licensed.

NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO. v. UNITED STATES

Supreme Court of the United States, 1943.
319 U.S. 190, 63 S.Ct. 997, 87 L.Ed. 1344.

Appeals from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

In view of our dependence upon regulated private enterprise in discharging the far-reaching rôle which radio plays in our society, a somewhat detailed exposition of the history of the present controversy and the issues which it raises is appropriate.

These suits were brought on October 30, 1941, to enjoin the enforcement of the Chain Broadcasting Regulations promulgated by the Federal Communications Commission on May 2, 1941, and amended on October 11, 1941. . . .

On March 18, 1938, the Commission undertook a comprehensive investigation to determine whether special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting¹ were required in the "public interest, convenience, or necessity". The Commission's order directed that inquiry be made, inter alia, in the following specific matters: the number of stations licensed to or affiliated with networks; and the amount of station time used or controlled by networks; the contractual rights and obligations of stations under their agreements with networks; the scope of network agreements containing exclusive affiliation provisions and restricting the network from affiliating with other stations in the same area; the rights and obligations of stations with respect to network advertisers; the nature of the program service rendered by stations licensed to networks; the policies of networks with respect to character of programs, diversification, and accommodation to the particular requirements of the areas served by the affiliated stations; the extent to which affiliated stations exercise control over programs, advertising contracts, and related matters; the nature and extent of network program duplication by stations serving the same area; the extent to which particular networks have exclusive coverage in some areas; the competitive practices of stations engaged in chain broadcasting; the effect of chain broadcasting upon stations not licensed to or affiliated with networks; practices or agreements in restraint of trade, or in furtherance of monopoly, in connection with chain broadcasting; and the scope of concentration of control over stations, locally, regionally or nationally, through contracts, common ownership, or other means. . . .

On May 2, 1941, the Commission issued its Report on Chain Broadcasting, setting forth its findings and conclusions upon the matters explored in the investigation, together with an order adopting the Regulations here assailed. . . .

. . . . The Regulations, which the Commission characterized in its Report as "the expression of the general policy we will follow in exercising our licensing power", are addressed in terms to station licensees and applicants for station licenses. They provide, in general, that no licenses shall be granted to stations or applicants having specified relationships with networks. Each Regulation is directed at a particular practice found by the Commission to be detrimental to the "public interest" The Radio Act of 1927 created the Federal Radio Commission, composed of five members, and endowed the Commission with wide licensing and regulatory powers. We do not pause here to enumerate the scope of the Radio Act of 1927 and of the authority entrusted to the Radio Commission, for the basic provisions of that Act are incorporated in the Communications Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 1064, 47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., 47 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq., the legislation immediately before us. As we noted in Federal Communications Comm. v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 137, 60 S.Ct. 437, 438, 84 L.Ed. 656, "In its essentials the Communications Act of 1934 [so far as its provisions relating to radio are concerned] derives from the Federal Radio Act of 1927 By this Act Congress, in order to protect the national interest involved in the new and far-reaching science of broadcasting, formulated a unified and comprehensive regulatory system for the industry. The common factors in the administration of the various statutes by which Congress had supervised the different modes of communication led to the creation, in the Act of 1934, of the Communications Commission. But the objectives of the legislation have remained substantially unaltered since 1927."

Section 1 of the Communications Act states its "purpose of regulating interstate and foreign commerce in communication by wire and radio so as to make available, so far as possible, to all the people of the United States a rapid, efficient, Nation-wide, and world-wide wire and radio communication service with adequate facilities at reasonable charges". Section 301 particularizes this general purpose with respect to radio: "It is the purpose of this Act, among other things, to maintain the control of the United States over all the channels of interstate and foreign radio transmission; and to provide for the use of such channels, but not the ownership thereof, by persons for limited periods of time, under licenses granted by Federal authority, and no such license shall be construed to create any right, beyond the terms, conditions, and periods of the license." To that end a Commission composed of seven members was created, with broad licensing and regulatory powers.

Section 303 provides:

"Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the Commission from time to time, as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires, shall—

"(a) Classify radio stations;

"(b) Prescribe the nature of the service to be rendered by each class of licensed stations and each station within any class;

"(f) Make such regulations not inconsistent with law as it may deem necessary to prevent interference between stations and to carry out the provisions of this Act ;

"(g) Study new uses for radio, provide for experimental uses of frequencies, and generally encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest;

"(i) Have authority to make special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting;

"(r) Make such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act"

The criterion governing the exercise of the Commission's licensing power is the "public interest, convenience, or necessity". §§ 307(a) (d), 309(a), 310, 312. In addition, § 307(b) directs the Commission that "In considering applications for licenses, and modifications and renewals thereof, when and insofar as there is demand for the same, the Commission shall make such distribution of licenses, frequencies, hours of operation, and of power among the several States and communities as to provide a fair, efficient, and equitable distribution of radio service to each of the same."

The Act itself establishes that the Commission's powers are not limited to the engineering and technical aspects of regulation of radio communication. Yet we are asked to regard the Commission as a kind of traffic officer, policing the wave lengths to prevent stations from interfering with each other. But the Act does not restrict the Commission merely to supervision of the traffic. It puts upon the Commission the burden of determining the composition of that traffic. The facilities of radio are not large enough to accommodate all who wish to use them. Methods must be devised for choosing from among the many who apply. And since Congress itself could not do this, it committed the task to the Commission.

The Commission was, however, not left at large in performing this duty. The touchstone provided by Congress was the "public interest, convenience, or necessity", a criterion which "is as concrete as the complicated factors for judgment in such a field of delegated authority permit". Federal Communications Comm. v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 138, 60 S.Ct. 437, 439, 84 L.Ed. 656. "This criterion is not to be interpreted as setting up a standard so indefinite as to confer an unlimited power. Compare N. Y. Cent. Securities Corp. v. United States, 287 U.S. 12, 24, 53 S.Ct. 45 [48], 77 L.Ed. 138. The requirement is to be interpreted by its context, by the nature of radio transmission and reception, by the scope, character, and quality of services" Federal Radio Comm. v. Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortgage Co., 289 U.S. 266, 285, 53 S.Ct. 627, 636, 77 L.Ed. 1166, 89 A.L.R. 406.

The "public interest" to be served under the Communications Act is thus the interest of the listening public in "the larger and more effective use of radio". § 303(g). The facilities of radio are limited and therefore precious; they cannot be left to wasteful use without detriment to the public interest. "An important element of public interest and convenience affecting the issue of a license is the ability of the licensee to render the best practicable service to the community reached by his broadcasts." Federal Communications Comm. v. Sanders Bros. Radio Station, 309 U.S. 470, 475, 642, 60 S.Ct. 693, 697, 84 L.Ed. 869, 1037. The Commission's licensing function cannot be discharged, therefore, merely by finding that there are no technological objections to the granting of a license. If the criterion of "public interest" were limited to such matters, how could the Commission choose between two applicants for the same facilities, each of whom is financially and technically qualified to operate a station?

Since the very inception of federal regulation by radio, comparative considerations as to the services to be rendered have governed the application of the standard of "public interest, convenience, or necessity". See Federal Communications Comm. v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 138 n. 2, 60 S.Ct. 437, 439, 84 L.Ed. 656.

The avowed aim of the Communications Act of 1934 was to secure the maximum benefits of radio to all the people of the United States. To that end Congress endowed the Communications Commission with comprehensive powers to promote and realize the vast potentialities of radio. Section 303(g) provides that the Commission shall "generally encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest"; subsection (i) gives the Commission specific "authority to make special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting"; and subsection (r) empowers it to adopt "such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act".

These provisions, individually and in the aggregate, preclude the notion that the Commission is empowered to deal only with technical and engineering impediments to the "larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest". We cannot find in the Act any such restriction of the Commission's authority. . . .

We conclude, therefore, that the Communications Act of 1934 authorized the Commission to promulgate regulations designed to correct the abuses disclosed by its investigation of chain broadcasting. There remains for consideration the claim that the Commission's exercise of such authority was unlawful.

The Regulations are assailed as "arbitrary and capricious". If this contention means that the Regulations are unwise, that they are not likely to succeed in accomplishing what the Commission intended, we can say only that the appellants have selected the wrong forum for such a plea. What was said in Board of Trade v. United States, 314 U.S. 534, 548, 62 S.Ct. 366, 372, 86 L.Ed. 432, is relevant here: "We certainly have neither technical competence nor legal authority to pronounce upon the wisdom of the course taken by the Commission." Our duty is at an end when we find that the action of the Commission was based upon findings supported by evidence, and was made pursuant to authority granted by Congress. It is not for us to say that the "public interest" will be furthered or retarded by the Chain Broadcasting Regulations. The responsibility belongs to the Congress for the grant of valid legislative authority and to the Commission for its exercise.

It would be sheer dogmatism to say that the Commission made out no case for its allowable discretion in formulating these Regulations. Its long investigation disclosed the existences of practices which it regarded as contrary to the "public interest". The Commission knew that the wisdom of any action it took would have to be tested by experience: "We are under no illusion that the regulations we are adopting will solve all questions of public interest with respect to the network system of program distribution. . . . The problems in the network field are interdependent, and the steps now taken may perhaps operate as a partial solution of problems not directly dealt with at this time. Such problems may be examined again at some future time after the regulations here adopted have been given a fair trial." (Report, p. 88.) The problems with which the Commission attempted to deal could not be solved at once and for all time by rigid rules-of-thumb. The Commission therefore did not bind itself inflexibly to the licensing policies expressed in the Regulations. In each case that comes before it the Commission must still exercise an ultimate judgment whether the grant of a license would serve the "public interest, convenience, or necessity." If time and changing circumstances reveal that the "public interest" is not served by application of the Regulations, it must be assumed that the Commission will act in accordance with its statutory obligations. . . .

We come, finally, to an appeal to the First Amendment. The Regulations, even if valid in all other respects, must fall because they abridge, say the appellants, their right of free speech. If that be so, it would follow that every person whose application for a license to operate a station is denied by the Commission is thereby denied his constitutional right of free speech. Freedom of utterance is abridged to many who wish to use the limited facilities of radio. Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all. That is its unique characteristic, and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to governmental regulation. Because it cannot be used by all, some who wish to use it must be denied. But Congress did not authorize the Commission to choose among applicants upon the basis of their political, economic or social views, or upon any other capricious basis. If it did, or if the Commission by these Regulations proposed a choice among applicants upon some such basis, the issue before us would be wholly different. The question here is simply whether the Commission, by announcing that it will refuse licenses to persons who engage in specified network practices (a basis for choice which we hold is comprehended within the statutory criterion of "public interest"), is thereby denying such persons the constitutional right of free speech. The right of free speech does not include, however, the right to use the facilities of radio without a license. The licensing system established by Congress in the Communications Act of 1934 was a proper exercise of its power over commerce. The standard it provided for the licensing of stations was the "public interest, convenience, or necessity". Denial of a station license on that ground, if valid under the Act, is not a denial of free speech.

A procedural point calls for just a word. The District Court, by granting the Government's motion for summary judgment, disposed of the case upon the pleadings and upon the record made before the Commission. The court below correctly held that its inquiry was limited to review of the evidence before the Commission. Trial de novo of the matters heard by the Commission and dealt with in its Report would have been improper. See Tagg Bros. v. United States, 280 U.S. 420, 50 S.Ct. 220, 74 L.Ed. 524; Acker v. United States, 298 U.S. 426, 56 S.Ct. 824, 80 L.Ed. 1257.

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK and MR. JUSTICE RUTLEDGE took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

[MR. JUSTICE MURPHY, with whom MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS concurred, dissented on the ground that the Act does not in terms give the Commission power to regulate the contractual relations between the stations and the networks, and cannot properly be construed to do so. Ed.]

STATE v. CANNON

Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1932. 206 Wis. 374, 240 N.W. 441.

[This case appears supra, p. 357]

BECK v. WALLANDER

Supreme Court of New York, 1947. 71 N.Y.S.2d 237.

EDER, JUSTICE. Motion granted. The petitioner is a professional dancer and at present under engagement to perform in a cabaret in the Borough of Manhattan. Rules and regulations have been promulgated by the Police Commissioner of this city governing cabarets. Under the definition of "employee", as defined by regulation 1(b), the petitioner comes within its ambit. Under regulation 6, a cabaret employee is required to have an "identification card" in order to have employment in such an establishment and the holder thereof is required to conform to certain standards of behavior as prescribed by the Police Department regulations. So far as here deemed pertinent, regulation 6 provides: "6. Identification card. No person who comes in contact or is likely to come in contact with the patrons of a cabaret shall be employed on the premises of a cabaret for more than three (3) days from the date of original employment and shall not be reemployed unless such person has obtained a cabaret employee's identification card or temporary permit issued by the Police Commissioner in such form and manner as he may prescribe"

The holder of an identification card or temporary permit is required to comply with the police regulations prescribed for the proper regulation of cabarets, among them not to engage or participate in any illegal or unlawful capacity nor in any conduct offensive to public decency and is not to indulge in indecent language or conduct offensive to decency or propriety in any scene, sketch or act.

Regulation 20, which is entitled "Attire", provides: "No person shall be permitted to appear in any scene, sketch or act with breasts or lower part of torso uncovered or so thinly covered or draped as to appear uncovered."

The petitioner made application for an identification card and informal hearings were held and the application was denied by the respondent. The transcript of these hearings does not disclose the reason for the denial but the opposing affidavit of the Deputy Police Commissioner in charge of supervision and licensing of cabarets reveals that the conclusion was reached that petitioner's performance offends regulation 20, in that reports made by two police officers assigned to watch her performance disclose that during her performance parts of her body were exposed, i. e., her bosom, her breasts and lower part of her torso. This the petitioner denies, but I shall assume, for the purposes of this application and the disposition thereof, and to avoid any issue of fact and thus dispose of the matter as a pure question of law, that the statements in the opposing affidavits in the mentioned respect are true.

It is to be noted that there is no claim by respondent that petitioner's performance was unlawful or in violation of any statute; and the fact is that the police officers who witnessed the performance on two evenings made no arrest; reasonable assumption is that they would have done so if any basis or justification for an arrest existed.

Proceeding upon this premise, I am of opinion that the refusal of the respondent to issue to petitioner an identification card is an arbitrary and unjustified act and one without authority in law.

It is to be observed that the rules and regulations respecting the behavior and conduct of a cabaret employee or permittee only come into effect after the employee or permittee has been granted an identification card: "The holder of an identification card or temporary permit shall" comply with the regulations. There is, seemingly, no rule or regulation prescribing the qualifications of an applicant for an identification card as to the applicant's previous behavior or conduct, reputation, character or record. It would seem that the Police Commissioner is impliedly empowered to prescribe rules and regulations in that regard, but so far as the record discloses none have been promulgated.

Assuming petitioners' performance to have been in contravention of regulation 20, it does not by any means follow that if granted an identification card she will continue her performance in that manner: she may not and there is no arbitrary right to presume that she will: she may and the fair inference is that she will alter or modify the same to conform to the requirements of the regulation. Whether or not she will, or has done so, obviously cannot be determined until she has been granted an identification card and has thereafter acted.

Suppose she does conform after the issuance of the identification card? What then? Surely, in such an event there would be no justifiable basis for interference with her performance. On the other hand, if she did not conform to the requirements of the regulation, the respondent could then take such action as he deemed proper within the proper and lawful scope of his powers. But until the anticipated offending event actually occurs (and it may never eventuate) the possible happening thereof rests in the realm of pure conjecture.

If the respondents' denial is to prevail a cabaret employee may never have an opportunity to earn a livelihood for such an employee would never be afforded the chance to conform to the requirements of the regulation and such a viewpoint, as the basis for denying an identification card or temporary permit, is an arbitrary one and is, as I view it, unsustainable in law.

It is the common right of every person to engage in the pursuit of a lawful occupation or calling and it is a settled canon of statutory construction with respect to acts in derogation of common-law rights that an act which infringes upon common right is to be strictly construed. 1 McKinney's New York Statutes, Section 311 and cases there cited. It is also a general rule of statutory construction that all statutes are presumed to operate prospectively and are not to receive a retroactive construction unless their language either expressly or by necessary implication requires that they be so construed. 1 McKinney's Statutes, supra, Section 51 and cases there cited.

By its very language regulation 20 is plainly prospective in operation, not retrospective,—and if attempted to be made retrospective,—in the absence of any rule or regulation as to the qualifications which an applicant for an identification card must possess,—it is, to that extent, invalid and void.

After due consideration and reflection I have reached the conclusion that petitioner is entitled to a peremptory order directing the respondent to issue to her a cabaret employee's identification card, as prayed for. Settle order on one day's notice.

CONSOLIDATED MINES v. SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1938. 97 F.2d 704.

HEALY, CIRCUIT JUDGE. The Securities and Exchange Commission, under authority of § 22(b) of the Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77v(b), applied to the district court to enforce compliance with a subpoena duces tecum directed against appellants in the course of an investigation ordered by the Commission. From an order directing obedience to the subpoena, this appeal was taken.

The appellant Consolidated Mines of California is a California corporation, operating in Calaveras County. Appellants Wikoff and Tyler are respectively its president and secretary. On November 5, 1937 the Commission, pursuant to § 20(a) of the Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77t(a), ordered an investigation of the facts concerning alleged violations by appellants of §§ 5 and 17(a) of the act, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 77e, 77q(a). These latter are shown on the margin.

Pursuant to § 19(b), 15 U.S.C.A. § 77s(b), officers were appointed for the purpose of the investigation and empowered to require the attendance of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence deemed relevant to the inquiry. A copy of the order is annexed to the application filed with the court.

It sufficiently appears from its application and the showing made in support of it that the Commission was in possession of information affording reasonable grounds for the belief that the appellant corporation and its officers, although no registration statement was in effect as to its securities, had for a long period been engaged in the sale of the corporation's stock; further, that during the same period these securities were being marketed on the basis of untrue statements concerning the extent and value of ore bodies and the profits to be derived by the corporation from its operations.

Prior to ordering the investigation, the Commission had received complaints and information tending to establish that those in charge of the affairs of the appellant corporation had undertaken to sell its stock in interstate commerce and through the use of the mails. In these efforts it was represented that the company possessed ore bodies running from $18.00 to $38.53 per ton; that the company could have shown a good profit on ore of an average value of $10.00 per ton, due to low costs of milling; that "our engineers report that we now have enough ore blocked out to justify the erection of the mill with assurance that we have sufficient ore for continuous operation"; that "our assays show that the value of the ore we have developed is much higher than we had anticipated. An average of several hundred assays runs in the neighborhood of $35.00"; that the company's mill had been producing steadily and that its capacity was being increased. The Commission had information that these representations were false and misleading, and that in fact the company had operated at a substantial loss from its organization to as late as September 30, 1937, the latest date as to which figures were made available to the Commission's investigators.

Acting upon this information, the Commission issued its order to determine whether infractions of §§ 5 and 17 of the act had in fact taken place or were threatened. The officers of the Commission designated to conduct the investigation issued subpoenas directed to the corporation and to appellants Wikoff and Tyler, the latter being ordered to appear at the investigation to be held on November 22, 1937, and there produce the following:

"1. All the engineers' reports, together with covering letters, exhibits, supporting data and supplements in the possession of the company, concerning the McKisson, Grand Prize and/or Mineral Lode Properties in Calaveras County, California.

"2. All mining records and assay records in the possession of Consolidated Mines of California, pertaining to the McKisson, Grand Prize and/or Mineral Lode Properties in Calaveras County, California, for the period from January 1, 1934, to October 1, 1937, including all
